Allen's angry reaction at the Chamber of Commerce debate prompted criticism from Internet bloggers and some Jewish leaders, some of whom accused him of hiding his Jewish ancestry or viewing it as a political problem.

"It's strange that George Allen wasn't more curious about his own heritage and a lot of people are wondering why," said George Mason University politics professor Mark J. Rozell.

But Rozell said most Virginia voters are not likely to see the question of Allen's roots as an important one in determining how they will vote in November.

DOJ_NMG_0066721

"I don't even think among some of the more hard-core religious conservatives in this state it will cause him any difficulty," Rozell said. "When it comes down to it in November, voters are going to look at George Allen's record, the war in Iraq, Jim Webb, a lot of policy issues."

Allen's mother said she first began concealing her Jewish roots after meeting her future husband, afraid that she would not be accepted by his parents and fearful that her religion could harm his budding coaching career, which started at Whittier College, a school in Southern California founded by Quakers.

"He didn't want me to tell his mother," she said of the elder George Allen. "At that time, that was a no-no, to marry outside the church." Allen died in 1990.

Leo Mugmon, 92, a longtime friend of Allen's mother who knew her as a Jew in Tunis, recalled her decision to hide her faith when she came to the United States.

"She did not say anything to her mother-in-law or her family," Mugmon said. He added that Etty Allen's father, Felix Lumbroso, traveled from Tunis for the Allen wedding. "Mr. Felix didn't say anything about it. In silence, he sort of condoned it."

Etty Allen said she is relieved to no longer have to keep a secret about her past. She said she hopes the revelation does not hurt her son's bid for reelection to the Senate.

"He's fine. He loves challenges," she said, then offered an unsolicited observation that suggests her son might be ready for a break from tough questions: "His favorite time of the week is when he comes home, sits on his riding mower, by himself and mows his lawn and no one is asking him questions."

Exchange Between Allen And TV Reporter On His Heritage (WP)

The text of the exchange between Sen. George Allen and WUSA (Channel 9) reporter Peggy Fox at the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce debate Monday in Tysons Corner:

Fox : Senator Allen, you have said several times that you made up the word "macaca" when referring to S.R. Sidarth, the young man of Indian heritage born and raised in Fairfax County who attends your alma mater. But the word is a racial slur in French-influenced African nations, most notably Tunisia. Your mother's Tunisian -- are you sure you never heard the word and if you were just making up a name, to call Sidarth, why not just call him John, something that -- rather than something that sounds derogatory. Was it because he looked different?

Allen : I hope you're not trying to bring my mother into this matter. I have said, and I'll say it once again, I made a mistake. It was a thoughtless moment. I have apologized for it, as well I should. I had never heard that word before, from my mother or from anyone else. If I had any idea that in some parts of the world, for some cultures, that this would be an insult, I would never use that word, because that's not who I am, that's not how I was raised, it's not what I believe in.

Whether it was from my father's football teams, where he had people from all different parts of the country and different backgrounds -- you don't care about, on football teams or on sports teams, what someone's race or religion is or ethnicity is, all you care about is whether they can help the team compete and succeed. And that's the meritocracy that we should aspire to in our country. And if there's one lesson that I learned more than from anyone else it was my mother, whose father was incarcerated by the Nazis in World War II. And of all people in my life who told me about tolerance and not judging people by their religious beliefs or their ethnicity or their race, it is my mother.

And so I made that mistake, I will of course do better, I'm sorry I said it. Nonetheless, there was no intent whatsoever to insult that young man or anyone else. It is not who I am and that is why, by the way, state senator Bennie Lambert, an African American, Democrat, endorsed me last week because he knows my record in making sure this is a land of opportunity for all and especially helping out minority-serving institutions.

Fox : May I ask a follow up? Following the macaca episode, the Jewish press published a story on the Internet that explored your possible Jewish ancestry on your mother's side. You've been quoted as saying your mother's not Jewish, but it had been reported her father, your grandfather Felix, whom you were given your middle name for, was Jewish. Could you please tell us whether your forebearers include Jews, and if so, at which point Jewish identity might have ended?

DOJ_NMG_0066722

Allen : I'm glad you all have that, you have that reaction. You know what our first freedom in this country was? Freedom of religion, where people's rights are not enhanced or diminished on account of their religious beliefs. Thomas Jefferson was the author of that. As we try to stand up a free and just society, that's the first pillar of a free and just society. And to be getting into what religion my mother is, I don't think it's relevant, whatever one person believes, whatever their beliefs may be, is not relevant. So I'd like to ask you, why is that relevant? My religion, Jim's religion, or the religion beliefs of anyone out there. [applause]

My mother's French Italian . . .

Fox : Honesty.

Allen : . . . with a little Spanish blood in her. And I was raised as she was, as far as I know, raised as a Christian. But if you really need to get into such matters . . .

Fox : . . . Honesty, that's all.

Allen : Oh, that's all? That's just all? We need, we need to get this country together. And I respect your right to ask questions. But let's ask questions about issues that really matter to people here, in Virginia, such as how we're going to bring this country together, make us more secure, a land of opportunity. And I'll tell you one other thing, preserve our foundational values, and one of those values is freedom of religion and not making aspersions about people because of their religious beliefs.

September 17, 2006, 3:09 pm Making Nice, but No Progress

The standoff continues between the Bush administration and some senators over limits on CIA interrogations of suspected terrorists, raising questions on whether Congress will act on the matter before it leaves town later this month for the fall campaigns.

Making the rounds of the Sunday talk shows, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley declined to say what specific techniques would be illegal if Congress didn't pass Mr. Bush's proposal. But he said the CIA program would suffer and be shut down if interrogators do not have guidance. He said the White House is working on a compromise that "achieves Senator [John] McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change" the Geneva Conventions. "We need to find a way through that obstacle course, and I think we can," Mr. Hadley said.

Michigan Sen. Carl Levin said he wasn't certain a compromise was possible. "I don't see a way unless the president gives up on his idea that we're going to unilaterally modify Geneva," he told CBS' "Face the Nation"

A Supreme Court ruling in June essentially said the Geneva Conventions on the rights of wartime prisoners should apply to suspected terrorists in CIA custody. The decision froze the interrogations and eventually led the administration to turn over the last 14 prisoners in CIA custody to the military officials running a prison for detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

September 17, 2006, 1:11 pm Chewing Over the Virginia Senate Race

Republican Sen. George Allen, who has seen his big lead over former Navy Secretary Jim Webb deflate since he flung the "macaca" comment at a Webb volunteer of Indian descent last month, squared off with his opponent on NBC's "Meet the Press," where both men found themselves on the defensive. Webb had to answer charges that a magazine article he wrote 27 years paved the way for harrassment and abuse of women at the U.S. Naval Academy. In fact, after some early argument over Iraq and detainee interrogations, the debate turned to dealing with all the baggage.

Allen didn't really need to apologize for his remark, he's already done so repeatedly. Nonetheless, he called it "a mistake" and said "there was no racial or ethnic intent to slur anyone." When pressed on his past embrace of the Confederate flag, Allen said there are "a lot of things I wish I'd learned earlier in life," and pledged to help people of all races become a part of "team America."

Webb said he regretted "many pieces" of the article, such as one passage that referred to Naval Academy dormitories as "a horny woman's dream" and another in which Mr. Webb wrote that he had never met a female he would "trust to provide" combat leadership." Mr. Webb then tried to shift attention back to Allen's previous opposition to admitting women to the Virginia Military Institute. He later noted that he agrees with the Army's current policy of having women "attached" to combat — 62 have died serving in Iraq over the last three years - -but not directly fighting as part of infantry units.

In the end,the two came to agreement on something: chewing tobacco. Show host Tim Russert pressed them both on their long-time tobacco habits, asking if that was a good example for children. Both candidates agreed it was a bad example, but, perhaps in deference to the presence of major tobacco firms in Virginia, neither said they planned to quit. "Yes I do dip," Allen said, striking a softly defiant tone. He then quoted Mark Twain: "Nothing needs more reforming than someone else's habit." –Christopher Conkey

September 15, 2006, 6:27 pm Wait, Who's on the Ballot?

The White House this afternoon released the president's schedule for next week, which includes one intriguing entry. On Thursday, President Bush will be in Orlando, Fla., to attend a "Charlie Christ for Governor" event.

We'll take a guess they meant Charlie Crist , the Republican candidate for Florida governor. It's an easy enough mistake to make.

On the subject of religion, President Bush at a Rose Garden news conference this morning did talk about what he sees as America's changing attitudes. Responding to question about his address to conservative columnists earlier this week in which he brought up a "Third Awakening" of religious devotion, the president said: "It seems like to me that something is happening in the religious life of America… But I'm able to see a lot of people, and from my perspective, people are coming to say, I'm praying for you. And it's an uplifting part of being the president; it inspires me. And I'm grateful that a fellow citizen would say a prayer for me and Laura." –Amy Schatz

September 15, 2006, 5:34 pm Dodging a Dukakis Moment

While touring a high-tech plant today, Massachusetts Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey , the Republican candidate for governor, apparently refused to be seen wearing goggles and a hard hat by waiting photographers, according to the Patriot Ledger. The incident in Quincy follows a similar one last month in New Bedford, the AP reports, when Healey's campaign staff barred photographers from snapping photos "while she was wearing a hair net at a fish processing plant."

Seems to Washington Wire that doing anything to avoid a Dukakis moment, particularly in Massachusetts, is only prudent. Also, let's be honest: Who looks good in a hair net?!

Healey's decision to nix the goggles photo op means the Democratic winner of the state's Sept. 19 primary will have one less photo to choose from when the attack ads start. Three Democrats are currently trying to win the nomination to take on Healey in November. At this point, the governor's race is considered a toss-up. –Amy Schatz

September 15, 2006, 4:31 pm You Gotta…Know When to Fold 'Em

Among the allegations the Justice Department today announced against Rep. Bob Ney (R, Ohio): on two occasions in 2003, he accepted thousands of dollars of gambling chips from a "foreign businessman" for use at private London casinos. In exchange, he lobbied the State Department for an exemption to a trade embargo against a country to which the businessman wanted to sell U.S.-made aircraft and airplane parts, the Justice Department says.

Ney The Justice Department wouldn't divulge the businessman's nationality or the country to which he sought the embargo exception. But according to numerous media accounts, the London rendezvous included British resident Nigel Winfield and Syrian-born Fouad al Zayat, co-owners of Cyprus-based FN Aviation. Their intended market: Iran. (Ney, who once lived in Iran, is the only member of Congress fluent in Farsi.)

Under the gifts section of his 2004 financial disclosure report, Ney listed $34,000 from a "game of chance" at the Ambassador's Club, a London casino. The Justice Department said his combined winnings exceeded $50,000. In June, Ney was one of just 17 Republican to vote against a bill to crack down on Internet gambling. –Ben Winograd

The new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows that a 59% majority of voters rejects President Bush's recent comparison of the war on terrorism to earlier struggles against Nazism and fascism. In equal proportions, members of families including a current soldier or military veteran join other voters in calling that "an inappropriate comparison that is only being made to justify the Bush policy."

Americans of all ages, incomes and demographic groups agree on the point; only Republicans and conservatives side with the president. Asked about the war in Iraq at today's Rose Garden news conference, Bush said he's prosecuting "the ideological war of the 21st century" but did not repeat the comparison to the battle against Nazism. –John Harwood

September 15, 2006, 3:10 pm Indiana Voters Leaning Leftward?

When he worked at the White House, Mitch Daniels wasn't always the most popular guy in the room. It's not an uncommon problem for the head of the Office of Management and Budget, whose job includes telling the president and federal agencies how much less money they'll have to spend than they want.

Daniels That's one reason why Daniels, who as Indiana governor has spent a lot of time trying to balance the state's budget, probably won't be fazed by new poll from WISH-TV in Indianapolis, showing Hoosiers aren't very happy with him. Daniels, a Republican, was rated in the fair or poor categories by 57% of all respondents (although just 35% of Republicans). The poll of 800 likely voters conducted from Sept. 5 to Sept. 8 found that 55% think the country is headed in the wrong direction while 41% say its going the right way.

Daniels isn't up for re-election this fall. But three Indiana congressional seats are in play, which is why both Republicans and Democrats are pouring money and resources into the conservative state. Among local issues, voters appear to still be miffed about Daniels's decision to lease a northern Indiana toll road to an international conglomerate as well as the continuing drama over the state's effort to pick a time zone. Consequently, the answer to one poll question –"Would you like to see more Democrats or Republicans elected to Congress this year?"– may be somewhat troubling.

In all, 46% said they'd prefer more Democrats while 41% chose Republican. Among women, 50% preferred Democrats, and 35% favored Republicans. –Amy Schatz

September 15, 2006, 1:17 pm Scrubbing the Numbers

The Citizenship and Immigration Service says its once-monumental backlog for green card, asylum and naturalization requests has almost disappeared—except for the 1.1 million people still in it.

USCIS Director Emilio Gonzalez called a news conference to announce that the service's "net backlog" had been winnowed to 139,000 by the end of July—down from 3.8 million in January 2004—and that he expects to eliminate it by Oct. 1. The backlog includes people applying to join family members, those who want to live and work here permanently, political refugees and those seeking asylum, and people who already are here and want to gain their citizenship.

The news should have come as a relief to certain categories of Filipinos, who have been waiting since 1984 for permission to join family members. Some categories of Mexicans have been waiting since 1993, and some Indians and Chinese have been on the wait list since 1995, according to a monthly government bulletin advising immigrants how long they can expect to wait.

But USCIS, which replaced the old Immigration and Naturalization Service, says it still has a "gross backlog" of a million people whose applications are being held up by other agencies and by situations over which it has no control. About 100,000 of those cases are waiting for the FBI to complete background checks. But most of the gross backlog is because Congress limits the number of new immigrants from any one country to 7% of the yearly total, regardless of the country's size or the number of its people who want to immigrate. Under that rule, tiny Singapore is entitled to as many green cards yearly as China.

The USCIS defines a backlogged case as one that's been in the works longer than six months. That means immigrants from small countries who are applying to join their families face a fairly speedy route through the immigration system. But for those long-waiting Filipinos and Mexicans, the wait could be almost as long as ever. –June Kronholz

September 15, 2006, 11:40 am Activists Call for IMF/World Bank Boycott

Antipoverty activists announce a boycott of the International Monetary Fund/World Bank annual meetings to protest Singapore's refusal to let some of them enter the country.

After massive antiglobalization demonstrations over the last decade, the international lenders have tried to incorporate nongovernmental organizations into their decision-making. But the relationship isn't always smooth.

Now 163 such groups say they won't participate in official events in Singapore. They had planned to raise concerns about the often-austere economic policies the IMF urges its 184 member nations to implement, as well as the environmental impact of dams and other big World Bank projects.

World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz condemned Singapore's "authoritarian" actions. "The one thing I think I would say is that a lot of that damage has been done to Singapore and it's self-inflicted," Wolfowitz told activists at a roundtable, before they walked out. "It is unacceptable."

An IMF spokesman said of the activist groups: "We have been having productive discussions, and we expect them to continue."

In a statement issued Friday, the World Bank said the Government of Singapore informed the organization that it will remove the objections to 22 of the 27 accredited civil society representatives whom they had previously said would be barred from participating in the annual meetings. "We are notifying those persons of their change in status," the World Bank said.

The World Bank said it would continue to urge the Government of Singapore to allow "all accredited individuals be permitted to participate," because "open dialogue with civil society is important for the effective operation of our institutions." –Michael M. Phillips

September 15, 2006, 11:31 am Gee, Thanks

For a moment, imagine that you are state Sen. Joy Padgett of Ohio. You're 59 years old and you've been kicking around local politics for years, paying your dues in both the state House and Senate. After all this time you've finally got a shot at the big-time, the local congressman has retired and endorsed you for the job.

Unfortunately, that congressman is Bob Ney, a six-term member who was forced to resign earlier this year over his shady dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff. And on Thursday, the day you win a special primary, beating four other candidates for the chance to take on Democratic lawyer Zack Space to win Ney's seat in November, lawyers close to his case begin leaking word that he will plead guilty to federal criminal conspiracy charges Friday. Plus, he's now in rehab.

Do you:

a.) Curse, letting loose such a long string of expletives that even your 20-something campaign staffers look on in awe

b.) Call state party leaders to complain Ney's trying to torpedo your campaign

c.) Put on a brave face, telling reporters you have no need to distance yourself from the Ney scandal since voters in the district know and trust you

d.) All of the above

Washington Wire is betting Padgett goes with option "c," although it would be hard to blame her for choosing "d" instead.

The AP, which caught up with Padgett this morning in Columbus, reports that she wouldn't comment on the Ney case but says she doesn't worry about distancing herself from the former congressman. "I don't think I have to do that at all. There was an attempt in 2004 to try to Velcro me to (Republican Gov.) Bob Taft, and that didn't work," she said. –Amy Schatz

September 15, 2006, 11:22 am Bush Approval Rating Rebounds

President Bush's job-approval rating rebounded in the latest Harris Interactive poll, rising to 38% from 34% in August. The poll numbers come in the wake of a Wall Street Journal/NBC News Poll that also showed a modest gain, following a series of speeches by President Bush on the Iraq war.

Still, less than one-third of those polled believe the country is going in the right direction–but that's up from last month's 26%. The Harris Interactive poll surveyed 1,004 U.S. adults by telephone from Sept. 8 to Sept. 11.

Capitol Hill figures of both parties, as well as cabinet officials, continued to draw low marks. The top issues on Americans' minds? Iraq–though down slightly–followed by the economy, health care and immigration.

September 15, 2006, 6:00 am The Power of Markets

Whether it's President Bush talking more about terrorism, gas prices dropping or something else, Republicans have improved their prospects of holding onto both houses of Congress in recent weeks, according to an analysis of trading in the Iowa Electronics Market by Moody's Economy.com.

As of Thursday, traders placed a 49% probability that Republicans will lose seats in the House, down from 56% a month ago. In the Senate, where only one-third of the seats are up for grabs, traders see only a 16% likelihood that Republicans will lose seats, down from 27% in August. The probability of Republicans holding onto their current total of 55 seats rose to 73% last night from 67% last month.

The IEM is a Web-based, real-money futures market operated for research purposes by professors at the University of Iowa. Investors can trade between $5 and $500 in a variety of futures contracts, such as whether the unemployment rate will drop or whether the Federal Reserve will raise interest rates later this month, and it opens trading on political outcomes in the months leading up to a major election. Probabilities are determined based on where traders put the price of a typical contract.

Think it doesn't have solid predictive power? Think again. On the eve of the 2004 presidential election, traders forecast President Bush would receive 50.45% of the vote to Sen. John Kerry's 49.55%. Pretty spot on. –Christopher Conkey

September 15, 2006, 12:00 am Poll Finds Support for Iran Strike

Voters talk tough on Iran's nuclear program.

In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 54% say U.S. should strike militarily if necessary to stop Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. Support reaches 62% if U.S. joins international coalition.

DOJ_NMG_0066727

Military officials warn a successful strike might only set back Iran's program, not halt it, and prompt Iranian retaliation in Iraq. But "even people who are for troop withdrawals" from Iraq back military action through a coalition, says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts Journal/NBC survey with Republican Bill McInturff.

Though Independents and Republicans would back unilateral strike, Democrats are opposed.

Democratic leaders remain elusive foils for Republican barbs.

Seven in 10 voters don't know top Senate Democrat Reid or have no strong feelings about him; six in 10 say the same of House leader Pelosi, who Republican strategists call out of touch with mainstream. House Speaker Hastert is similarly anonymous.

Senate Majority Leader and 2008 hopeful Frist has better name recognition but split ratings, 21% positive and 23% negative. Voters cite deficit and Iraq policy as biggest fears if Republicans keep control of Congress, gridlock and premature Iraq withdrawal if Democrats take over.

Voters want Wal-Mart to face tougher government oversight.

After criticism from unions and liberal activists, 52% say companies like Wal-Mart "should be reviewed and regulated more" over adequacy of health and pension benefits. That includes majorities of women, Southerners, and rural voters; even 41% of conservatives agree.

By 50% to 45%, voters earning more than $75,000 a year say companies should set their own standards. The Midwest is most sympathetic to that view. Two-thirds of all voters say they've patronized the retailer in the last month.

Overall, Wal-Mart is rated positively by 45%-31%, though Target enjoys stronger image at 51%-10%.

DEMOCRATIC COMRADES: Kerry taps list of three million donors to boost fellow veteran-politicians. An email appeal yields more than $200,000 in 72 hours for Congressional candidates in New York, Pennsylvania and California. By 77%-17%, voters who backed Kerry two years ago favor reducing troops in Iraq.

DIPLOMAT IN CHIEF? Bush and Rice visit U.N. next week to prod allies for sanctions on Iran. Some 31% of voters rate Bush highly as "a world leader," down from 36% a year ago and 49% before the Iraq war.

TAX TACTIC: Republicans weigh new gambit for cutting estate taxes. They might add measure to government funding resolution before leaving Washington for October campaigning. Among voters earning $30,000 or less, just one-third approve Bush's handling of the economy and back Republicans for Congress.

NOT COMPLAINING: Despite controversy over imprisonment and interrogation of detainees, 54% of voters credit Bush administration with "the right course," while only 34% say administration has "gone too far." But by 51%-41%, voters oppose terror trials where suspects couldn't attend or view evidence.

Voters fault corporations, more than Washington, for widening income inequality.

Three in ten blame "excessive salaries and bonuses" for gap between highest-income workers and others. Another 26% say overseas competition, twice the 12% who cite Bush administration and Congress.

Tracking Democratic rhetoric, voters show increasing concern about the gap; one in four call it America's biggest economic problem, virtually matching the share who say energy costs. In international economic speech, Treasury Secretary Paulson says narrowing disparities is "the responsibility of all nations."

By 47%-36%, voters rate Bush poorly for "being compassionate enough to understand average people."

MINOR MEMOS: State whips Pentagon in battle of bureaucratic chiefs; Rice's positive rating rises to 55% from 48% in May 2004, while Rumsfeld's falls to 31% from 39%. Cheney's 50% negative rating exceeds that of both administration colleagues. – John Harwood

September 14, 2006, 7:29 pm Ballot Battle in Pennsylvania

Pennsylvania's Green Party candidate for Senate can't appear on the Nov. 7 ballot unless he can prove to a state court that nearly 3,000 signatures on his nominating petitions are indeed valid.

That's a big issue for Democrats, who worry that Carl Romanelli could siphon crucial votes from their candidate, Bob Casey Jr., who's locked in a tight race with Rick Santorum, the Republican incumbent. "We feel very strongly that [Romanelli's] candidacy will take away votes from Bob Casey and we're hopeful the court agrees with us," said Pennsylvania Democratic Party spokesman Abe Amoros.

Democrats filed suit challenging signatures on Romanelli's petition for listing on the ballot. A month-long review found some 30,000 invalid signatures — ones that are faked, illegible, or aren't those of registered voters — leaving him about 3,000 signatures short of the 67,070 needed. Romanelli lawyer Lawrence M. Otter argues that some of the signatures were incorrectly labeled invalid.

Pennsylvania Democrats accuse Santorum and the Republicans of helping Romanelli's climb to the ballot by financing the candidate's signature campaign and helping in the petition drive.

The Romanelli camp has until his scheduled Sept. 25 court date to rehab the 3,000 mislabeled signatures.

In the meantime, Romanelli's not showing concern. "I am confident I will remain on the ballot — definitely," he said. – Erika Lovley

September 14, 2006, 6:07 pm Dueling Letters Over Judicial Appointee

Trying to revive the nomination of one of President Bush's most controversial judicial appointments, a group of 18 retired military officers sent a letter to top Senate Judiciary Committee members in support of Williams J. Haynes II.

Yesterday's letter sought to debunk a July letter signed by 19 retired military officers that expressed "deep concern" with Haynes' nomination. Haynes, general counsel to the Defense Department, was first nominated to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in 2003, but his nomination has stalled over apprehension about his involvement in crafting legal policies toward detainees in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

According to the July letter, "Mr. Haynes was arguably in the strongest position of any other senior government official to sound the alarm about the likely consequences for military personnel of the views being put forward by the Justice Department" offering legal cover for the use torture during interrogations. Haynes also helped craft the military commission system the Supreme Court struck down in June for departing from the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Yesterday's letter said the July letter created a "highly misleading impression of Jim Haynes" by "asserting that Jim ignored the advice of Judge Advocates with respect to the policy on interrogation of detainees." This morning, the Senate Judiciary Committee was scheduled to discuss Mr. Haynes and four other appeals court candidates President Bush re-nominated earlier this month. The committee could not reach a quorum. – Ben Winograd

September 14, 2006, 5:58 pm FCC's Martin Says AT&T-BellSouth Review on Track

A federal judge's ongoing review of two telecom deals won't slow the government's review of AT&T's pending $67 billion deal to acquire BellSouth Corp., Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin said Thursday.

In a conference call with UBS investors and analysts, Martin was asked about whether a federal judge's antitrust review might delay the government's review of AT&T's current acquisition. The court review focuses on the Justice Department's approval of the SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp. deal as well as Verizon Communication Inc.'s purchase of MCI Inc.

Noting the FCC hopes to complete its review of the BellSouth deal by mid or late October, Mr. Martin said the court review wasn't a problem. "It doesn't really have an impact from our agency's standpoint," he said. "There's not a deadline for us other than a self-imposed" 180-day clock. — Amy Schatz

The Republican National Committee issued a call to arms, part of its much-admired get-out-the-vote effort. The RNC's "September Sprint to Victory" asks supporters to hold house parties, set up a home-based phone bank and go door-to-door in their neighborhoods in support of local Republican candidates.

Acknowledging that most people have lives to lead and aren't going to put them on hold for political races, Republicans are offering supporters three ways to help (beyond the obvious option of giving $$). There is Turnout Tuesday, in which you can invite a few friends over and turn your house into a mini-call center, using your cellphones; House Party Thursdays, where absentee ballots can be distributed or local candidates invited to speak; or Super Saturday on Sept. 30, which features a walk around the 'hood to spread the word before "invit(ing) folks back home to watch the big game."

Not clear what game that is, although it's a safe bet it's on a campus and involves a football. The volunteer who makes "the biggest impact" during the drive–including volunteers recruited, new voters registered, etc. – will "receive a special surprise gift autographed by President Bush ," (RNC's emphasis).

A spokeswoman said the campaign was an "invaluable part of our broader effort to contact millions of voters in the coming days." She declined to provide any hints about the special prize (although we note the RNC loves handing out autographed photos). –Amy Schatz

September 14, 2006, 4:04 pm Bayh Calls for Meeting of the Minds

It's been months since President Bush first planned to meet with the CEOs of Detroit's Big 3 auto makers—a meeting now postponed until after the November elections. The White House has taken flak from Michiganders about the perceived snub, but today it got a missile lobbed from a neighboring state. Sen. Evan Bayh (D., Ind.), a potential presidential candidate in 2008, wrote Bush that "a sense of urgency is required" in addressing the issues that the domestic auto industry faces.

"Our working men and women deserve leadership and results," he wrote in the letter. "They cannot afford to wait." –- Laura Meckler

September 14, 2006, 2:38 pm Agency Unveils Car-Safety Rules

The Bush administration says proposed rules on electronic stability control systems for all new passenger vehicles would save between 5,300 and 10,300 lives annually and prevent between 168,000 and 252,000 injuries.

Electronic stability control, already available on some vehicles, helps keep cars from veering out of control and tipping over. The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration proposal would require manufacturers to begin installing the technology on SUVs, minivans and pickup trucks under 10,000 pounds, beginning with the 2009 fleet and have it on all such vehicles by model year 2012. The agency figures it will add $111 to the cost of vehicles that already have antilock brake systems, which are needed for stability control to work. –Laura Meckler

September 14, 2006, 2:21 pm Seeing Red in Pennsylvania

Recently, it seemed like Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum was gaining some momentum in his effort to hold his seat from challenger Bob Casey Jr., the Democratic state treasurer. Warm and fuzzy television ads that played all over the state this summer (see "Polka" and "Hoedown") were widely credited with reintroducing the conservative Republican in a good way to the state — and erasing the scary double-digit lead Casey had built-up. When the two debated for an hour on NBC's Meet the Press, many political observers dubbed the Sept. 3 match a draw.

Santorum

Which brings us to a negative television ad the senator's campaign launched yesterday, dubbed "Corner Bar." It suggests Casey's political team contains a bunch of unethical hacks who are halfway to landing in a jail cell, if they aren't there already. It will be interesting to see what–if any–impact this has on the race, particularly given that one of the allegedly shady characters on Team Casey has apparently been dead for almost two years. –Amy Schatz

September 14, 2006, 2:02 pm Michele Davis Tapped for Treasury Post

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has picked Michele A. Davis for the top public affairs position in the department, a role she filled during the tumultuous tenure of President Bush's first Treasury secretary, Paul O'Neill. Bush is expected to announce his intent to nominate her for the assistant secretary's post this afternoon. The position requires Senate confirmation.

While it's a job title she's held before, Davis is expected to play an expanded role, serving as a senior strategist for Paulson on policy as well as communications matters. Davis has been serving as deputy national security advisor at the White House's National Security Council. After leaving Treasury the first time, Davis served as senior vice president of regulatory policy at mortgage giant Fannie Mae. She also served as communications director for former House Majority Leader Richard Armey, (R., Texas).

Davis is one of several hires Paulson has made since taken over at Treasury earlier this year. –Deborah Solomon

September 14, 2006, 12:05 pm Lobbying Group Presses for FDA Money

The FDA Alliance, a new lobbying group that includes a number of former Food and Drug Administration officials, launched its effort to press Congress to increase federal funding for the agency. The group, which has been quietly discussing its plans with FDA-watchers for months, is backed by patient groups, trade associations and drug companies, among others.

The biotech industry is also expected to lobby strongly for more appropriations for FDA. The agency, saying it needs more money to fund important initiatives including drug-safety programs, has been seeking higher user-fee payments from drug companies. –Anna Wilde Mathews

September 14, 2006, 11:59 am Paulson: Fodder for Bloggers

In a blog post on RGEmonitor.com, Brad Setser praises parts of Wednesday's speech by the new Treasury secretary, but pokes a couple of holes.

Paulson

"It was rather surprising that Paulson's speech didn't explicitly allude to any risks from the rising financial imbalances that have been associated with the current form of globalization. After all there is no intrinsic reason why globalization implies that emerging economies should be financing the world's advanced economies," he says. "I was a bit concerned that Paulson may be putting a bit too much emphasis on domestic capital market reform and opening up China's domestic banking markets to foreign competition and too little emphasis on currency reform…..(L)etting US financial institutions operate Chinese banks won't do much (if anything) to address the concerns of American auto parts workers. …

"Above all, though, I was struck by the irony of the United States – and particularly the Bush Administration – emphasizing how important it is that all countries like up to their international responsibilities…. Wasn't the Bush Administration elected, in part, to make sure that the United States own policies – including its economic policies — weren't subject to any global tests?"

And Brad Delong, the Berkeley blogger who did a stint at the Clinton Treasury, writes that Paulson "appears to have decided to be Secretary of the U.S.-China Relationship. It's an honorable job, and one well worth his considerable talents." Why this approach? "Given the White House he has to deal with, he can do nothing to undo the disastrous fiscal policies of the Bush administration," DeLong suggests. "Given the White House he has to deal with, he can do nothing to bring the resources devoted to entitlement programs into long-run balance with the spending plans of the programs."

At billsdue, a blog that focuses on the improbable combination of China and video games, comes this nugget: "He was definitely trying to speak in language the Chinese government understands, and even cribbed a phrase almost directly from the latest Hu-Wen economic stump speech: China needs a more harmonious, more balanced pattern of growth that gives Chinese households more income and the confidence to spend it."

The blog maintained by the National Association of Manufacturers – whose chief, John Engler, attended the speech, was full of praise: "a clear appreciation of the place and of the nuances of the global trading system." Foreign Policy magazine's blog boiled 4,000 words of rhetoric into a single sentence: "Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson to China: We want you to succeed." – David Wessel

September 14, 2006, 11:21 am Remembering Ann Richards

Richards It's slightly too early in the day for the Washington Wire to imbibe, but we're raising a margarita tonight (frozen, no salt), in honor of Ann Richards, a true giant of Texas politics and one of the wittiest pols in the business, Democrat or Republican. President Bush, who ended her political career by defeating her in the 1994 governor's race and became her verbal pincushion, had nice words to say.

The 73-year-old former governor died yesterday from esophageal cancer, and the Texas statehouse political reporters paid homage today in Dallas, Austin and Houston.

Here's a sampling of the governor's greatest lines, beyond her classic: "Ginger Rogers did everything that Fred Astaire did. She just did it backwards and in high heels."

"I thought I knew Texas pretty well, but I had no notion of its size until I campaigned it."

"I have always had the feeling I could do anything and my dad told me I could. I was in college before I found out he might be wrong."

"Poor George [H.W. Bush], he can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth."

"There is a lot more to life than just struggling to make money."

"I did not want my tombstone to read, 'She kept a really clean house.' I think I'd like them to remember me by saying, 'She opened government to everyone.'"

September 14, 2006, 6:00 am 54 Days Left to Go

Seven-term Republican congressman Jack Kingston's Georgia seat doesn't exactly appear to be in jeopardy. Running against Democrat Rev. Jim Nelson, a United Methodist pastor and author ("Where Would Jesus Put the Sidewalks? A Study Of Faith and Politics"), political prognosticators suggest Kingston needn't give up his Washington digs.

Never hurts to reward the faithful, however, which is why Kingston's campaign committee sent out a desktop flip calendar this summer so supporters could track the last 100 days until Election Day—from Sunday, July 30 to Tuesday, Nov. 7.

Dubbed "100 Reasons to Vote Republican," the calendar is liberally sprinkled with quotes from prominent conservatives, including Rush Limbaugh and President Reagan (Aug. 11: "It has been said that politics is the second oldest profession. I have learned that it bears a striking resemblance to the first." Sept. 21: "The trouble with our liberal friends is not that they're ignorant: It's just that they know so much that isn't so."). It's peppered, too, with quotes from those on the other end of the spectrum, including Dixie Chick Natalie Maines (Sept. 14: "The entire country may disagree with me, but I don't understand the necessity for patriotism.").

The calendar has 200 pages, but the ones after Nov. 7 are blank. Unfortunately, the Friends of Jack Kingston apparently couldn't fill all 200 of them with reasons to vote Republican.

"It's for notes," explained Rob Asbell, a Kingston spokesman, who said this is the second campaign in which the congressman has sent out the calendar/notepad to supporters. — Amy Schatz

Presidential Hopefuls Do A Delicate Dance With Lamont (and Vice Versa) (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Jennifer Medina

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — For a road map to the 2008 Democratic presidential primaries, check out Ned Lamont's phone log.

Soon after winning the Democratic Senate primary in Connecticut last month, Mr. Lamont heard from almost the entire Democratic field — a group he refers to, with some amusement, as his "new friends."

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York rushed to donate the maximum amount to his campaign, and is planning a fund-raiser for him in early October. John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator and vice presidential candidate, rallied with him in New Haven. Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee who may try again, e-mailed supporters soliciting money on Mr. Lamont's behalf. And Wesley K. Clark, the retired general and a 2004 also-ran, offered foreign policy advice.

"You could get a pretty good idea of who was running for president by who called," Mr. Lamont said in a recent interview.

But as the dust has settled on the contentious primary defeat of Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, whose downfall was initially seen as an ominous sign for other Democrats who supported the Iraq war, the dance between the presidential contenders and the Lamont campaign has grown more delicate.

Some of the White House hopefuls — most notably Mark R. Warner, the former governor of Virginia — are debating how strongly to align themselves with a candidate who has become an icon of the liberal left. And the Lamont team, despite its initial thrill over the rush of attention, is wary of being exploited or of alienating local voters with too many national political stars.

"We're not going to be a launching pad for the 2008 candidates," said Tom Swan, Mr. Lamont's campaign manager. "Ned is still the Washington outsider. We're not going to have everyone and her sister take a piece of that."

As the general election rematch between Mr. Lamont and Mr. Lieberman — who is now running as an independent — gains intensity, the race remains a litmus test for Democrats with higher aspirations. Candidates and their advisers view the Lamont campaign as a critical marker of anti-incumbency, anti-Bush fervor and the evolution of online political forces known as the Netroots.

The potential candidates are demonstrating their affection for Mr. Lamont in varying degrees, carefully calculating how their connections to the Connecticut contest could reverberate if they run at the national level.

All of this is unfolding as other Democrats, including the heads of the national campaign committees in charge of electing party members to Congress, are largely leaving the Connecticut race to sort itself out. Given Mr. Lieberman's promise to continue caucusing with the Democrats, the outcome will hardly tip the balance of power in the Senate, so party leaders are focusing on more competitive seats being fought for by Republicans (in Connecticut, the Republican candidate, Alan Schlesinger, is stuck in single digits in the polls). As a result, it is the fledgling 2008 field that is mostly driving outside official support for Mr. Lamont.

The relationships may ultimately benefit the national candidates more than the supposed beneficiary. Mr. Lamont's campaign will rise or fall on his popularity among Connecticut voters. The generosity of national Democrats stems mainly from a desire to placate the liberal national forces that elevated his profile during the contentious primary and will play a pivotal role in the presidential selection process starting next fall.

So far, the contest for Mr. Lamont's affections has been waged mainly among the contenders trying to burnish their credentials with the liberal wing: Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Kerry and Mr. Edwards, all three of whom voted in support of the war in Iraq but have since become critical of it, have all claimed to have been in front of the Lamont wave. Mr. Clark was among the earliest to demand that Mr. Lieberman withdraw from the race.

Senator Russ Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat who is considering running for president on his opposition to the war, called Mr. Lamont immediately after the primary and "offered to help out in any way possible," a spokesman said.

"They're sending a message to the Netroots right now — who are some of the most active Democrats — that they are serious players, that they would like some early attention themselves in their presidential races," said Donna L. Brazile, a Democratic Party strategist.

Showing devotion to Mr. Lamont, agreed David Axelrod, another Democratic strategist, is "really important because there's an activist wing within the Democratic Party that helped elect Lamont" and expect the next class of presidential hopefuls to pay tribute.

"The '08 candidates are worried about the Netroots, it's that simple," said a senior Democratic lawmaker, who was granted anonymity in order to talk freely about the race. That constituency, the lawmaker said, has "far more effect in a primary than in a general" election.

Public polls taken since the primary have consistently shown Mr. Lieberman in the lead, though the latest, taken Sept. 15 to 19 by American Research Group, has him up by only 47 percent to 45 percent, within the margin of error.

At least one candidate, Mr. Warner — who made his fortune in technology and is courting the blogosphere in other ways — has largely avoided Mr. Lamont, instead lending his name and fund-raising capabilities to races that are genuinely in play and have longer-term strategic value for the Democratic Party, like Representative Harold Ford Jr.'s bid for the Senate in Tennessee. But even Mr. Warner is covering his bases; his political action committee gave $5,000, the maximum allowed, to Mr. Lamont, as did those with Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Kerry and Mr. Edwards.

Advisers to Mr. Lamont say they appreciate the assistance they have received, but intend to choose their advocates strategically. "To the extent that we can bring people in to show their expertise and the like, we will," said George Jepsen, Mr. Lamont's campaign chairman and a former Connecticut state party chairman. "But we do not want to just have a parade of celebrities."

Still, the Lamont campaign resists suggestions that the flood of attention has subsided since the flush after the primary, insisting that Mr. Lamont has spoken to several of the candidates recently and has been told that they are still willing to do whatever he asks.

At a breakfast with reporters in Washington this month, Mr. Lamont sounded tickled by his sudden standing among the national Democratic A-list. "I like all my new friends," he said.

Asked what kind of advantage Mrs. Clinton might gain from her association with him, Mr. Lamont replied, "I don't know."

"I mean, she's Hillary Clinton and I'm a guy who was pulling fiber optic cable at Georgetown nine months ago," he said, referring to his company, which installs cable on college campuses.

Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Lamont have not yet appeared publicly together — she invited him to her home in Chappaqua, N.Y., for a confab, but it was closed to the news media. He plans to be by her side at the fund-raiser in October in New York, but has not invited her — or any of the other 2008 hopefuls — to hit the campaign trail in Connecticut.

Despite the help he got from a few national headliners in the primary, like the Rev. Al Sharpton, many inside the campaign now think local names like Senator Christopher J. Dodd — who has presidential ambitions but also a Connecticut address — and Representative Rosa L. DeLauro of New Haven are safer and more effective alliances.

"We have to make our mind up as a campaign: Do we really want a flood of out-of-staters coming in?" Mr. Lamont said over dinner in Washington recently. "Selectively, maybe, yeah, they can burnish my credentials and talk about some different issues in a way that gives me credibility."

Democrat, Republican Talk About Faith (AP-Y)

By Kimberly Hefling

DOJ_NMG_0066734

AP, September 21, 2006

Democrat Bob Casey highlights his religious work while Republican Sen. Rick Santorum seeks out evangelical Christians, a reflection of the fierce fight for voters of faith.

Casey, who is a Catholic, has been talking openly about his religious upbringing and his work with the Jesuit Corps. He unveiled a 60-second television ad in the Philadelphia market Tuesday featuring a former student talking about Casey's mentoring from days in the corps' inner-city program.

Similar to a missionary assignment, Casey spent one year with the organization, which he described in a speech last week at Catholic University in Washington.

Religion "is something that a lot of us share, no matter what faith we are," Casey said in a recent interview.

The two-term Santorum, who also is Catholic, has been outspoken on issues consistent with the church's teachings such as opposition to abortion and same-sex marriage. He wrote a book, "It Takes a Family: Conservatism and the Common Good," in which he wrote, "Religious congregations are, by an overwhelming margin, the most important intermediate institution outside the family for the vast majority of Americans."

On Wednesday night in Pittsburgh, close to Santorum's hometown, James Dobson's Focus on the Family Action is sponsoring a "Stand for the Family" rally in support of the religious right. Santorum, who has regular meetings with a religious working group, is slated to address the conservative Family Research Council's voter summit on Saturday.

Religion has been at the forefront of the competitive Pennsylvania race pitting two somewhat similar candidates — both Catholic, both opposed to abortion. It reflects a change from recent elections when many Democrats tended to avoid talking about their faith and essentially conceded religious voters to Republicans. It also highlights a new willingness by Democrats to discuss religion in personal terms.

On Monday, Democratic Sen. John Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, delivered a speech in California in which he talked of "godly tasks" and described his own journey of faith.

In a recent ad in the Tennessee Senate race, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr., seated in a church, tells voters, "I started church the old-fashioned way. I was forced to and I'm better for it."

This spring, Santorum addressed via video a get-out-the-vote training session of the Pennsylvania Pastors Network. Once Casey heard about it, he asked to speak to the group and was given a chance. He did it in person.

"To the extent that he is successful, his campaign might become a model for other Democrats in similar circumstances," said John Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life.

Casey has held a double-digit lead in polls over Santorum, the Senate's No. 3 Republican, although recent surveys have shown a tightening contest.

More than one-third of voters in Pennsylvania are Catholic. While the state has about a half million more registered Democrats than Republicans, voters tend to be socially conservative and frequently vote along cultural lines.

Santorum has enjoyed political success siphoning the support of socially conservative Democrats — many of whom once voted for Casey's father, the late Gov. Robert P. Casey. The elder Casey, a strong foe of abortion, was revered by many for standing up to the Democratic Party on the issue.

In his son, some Democrats see an opportunity to reach out to voters alienated by the party's stance on social issues.

An August poll by Muhlenberg College Institute of Public Opinion found that among Catholic voters, Casey led Santorum by seven percentage points. Among anti-abortion voters, Santorum led by 17 percentage points.

While both candidates are Catholic and abortion foes, they differ on some issues critical to religious voters. Casey supports civil unions but opposes same-sex marriage. Santorum advocated for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage; Casey said he didn't support it because it was too divisive.

Last spring, Casey addressed evangelicals on global warming at Messiah College in Grantham, Pa. His openness about his faith appealed to at least one voter.

Kimberly Tucker, 48, of Dillsburg, Pa., an evangelical Christian who home-schooled her three children, said she wished other Democrats would follow Casey's lead.

DOJ_NMG_0066735

"The Democrats really need to get comfortable with that if they want to appeal to the liberal evangelicals," Tucker said. "They need to be more open with their faith. I think if they are, evangelicals are going to come with them."

Ehrlich Wants Paper Ballots For Nov. Vote (WP)

By Christian Davenport And Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

A week after the primary election was plagued by human error and technical glitches, Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) called yesterday for the state to scrap its $106 million electronic voting apparatus and revert to a paper ballot system for the November election.

"When in doubt, go paper, go low-tech," he said.

Linda H. Lamone, the administrator of the Maryland State Board of Elections, quickly denounced the plan to swap voting systems just seven weeks before the general election as "crazy." And Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert) said it "cannot happen. It will not happen."

Ehrlich said that, if necessary, he would call a special session of the Maryland General Assembly to change the law to allow paper ballots. But Miller and House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel) dismissed the idea of a special session, saying elections officials should focus instead on fixing the current system.

"We paid millions. These are state-of-the-art machines," said Miller, who called Ehrlich's announcement a political ploy to energize his Republican supporters.

In Montgomery and Prince George's counties yesterday, election officials continued to count the thousands of paper provisional ballots that could determine the outcome of the 4th Congressional District Democratic primary race between incumbent U.S. Rep. Albert R. Wynn and challenger Donna Edwards. Prince George's officials cracked opened 26 machines yesterday and retrieved votes that had not been counted.

The problems playing out in Maryland have created unease elsewhere in the nation, where more than 80 percent of voters will use electronic voting machines in the Nov. 7 election and a third of all precincts are using them for the first time.

Ehrlich's statement came after a State Board of Public Works hearing at which Lamone said her staff would "work around the clock" to correct the problems that plagued the primary. She vowed that her office would help local election boards retrain judges, recruit new ones and force Diebold Election Systems to fix the problems that caused some of its machines to malfunction.

The idea of switching systems now worried local election officials who said testing new equipment and educating election judges and voters about a new system would be a daunting -- if not impossible -- task.

"There isn't a lot of time," said Marjorie Roher, a spokeswoman for the Montgomery Board of Elections.

Henry Fawell, a spokesman for Ehrlich, said the governor's top priority is to replace the electronic poll books, used to check in voters. But he said Ehrlich "is also interested in moving voters to a paper ballot for this year's general election."

"He realizes it's a tall order," Fawell said. But moving to paper ballots would "eliminate the chronic problems that electronic voting machines demonstrated [Sept. 12] with respect to crashing and susceptibility to tampering."

In the spring, Ehrlich advocated leasing optical scan machines that use paper ballots, a proposal that won unanimous support in the House of Delegates but was rejected by the Senate.

Many of the problems that marred this month's primary resulted from human error. Election judges in Baltimore failed to show up, meaning the polls opened late. In Montgomery, voting at nearly all 238 precincts was delayed because officials forgot to distribute plastic cards needed to operate voting machines.

In Prince George's, election officials struggled to transmit data electronically from polling places to a central office on election night, delaying the counting process for hours. In the days since, they have also discovered that dozens of memory cards were not counted after the election; some remained locked in voting machines for days.

Yesterday, county election officials began opening selected machines to locate the missing cards and capture the voting information contained on them.

Also yesterday, Gene Raynor, the Baltimore election director, resigned, saying Lamone and the General Assembly "have set dangerous precedents that, in my opinion, threaten the integrity of November's elections." Raynor previously sat on the State Board of Elections, where he had joined members in trying to oust Lamone two years ago.

There were also technical problems during the primary, mainly with the electronic poll books that were used in the state for the first time. They replaced the paper printouts of the voter registration rolls, allowing election judges to check in voters electronically.

Some crashed and needed to be rebooted, election judges reported. Others failed to transmit the name of a checked-in voter to the other machines in the same polling place. That meant, theoretically, that a voter could cast more than one ballot. Officials said they had no evidence of any voter fraud.

Lamone said the electronic poll books, purchased from Diebold in June and July, were tested in the days before the election. But those tests did not reveal any problems.

Mark Radke, a Diebold spokesman, said many of the poll books crashed because software created exclusively for Maryland caused the machines' memories to fill up after about 40 people had checked in to vote.

He said the company was investigating the synchronization problems.

But Ehrlich said he wasn't willing to risk the possibility that such glitches would remain for the November election, in which he is seeking a second term.

"I'm not sure we can afford another experiment," Ehrlich said after the Board of Public Works hearing. "I want to play it safe."

His position was supported in the hearing by Avi Rubin, a Johns Hopkins University computer scientist who worked as an elections judge during the primary and has long been critical of the touch-screen voting machines.

Gilles W. Burger, chairman of the State Board of Elections, said his panel has requested that Diebold officials appear at its meeting Tuesday.

"Their feet are going to be held to the fire," Burger said.

Maryland's election law leaves it to the State Elections Board to pick a voting system and certify its reliability and security. Mark Davis, the assistant attorney general who represents the board, said it has already performed required tests on the touch-screen machines.

"The board feels it would be catastrophic to try to do that for another system between now and the general election," he said. "It just doesn't make any sense."

Staff writer Rosalind S. Helderman contributed to this report.

The Battleground Is Joined (WSJ)

By Russ Smith

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Maryland has never been much considered, since the term was coined, a "battleground state." Registered Democrats outnumber Republicans by a two-to-one margin, and reliably voted for John Kerry (by 13 percentage points) in 2004 and Al Gore (by 17 percentage points) in 2000. Both Maryland senators are Democrats, as well as six of its eight-member House delegation. Yet the run-up to the Sept. 12 primary was the most frenzied political blitz in recent state history. Improbably, Maryland has emerged as one of the most contested states in the country, featuring very competitive gubernatorial and Senate elections. All this is more improbable still in a year not expected to bring much November cheer to the GOP.

Maryland does have a Republican governor, Robert Ehrlich, who was elected in 2002 (the first member of his party since 1966), but that was widely attributed to the inept campaign of his opponent, Kathleen Kennedy Townsend. Not surprisingly, Mr. Ehrlich has since been stifled by the Democratic legislature and unremitting criticism from the Baltimore Sun and the Washington Post; and he is now facing Baltimore's popular mayor, Martin O'Malley. The two men dislike each other personally, and as the governor told an AARP audience on Sept. 14, they "agree on nothing," accusing the mayor of being a "pseudo populist" who would govern through "speeches" and "euphemism." Mr. O'Malley replied in kind.

The match is increasingly nasty, loaded with hyperbole on both sides and expected to be the most expensive in state history. The governor is called the "$20-million man" by Democrats, and Mr. O'Malley, for his part, will be the beneficiary of fundraising appearances by Hillary and Bill Clinton.

Mr. O'Malley's television advertising attacks Mr. Ehrlich's record on education, opposition to a minimum wage hike, the environment and, echoing the national Democratic theme, pictures the incumbent clasping raised hands with George Bush at a past rally. It's not subtle, but it undoubtedly pleases Mr. O'Malley's firm base -- which may prove his Achilles' heel. His past gaffes -- he said he was "more worried about the actions and inactions of the Bush administration" than al Qaeda, at a Baltimore rally for John Kerry in July 2004 -- have demonstrated that he sometimes speaks without thinking about political repercussions.

If Mr. Ehrlich wins re-election, his profile would rise considerably; and he could make an attractive running mate for the Republican presidential nominee in two years. But the Maryland race with the more acute national resonance is for the Senate seat vacated by the retiring Democrat Paul Sarbanes, with attention focused on current Lt. Gov. Michael Steele. Not only is the national Republican majority threatened, but should Mr. Steele win the seat -- he's currently several points behind in the polling -- he'd be the first African-American senator from Maryland, and only the sixth in Senate history. That possibility sticks in the collective craw of local Democrats, who don't like Mr. Steele's cultural conservatism, for one, and are petrified, for two, that the next Barack Obama could be a Republican.

In the primary, Democratic voters did have the opportunity to nominate their own black candidate, Kweisi Mfume, a charismatic former congressman and NAACP president, but chose instead U.S. Rep. Ben Cardin by a close margin. Mr. Cardin, a 20-year House veteran whose studious demeanor resembles that of Mr. Sarbanes, was backed by the Democratic establishment, as well as the Post and the Sun, an "anointment" that caused no small resentment among Mr. Mfume's impassioned supporters. Had Mr. Mfume prevailed and faced off against Mr. Steele, it would've guaranteed a history-making precedent.

In any case, although Mr. Cardin's camp scoffs at the notion, Mr. Steele has the potential to capture a sizable percentage of Maryland's black voters, many of whom feel taken for granted by the Democrats. The lieutenant governor, raised by his mother in a dangerous Washington neighborhood and a graduate of Johns Hopkins, appeals to church-going citizens who share his opposition to abortion and gay marriage, if not necessarily his erstwhile support for George Bush's foreign policy.

Maryland's latent racial politics have made for some curious political bedfellows. Mr. Mfume, muddying the waters, has endorsed Mr. Cardin, but hasn't yet made any commitment to campaign vigorously on his behalf. Also, Mr. Mfume told reporters that "Mike Steele's a great guy," even though their political platforms are polar opposites. In late August, Mr. Steele was feted at a fundraiser hosted by hip-hop impresario Russell Simmons, who almost always reserves his endorsements for Democrats. Mr. Steele's emphasis on black empowerment and entrepreneurship, evidently, cuts across political lines.

Mr. Cardin -- whose campaign war-chest was fairly depleted by his primary race -- has not begun a general election television campaign, but Mr. Steele has. Given today's political climate, he's distancing himself from Mr. Bush and even the Republican Party, presenting his candidacy as that of an "outsider" who'll clean up corruption in Washington. His already ubiquitous advertisement (somewhat hokey, but Republicans do have to be inventive this year), begins with Mr. Steele saying, "Soon your TV will be jammed with negative ads from the Washington crowds. Grainy pictures and spooky music saying Steele hates puppies and worse. For the record, I love puppies." Seriously.

The commentariat has given the unconventional campaign mixed reviews. But even the fact that it is such a live topic of discussion reinforces the fact that the race is anyone's game, especially with the uncertain African-American vote, 29% of the population. While the prevailing wisdom seems to be that Mr. Cardin will hold the seat for the Democrats, Mr. Steele has a clear shot. The Democrats are -- and ought to be -- very nervous.

Still, although both Mr. Steele and Mr. Ehrlich trail in current polls by single digits, one indication of the volatility is that I can't find a single friend who will accept a small wager that both Republicans will emerge victorious.

Texas Candidate Accused Of Racist Crack (AP-Y)

By Kelley Shannon

AP, September 21, 2006

Gubernatorial candidate and professional wiseacre Kinky Friedman was accused Wednesday of making another racially offensive remark — this time in a year-old interview in which he said sexual predators should be thrown in prison and forced to "listen to a Negro talking to himself."

The independent candidate already was under fire for referring to Hurricane Katrina evacuees in Texas "crackheads and thugs." Some black politicians from Houston took that remark as a slap at black victims of the storm.

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram and the Houston Chronicle have reported on an interview with Friedman that aired on CNBC last year in which the country singer and comedian was asked what to do with sexual predators.

"Throw them in prison and throw away the key and make them listen to a Negro talking to himself," Friedman said. He also called "Negro" a "charming word."

State Rep. Garnet Coleman, former chairman of the Texas Legislative Black Caucus, said the remarks are unacceptable from a candidate for governor, and sound more like something uttered by someone running for "class clown or the grand wizard of the Ku Klux Klan."

Friedman's spokeswoman, Laura Stromberg, said Wednesday: "Texans who know anything about Kinky know that he's not a racist, and they're going to see through all of this political correctness very soon. This is what they've got? Bring it on. Texans can see right through."

Democratic candidate Chris Bell said he was offended by Friedman's remark, and added, "I just don't think those types of comments have a place in this campaign."

Mark Sanders, a spokesman for independent candidate Carole Keeton Strayhorn, said such "divisive language has no place in this campaign. Carole's campaign is about uniting people to get things done, not about dividing people."

Republican Gov. Rick Perry's campaign declined to comment.

Friedman was traveling to New York for a fundraiser Wednesday and was not available for comment. He told the Star-Telegram on Tuesday that anyone who is offended by his comment should vote for one of the other candidates.

"If I've got to lie to people, sweep the truth under the rug and worry about offending people, I'm not going to be very effective," Friedman said.

His spokeswoman said part of the "Negro" line was derived from a book Friedman wrote in the late 1980s that was being discussed in the CNBC interview before Friedman used the phrase.

"The United Negro College Fund doesn't have a problem with the word Negro," Stromberg said, adding that Friedman does not use the word in everyday conversation.

Friedman also took some heat recently for a remark about ethnic politicking.

"I don't eat tamales in the barrio, I don't eat fried chicken in the ghetto, I don't eat bagels with the Jews for breakfast," said Friedman, who is Jewish. "That to me is true racism."

Bills Toughen Restrictions On Sex Offenders (LAT)

By Jenifer Warren

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

Sacramento, Calif. — Calling public safety government's most important job, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Wednesday signed a package of bills increasing prison terms for many sex offenders and barring them from loitering near schools and parks upon release.

The measures, signed seven weeks before voters will decide on a ballot initiative offering similar provisions, also require that sex offenders deemed high risk by authorities wear electronic tracking devices while on parole.

Backers said the laws give California the nation's toughest restrictions on sex offenders, a category of felons facing an expanding national crackdown.

Schwarzenegger, flanked at a Capitol signing ceremony by a bipartisan group of legislators and police, said the bills would "help us fight sexual predators and make our state a safer place to live and raise our families."

The broadest measure, by Sen. Elaine Alquist, D-Santa Clara, would increase the penalty for child rape to 25 years to life in prison; allow possession of child pornography to be charged as a felony; extend prison sentences for Internet luring; and lengthen parole terms for violent ex-felons to 10 years.

Other bills would require registered sex offenders to disclose their registration status when applying for certain jobs and create an oversight Sex Offender Management Board.

Analysts say the legislation would cost the state more than $200 million annually, largely by expanding the prison population and requiring more parole agents to monitor ex-offenders for longer periods of time.

The Alquist billwas put forth by Democrats after Republicans failed to win passage of their version. Frustrated, two GOP legislators launched a bid to qualify their version for the November ballot, resulting in Proposition 83, dubbed "Jessica's Law" by proponents.

The initiative differs from the bills in two major respects, involving electronic tracking of ex-offenders and limits on where they may live. Under Proposition 83, all registered sex offenders would be required to undergo electronic monitoring for life, regardless of their offense or the likelihood they would re-offend. Under SB 1178 by Sen. Jackie Speier, D-Hillsborough, signed by the governor, high-risk former felons would be tracked with electronic devices while on parole.

The ballot measure also prohibits ex-offenders from living within 2,000 feet of schools or parks, or additional locations identified by local governments. The legislation bans loitering around schools, parks or other locations where vulnerable populations congregate but does not limit where ex-offenders may live.

Some experts say the new laws make Proposition 83 unnecessary because it mirrors many of the tougher-sentencing aspects of the legislation. Critics also argue that the loitering ban contained in legislation would be more effective than simply limiting where ex-offenders may live.

"The bills the governor is signing give California virtually every positive thing that could come out of Jessica's Law," said Robert Coombs of the California Coalition Against Sexual Assault, a statewide network of rape crisis centers. "These bills do not take sex crime lightly, but they do the job in a more thoughtful way than Jessica's Law."

Schwarzenegger, however, said the state still needs Proposition 83, and Sen. Chuck Poochigian, R-Fresno, a co-author of one bill signed by the governor, agreed. Poochigian said the ballot measure is tougher in one respect, allowing designation of an offender as a sexually violent predator after just one victim rather than two.

While cracking down on sex offenders has become a national trend, a federal study showed a 79 percent decline in sexual assaults against children ages 12 to 17 between 1993 and 2003.

The number of arrests for sex crimes against kids in California also has declined during this decade, despite population growth of 6 percent, state statistics show.

Obama Urges Challenge To Bush Policy (AP-Y)

By Will Lester

AP, September 21, 2006

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama on Wednesday called the view that President Bush has been perfect in fighting terrorism an illusion and urged Democrats to challenge the Bush administration's policies.

"On the terrorism front, I'm happy to have that debate," the first-term Illinois senator said following a speech on energy at Georgetown University. "The notion that the president has led a flawless policy on terrorism is an illusion."

Obama, mentioned as a possible 2008 presidential candidate, said the nation is involved in "a war in Iraq that has vastly expanded the number of terrorist recruits, a deteriorating situation in Afghanistan and Osama bin Laden has not been caught. We should not shy away from that debate."

Democrats have opposed Bush administration anti-terrorist measures such as the warrantless wiretapping program and proposals to allow aggressive interrogation of prisoners.

Obama questioned why the terrorism debate should become more intense around elections.

DOJ_NMG_0066740

In this politically charged atmosphere, Republicans and Democrats have clashed over Bush's Iraq war policy and his efforts to combat terrorism. Republicans have argued Democrats are weak on defense, seeking to exploit their advantage with voters on the issue.

Several GOP lawmakers and members of Bush's Cabinet have suggested Democrats are aiding the terrorists and behaving like Nazi appeasers.

Democrats have countered that the rhetoric smacks of the McCarthyism of the 1950s.

"But we don't always pick our fights, especially when the president has the bully pulpit," he said.

His talk was sponsored by the liberal political group Moveon.org.

Tracy Schmitt, spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, responding to Obama's comments, argued that his Democratic Party's "opposition to the tools imperative to the war on terror illustrates a startling lack of understanding about how to keep America safe."

Stem Cells Appear To Undo Some Heart-Attack Damage, Study Says (LAT)

By Karen Kaplan And Alan Zarembo

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

Using stem cells harvested from patients' own bone marrow, researchers reported Wednesday that they improved cardiac function in heart attack patients months, years -- and even decades -- after the patients suffered their attacks.

The infusion of stem cells boosted cardiac pumping efficiency by 7 percent in three months -- a modest gain, but still a significant improvement for a chronic condition.

In one case, a patient who had suffered a heart attack 30 years earlier showed an 11 percent improvement after the treatment, according to the study published in the New England Journal of Medicine.

The German researchers also found tentative signs that patients can continue to improve with repeated stem-cell treatments.

"We have always thought that a heart attack is permanent damage, but now there is the potential that this damage can be repaired," said Dr. Christopher Cannon, a cardiologist at Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston who was not involved in the research.

While the researchers are uncertain why the therapy works, the findings are a sign that the long-touted regenerative powers of stem cells may be moving from the laboratory into the realm of viable human therapies.

Some researchers cautioned that it was too soon to say that the results could be translated into routine treatment.

"There are a number of therapies that have gotten to this step, but when subjected to more rigorous trials have not worked," said Dr. Gregg Fonarow, a professor of cardiovascular medicine at the University of California, Los Angeles. "This is a therapy that may or may not pan out."

Dr. Andreas Zeiher, chair of the department of medicine at Johann Wolfgang Goethe University in Frankfurt, Germany, and senior author of the study, said the preliminary results pointed to potential new strategies for treating chronic heart disease -- a condition for which there is currently no cure.

Stem cells present one of the most tantalizing mysteries in medicine. Embryonic stem cells are capable of generating any type of tissue in the body, but scientists haven't learned the biochemical means to transform them.

The current study focused on adult stem cells, of which there are many types, each focused on regenerating a specific group of tissues to help the body repair normal wear and tear.

Stem cells from bone marrow have been used for decades to regenerate blood and immune cells in cancer patients. Laboratory experiments suggest that these cells -- or others found in bone marrow -- can also make heart muscle, blood vessels, nerve cells and other tissues.

Because the stem cells can be collected from the same patients they will be used to treat, they avoid problems of tissue rejection.

Heart disease has been one of the primary targets of stem-cell research.

DOJ_NMG_0066741

About 1.2 million heart attacks occur in the United States per year, leading to nearly 500,000 deaths, according to the American Heart Association.

The German researchers recruited 75 patients who had suffered heart attacks at least three months -- and as long as 30 years -- earlier.

The patients already were receiving state-of-the-art drug treatments for their heart disease, including beta blockers and cholesterol-lowering statins.

The researchers extracted 50 milliliters of bone marrow from each patient's hip. They isolated a soup of cells that included the stem cells and infused it into patients within hours after the extraction.

The researchers divided the patients into three groups. One received the bone marrow stem cells, and another was treated with different stem cells derived from their own blood. A third group served as a control.

Three months later, the researchers tested the patients' left ventricular ejection fraction, a measure of how much oxygenated blood is pumped into the circulatory system. In healthy people, it ranges from 57 percent to 75 percent.

The patients in the study started out with ejection fractions ranging from 29 percent to 56 percent.

Those treated with bone marrow stem cells saw their heart-pumping efficiency increase over three months by an average of 2.9 percentage points -- a 7 percent improvement.

Over the same period, patients in the control group saw their pumping efficiency decline by an average of about 3 percent while those treated with blood stem cells dropped about 1 percent.

To confirm their findings, the researchers swapped the treatments and gave patients in the control group either blood or bone marrow stem cells. Again, the patients who got bone marrow cells saw an increase in their pumping efficiency.

Fonarow of UCLA said the improvement was similar to the effect of statins, which boost pumping efficiency by 5 percent to 8 percent.

The patients treated with bone marrow cells showed an increased ability to tolerate physical activity before getting tired and breathless -- and the improvements have been sustained, Zeiher said.

He said one patient who had suffered a heart attack four years earlier improved by 61 percent and returned to the golf course to play at least nine holes. Some patients have made further progress by receiving one or two additional infusions over a two-year period.

"For the past 20 years, we have obsessed about treating (heart attacks) quickly -- time is muscle," said Dr. Douglas Losordo, chief of cardiovascular research at St. Elizabeth's Medical Center in Boston. "What this paper tells us is there is another time window for therapeutic intervention that's quite a bit longer and larger than we thought."

Dr. Anthony Rosenzweig, director of cardiovascular research at Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston, said the results suggest the stem cells were doing more than just accelerating the recovery process.

"These people were, on average, six years after their heart attacks," he said. "If it were just hastening healing after a heart attack, you wouldn't necessarily predict you'd be able to have a beneficial impact so long after."

Laboratory experiments have shown the cells can rebuild damaged heart cells, stimulate the formation of new blood vessels and release chemicals that aid the healing process, Zeiher said. But in patients, he said, "it is extremely difficult to assess these different mechanisms of action."

Some doctors, however, noted that a key piece of information was missing from the study: What exactly were the bone marrow cells doing inside the heart?

"They provide no evidence that the injected (stem cells) actually settled in the heart," Dr. Robert S. Schwartz, deputy editor of the New England Journal, wrote in a perspective piece accompanying the study. He added in an interview: "Physicians should know how any therapy they give works. That's fundamental."

Others found the mystery less bothersome.

"We still don't know how statins work, but I haven't stopped prescribing them," Losordo said.

The German researchers also published results of a companion study showing that patients who received the bone marrow cells within seven days of a heart attack improved their blood-pumping efficiency by 11 percent after four months, compared with a 6 percent boost for patients who received a placebo.

Human Stem Cells Are Found To Help Rats' Vision (NYT)

By Nicholas Wade

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

Pointing the way to a possible clinical use of human embryonic stem cells, researchers have improved vision in rats suffering from a disease similar to age-related macular degeneration.

The scientists, at Oregon Health and Science University, used human embryonic stem cells that had spontaneously converted into the special cells that line the base of the retina. The cells, which support the light-sensing rod and cone cells above them, are damaged in some forms of macular degeneration.

A group led by Raymond Lund says members injected these human cells into the retina of a special breed of rat in which the retina degenerates shortly after birth. The cells rescued the rats' vision, as judged by several tests, for three months after birth, the researchers report today in the journal Cloning and Stem Cells.

The injected human cells seemed to behave as retinal cells should, and the treated rats retained some six layers of rods and cones in their retinas, as much as half the normal value.

The human retinal lining cells, derived from different cultures of embryonic stem cells, were supplied by Advanced Cell Technology, a company with laboratories in Worcester, Mass. Dr. Neal Adams of the Wilmer Eye Institute in Baltimore said the development was important and "shows us some of the hope that regenerative medicine possesses." But many more stages lie ahead before any clinical test of the cells in patients with macular degeneration could be tried, Dr. Adams added.

Macular degeneration is a good candidate for embryonic stem cell therapy, at least in principle, because the eye is not closely monitored by the immune system. So cells from another individual could be grafted with lesser risk of rejection than at other sites.

A bank of retinal cells derived from 100 embryonic stem cells of different immunological backgrounds should suffice to provide a good match to most of the American population, said Robert Lanza of Advanced Cell Technology.

Although the experiment suggests a possible treatment for age-related macular degeneration, a disease that affects one-third of the population older than 75, many uncertainties remain to be addressed. The disease treated in the rats is caused by a genetic defect and is not exactly the same as the human disease.

Also, as with many proposals for cell therapy, the replacement cells are liable to be damaged in time by whatever disease process killed the patient's cells. Dr. Adams said macular degeneration was probably caused by a mix of environmental and genetic factors. Even if replacement cells should also fall victim to the disease, he said, they may buy the patient extra time and be a valuable treatment.

Stem Cell Experiments Slow Vision Loss In Rats (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

Researchers will report today that cells grown from human embryonic stem cells slowed vision loss when injected into the eyes of rats with a disease similar to macular degeneration, the leading cause of blindness in people older than 55.

The experiments do not prove that the cells, obtained through the destruction of human embryos, will work in people. But by showing that the cells have the potential to fill in for failing cells in the retina, experts said, the work may help justify trying the technique in humans.

Raymond D. Lund, then at the University of Utah's John A. Moran Eye Center in Salt Lake City, and Robert Lanza of Advanced Cell Technology Inc. (ACT) in Worcester, Mass., started by developing a reliable method for turning embryonic stem cells into retinal pigment epithelium cells, which nourish the light-sensitive "photoreceptor" cells in the eye. In macular degeneration, the pigment cells gradually disappear.

The researchers achieved the transformation in all 18 stem cell lines they worked with -- including some provided by the National Institutes of Health and others developed privately at Harvard University and at ACT -- proving that their approach can consistently produce the crucial pigment cells. Then they injected the cells, about 20,000 per eye, into the retinas of 14 rats with a genetic disease similar to macular degeneration. Eight control rats received eye injections without any cells.

Forty days after treatment, the team measured retinal electrical activity in response to flashes of light, and it found that the treated rats were twice as responsive as the untreated ones, which by then were going blind. A separate test -- which tracks eye and head movements in response to a moving display, a measure of an animal's ability to discern fine details -- showed that the treated rats had twice the visual acuity of the untreated rats nearly three months after treatment.

Microscopic examination of the retinas at autopsy showed that the treated eyes had healthy photoreceptor layers five to seven cells thick, while the untreated eyes had an average thickness of just one cell. (Healthy rats have layers 10 to 12 cells thick.) None of the cells divided abnormally or grew into tumors, the team reports in today's issue of the journal Cloning and Stem Cells.

"It's important and pretty exciting work," said Lucian V. Del Priore, an expert in retinal cell transplants at Columbia University. A steady source of safe, laboratory-cultivated cells for retinal transplants would be a welcome advance, he said.

But Del Priore cautioned that the rat disease is not identical to macular degeneration (no animal disease is), and it remains uncertain how long the new cells will survive and work. Immune-system responses, while generally suppressed inside the eye, can eventually lead to rejection, he said.

'A Dissident Of Islam' (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

While her security contingent waits outside the Georgetown restaurant, Ayaan Hirsi Ali orders what the menu calls "raw steak tartare." Amused by the redundancy, she speculates that it is intended to immunize the restaurant against lawyers, should a customer be discommoded by that entree. She has been in America only two weeks. She is a quick study.

And an exile and an immigrant. Born 36 years ago in Somalia, Hirsi Ali has lived in Ethiopia, Kenya, Saudi Arabia and the Netherlands, where she settled in 1992 after she deplaned in Frankfurt, supposedly en route to Canada for a marriage, arranged by her father, to a cousin. She makes her own arrangements.

She quickly became a Dutch citizen, a member of parliament and an astringent critic, from personal experience, of the condition of women under Islam. She wrote the script, and filmmaker Theo van Gogh directed, "Submission," an 11-minute movie featuring pertinent passages from the Koran (such as when it is a husband's duty to beat his wife) projected on the bodies of naked women.

It was shown twice before Nov. 2, 2004, when van Gogh, bicycling through central Amsterdam in the morning, was shot by an Islamic extremist who then slit his throat with a machete. Next, the murderer (in whose room was found a disc containing videos of "enemies of Allah" being murdered, including a man having his head slowly sawed off) used another knife to pin a long letter to van Gogh's chest. The letter was to Hirsi Ali, calling her a "soldier of evil" who would "smash herself to pieces on Islam."

The remainder of her life in Holland was lived under guard. Neighbors in her apartment building complained that they felt endangered with her there and got a court to order her evicted. She decided to come to America.

Holland evidently tolerates everything except skepticism about the sacramental nature of multiculturalism. One million of the country's 16 million residents are Muslims, and the political left has appropriated the European right's traditional celebration of identity grounded in racial and ethnic traditions and culture. But the recoil of many Dutch people from Hirsi Ali suggests that the tolerance about which Holland preens is a compound of intellectual sloth and moral timidity. She was more trouble than the Dutch evidently think free speech is worth.

Her story is told in a riveting new book, "Murder in Amsterdam," by Ian Buruma, who is not alone in finding her -- this "Enlightenment fundamentalist" -- somewhat unnerving and off-putting. Having experienced life circumscribed by tribal and religious communities (as a girl she suffered the genital mutilation called female circumcision), she is a fierce partisan of individualism against collectivism.

She reminds Buruma of Margaret Thatcher's sometimes abrasive intelligence and her fascination with America. He is dismissive of the idea that she is a Voltaire against Islam: Voltaire, he says, offended the powerful Catholic Church, whereas she offends "only a minority that was already feeling vulnerable in the heart of Europe."

She, however, replies that this is hardly a normal minority. It is connected to Islam's worldwide adherents. Living sullenly in European "dish cities" -- enclaves connected by satellite television and the Internet to the tribal societies they have not really left behind -- many members of this minority are uninterested in assimilation into open societies.

She calls herself "a dissident of Islam" because, given what Allah supposedly enjoins and what she knows is right, "the cognitive dissonance is, for me, too much." She says she is not "a militant atheist," but the emphasis is on the adjective.

Slender, elegant, stylish and articulate (in English, Dutch and Swahili), she has found an intellectual home here at the American Enterprise Institute, where she is writing a book that imagines Muhammad meeting, in the New York Public Library, three thinkers -- John Stuart Mill, Friedrich Hayek and Karl Popper, each a hero of the unending struggle between (to take the title of Popper's 1945 masterpiece) "The Open Society and Its Enemies." Islamic extremists -- the sort who were unhinged by some Danish cartoons -- will be enraged. She is unperturbed.

Neither is she pessimistic about the West. It has, she says, "the drive to innovate." But Europe, she thinks, is invertebrate. After two generations without war, Europeans "have no idea what an enemy is." And they think, she says, that leadership is an antiquated notion because they believe that caring governments can socialize everyone to behave well, thereby erasing personal accountability and responsibility. "I can't even tell it without laughing," she says, laughing softly. Clearly she is where she belongs, at last.

The Mets and Yankees may be safely in first place, but New Yorkers haven't had much else to cheer about lately. The state ranks first in the nation in net outmigration since 2000, according to a Manhattan Institute analysis of Census data, and the economic damage is especially notable in such struggling upstate areas as Utica and Buffalo. With even nearby Rhode Island planning a reduction in income tax rates, New York will slip further behind on the cost of doing business.

Enter GOP candidate for Governor John Faso, who is expected to release a tax reduction plan today that could at least put New York back in the game for jobs and investment. At the urging of such advisers as economist Larry Kudlow, Mr. Faso will propose to repeal the state's tax on dividends and capital gains over four years and immediately zero out the capital gains tax on all new investment in the state. Since the amount of new investment under the current tax regime is so microscopic, eliminating that capital-gains levy would cost the state almost nothing in lost revenue even on a static basis.

It's always been a strange paradox that New York, which fancies itself the financial capital of the globe, tries to repel capital with high taxes. Mr. Faso will also propose cutting the corporate income tax, as well as indexing the personal income tax brackets for inflation while chopping the top marginal rate to 6.25% from 6.85% (plus 3.65% if you live in New York City). The Big Apple's top rate would fall below 10% for the first time in decades. "When it comes to taxes, the world is flat and New York should be too," says Mr. Faso, referring to the flat-tax movement sweeping Europe and other parts of the world.

The current front-runner in the Governor's race, Democratic Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, isn't likely to follow suit. His own tax plan focuses on property levies, which are the fourth highest in the country. That sounds good, but he can't resist adding a class warfare wrinkle to his proposal for tax "relief," imposing an income test so that only lower- and middle-income homeowners get his rebate.

Property taxes have long been flat-rate levies that rise based only the value of one's home, so Mr. Spitzer is proposing to make the property tax as "progressive" as the income tax rates that have driven so many talented families and businesses out of the state. A state that found the cash to increase spending by 13% last year can afford a far bigger tax cut.

For years, Albany politicians have tried to lure businesses by offering lucrative special favors, one smokestack at a time. But that kind of corporate cronyism, financed through "economic development" grants and specific tax subsidies ($1 billion in handouts were just awarded to computer chip maker AMD), has only narrowed New York's tax base and accelerated its economic decline. Mr. Faso says he'd eliminate these corporate-welfare grants and apply the savings for his across-the-board tax cuts.

If not for the 2003 Bush tax cuts that helped to revive American capital markets and thus New York City in particular, the state would be even worse off. Mr. Faso is proposing to take a page from that same tax strategy and use it to lure investment and people back to America's fourth-largest state. This is a debate worth having.

Clash Of Civilizations (WSJ)

By Carlos Alberto Montaner

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

The clash of civilizations began this way. On Sept. 8, the Miami Herald (TMH) and El Nuevo Herald (ENH), both of the McClatchy newspaper chain, published on Page One a sensationalist report, clumsily researched, under a headline that read, in type befitting a major event, "10 Miami Journalists Take U.S. Pay." The initiative for the report had come from TMH; ENH was obliged to publish it, grudgingly. From the way in which the story was presented, it appeared that a great font of corruption had been unearthed, but in reality nothing criminal had happened. All the article said was that journalists of Cuban origin also contributed to Radio and TV Martí, an official U.S. broadcast station similar to Radio Free Europe, governed by the ethical standards of Voice of America, and transmitting to Cuba. Naturally, the journalists accepted for their work the fees (generally low) that the government routinely pays.

Miami's Cuban community was indignant. What was bad about trying to undermine Cuba's censorship? For the Cuban journalists, that was a civic duty. TMH has editorialized in support of Radio and TV Martí. Wasn't it logical that the good Cuban journalists said to Cuba, via Radio Martí, the same things they said in Miami via the McClatchy chain? To add insult to injury, the company fired three reporters on ENH's staff, claiming there might be a conflict of interests if they collected honoraria from the government. Granma, the organ of the Communist Party of Cuba, reported that those who criticized the Cuban government were bought by money from Washington. TMH did more damage in one day to Cuban writers in the democratic opposition than Granma has done in 40 years.

A few days later, ENH reported that hundreds of U.S. journalists have appeared on VOA and received the usual modest $100 per program. To contribute to VOA, PBS or public radio, and to charge for it, doesn't compromise their objectivity. Why a different standard for Cuban writers? TMH did not reprint ENH's report; 1,200 readers cancelled their subscriptions and it became evident that the two newspapers were taking opposing stances. For the "Anglo" journalists, their Cuban colleagues had conflicts. In contrast, the journalists at ENH felt their corporate brothers had ambushed them. To Miami's Cuban-Americans, this was a display of double-standards.

This clash also allows us to reflect on "conflicts of interest." To think that just because a journalist participates in a VOA program and receives $100 he will sell his conscience to the government is to have a terrible opinion of journalists. To think that readers, if they find out, will repudiate the medium where these journalists work, is to have a terrible opinion of readers. Professors at public universities get paid by the government; yet they don't submit to their paymaster for that reason. Because the law enshrines the presumption of innocence, U.S. society is characterized by a presumption of decency. Life is a continuous conflict of interest and one must presume that people -- even Cuban journalists -- act in accordance with reasonable principles and standards.

So what can McClatchy do now? Something very simple: Apologize publicly for the defamatory report and readmit the expelled journalists.

Mr. Montaner, a syndicated writer, is published in the Miami Herald and El Nuevo Herald.

Early October New Deadline For Iran (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 20 -- With Iran still resisting a freeze on its nuclear activities, the United States and five partners have decided to set yet another deadline in hopes that Iran will finally agree to terms paving the way for substantive talks on its nuclear program.

Under the plan, reached by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her counterparts from five other nations over a late-night dinner Tuesday, Iran will have until early October to agree to suspend its nuclear activities as the negotiations take place, diplomats said. At the meeting, Rice backed off the U.S. demand that the U.N. Security Council begin imposing sanctions over Iran's failure to meet previous deadlines, but noted that there is intense interest in the issue on Capitol Hill.

"Everyone wants to solve this through negotiation, everybody wants to solve this diplomatically," Rice said Wednesday, declining to confirm the new deadline.

The new deadline is the fourth in four months. Originally, when the six countries -- the United States, France, Britain, Germany, China and Russia -- offered on June 1 to discuss an array of incentives with Iran if it froze its uranium enrichment program, they demanded an answer by the end of June. That slipped to July, and then the end of August was set as the deadline in a Security Council resolution.

U.S. officials said they believe the deadline of the first week of October is firm, but at least one European diplomat suggested that the possibility of slippage remains.

"There is certainly no doubt in our mind how much longer we will see through continuation of the Solana track," one U.S. official said, referring to the efforts of European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana, who is spearheading the talks with Iran. "We have a hard end-date in mind." The official spoke on the condition of anonymity because the ministers agreed not to announce the date.

Solana has held numerous talks with his Iranian counterpart, Ali Larijani, in an effort to find a formula that would allow the talks to begin. The United States granted a visa to Larijani so he could meet with Solana in New York this week, but Larijani did not show up. Larijani and Solana agreed in a telephone call to hold talks next week somewhere in Europe, the official Iranian news agency reported in Tehran.

"We must have a response fairly quickly," French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy told reporters. "It's becoming urgent."

Iran has resisted appearing to bow to international pressure to halt its program. In a speech to the U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Iran's nuclear activities are "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eyes of IAEA inspectors," referring to the International Atomic Energy Agency. He denounced the effort to bring the issue to the Security Council, which he called "an instrument of threat and coercion."

Originally, Iran was told that no talks could start until it suspended the nuclear program. Officials are discussing the possibility of beginning the talks without the United States present, having Iran declare its willingness to suspend its program at the same time that action in the Security Council is halted, and then having the United States join the talks once the suspension is verified. Rice has said that she would attend the first meeting as the U.S. representative to the talks.

Meanwhile, President Bush met on Wednesday with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, and Rice met with her counterparts in the Quartet, a coordinating group on Middle East peace that includes the European Union, Russia and the United Nations. The main topic of discussion was the Palestinian government led by the Islamic Resistance Movement, also known as Hamas -- which receives financial backing from Iran -- and how to persuade the militant group to give up its pledge to destroy Israel.

U.S. officials say that a cutoff of international aid has left Hamas desperate for a solution, but Europeans officials have pressed for ways to relieve the suffering of the Palestinians. The Quartet in a statement said that the group has agreed to expand and continue what was originally billed as a temporary measure to bypass the government and to bring aid to critical groups of Palestinians.

Why Bush Is Taking A More Diplomatic Approach On Iran (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.

With prospects fading for tough economic sanctions against Iran anytime soon, the United States is shifting its stance even more solidly toward a diplomatic solution to Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

President Bush is sounding more conciliatory, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is approving more leeway for the Europeans to pursue talks with the Iranians - and everyone is insisting the aim is to allow Tehran the peaceful nuclear-power program it says is its only goal.

The US insists that the option of sanctions remains on the table, but the reasons for the softer approach appear to be twofold. First, Iranian officials are themselves sending mixed messages about their openness to suspending uranium enrichment in exchange for broad talks with the West. And second, international powers appear further than ever from joining to impose the sanctions they had agreed to this summer if Tehran did not suspend the nuclear activities that could lead to a bomb.

The question now niggling the US and others is whether Tehran is indeed debating the merits of backing off enrichment for the potentially more economically promising negotiations - or is just playing the international community for more time.

Iran's power circles are divided over what foreign policy to pursue, and that division is currently being played out in internal debate over the nuclear program, analysts say. What is less clear is when that debate might be settled enough to yield a clear answer to the countries - the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council plus Germany - offering negotiations to Iran.

"Iran doesn't have a united front, that's clear," says Jon Wolfsthal, a nonproliferation expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) in Washington. "The problem is that the default for them [in the absence of unity] is a more aggressive approach, as opposed to accepting a deal."

Just last week, Mr. Bush warned the international community against falling into a trap set by Iran, and again on Tuesday, he said Tehran is simply stalling. If that continues, he added, "We will then discuss the consequences of their stalling." But in his speech to the UN General Assembly, the president refrained from any urgent language, saying the US accepts Tehran's right to a peaceful nuclear-power program.

At the same time, Secretary of State Rice convened a meeting Tuesday night of key foreign ministers - a meeting that was originally envisioned as the setting for the next steps towards sanctions. Instead, she allowed that preliminary talks between the Europeans and Iran will proceed. Her deputy, Nicholas Burns, said those talks are already in "extra innings," but there was no hint of a precise deadline for reaching a conclusion.

That approach reflects a consistent approach on the part of the administration, Mr. Wolfsthal says, which is to let Iran convince the world it ultimately is not willing to shut down its nuclear-weapons ambitions. "I don't think anyone in the administration really expects Iran to compromise," he says. "So the whole diplomatic path has been to demonstrate to the rest of the world that Iran never was serious about a diplomatic solution."

But other analysts say the American seesaw from tough talk to more conciliatory language reflects a hard-line/ pragmatist policy divide within the administration that is not unlike the split coloring Tehran's approach.

"Iran is another chapter in the administration's internal struggle for control of foreign policy," says Joseph Cirincione, a weapons-proliferation policy expert at the Center for American Progress in Washington. "Depending on where you sit in this divide, what we're seeing in terms of Iran is either the collapse of the Bush strategy [to arrive at international sanctions], or it's all unfolding according to plan."

Mr. Cirincione says "hard-liners" in the administration - starting with Vice President Dick Cheney - "have always thought Rice's strategy of going for sanctions would fail," but they have gone along as a way to prove the international community won't act. The objective, he says, is to let diplomacy run its course, especially with military action against Iran's nuclear installations so unpalatable right now.

"From their perspective, it's fine to have the president talking softly at the UN," he says, "as long as plans for military action proceed at the White House and in the backrooms of the Pentagon."

That does not mean the US is doing nothing more than sitting back while, from its perspective, Tehran hangs itself. Over recent weeks, the US has begun pressing other countries to pursue the kinds of unilateral measures it is already taking against Tehran, including freezing the assets of companies.

One Swiss bank, Union Bank of Switzerland, has already cut off relations with Iran, but the US would like to see more - especially since European intelligence reports earlier this year reported Iran was diligently looking throughout Europe and former Soviet countries for materials and technological know-how.

In the midst of the American and Iranian mixed signals, President Jacques Chirac of France came up with a new proposal this week that he said could break the diplomatic logjam: The Iranians would agree to suspend uranium enrichment once talks begin - not as a condition for talks as the US insists - and agree to honor the suspension as long as talks go on.

That suggestion took the US by surprise. But Mr. Chirac quickly reassured Bush publicly after a breakfast in New York Tuesday that he continues to see "eye to eye" with the US president on the necessity of forestalling a nuclear-armed Iran.

Cirincione says that Chirac, who saw the reality of the sanctions effort going nowhere fast, is "probably planting this as a face-saving solution" that could appeal to all sides.

But he adds that while he believes a deal is still possible, the conditions may be too much for Washington to allow. The US and its international partners would have to "accept some amount of enrichment activity in Iran," he says, while the US would have to cease "all talk and promotion of regime change in Tehran."

What that would amount to, Cirincione says, is offering the Iranian regime "the same security assurances we gave the government of Libya to get that deal" of forswearing nuclear-weapons goals.

All these issues will keep diplomacy around Iran's nuclear program percolating for a while, with some analysts predicting little movement well into next year.

Another reason for the lack of urgency - fewer officials even in the Bush administration are speaking of a "crisis" - is that more nuclear experts are concluding that Iran's progress toward mastery of nuclear weapons technology has slowed.

Despite a recent House committee report faulting US intelligence for failing to keep abreast of Iran's progress, most experts say Iran has slowed its rate of advancement in the nuclear field - either by design or as a result of mounting procurement difficulties in terms of technology and materials.

"It's increasingly clear through inspections and intelligence reports that Iran is making glacially slow progress on its program," Wolfsthal of CSIS says.

"Yes, they have surprised us before," he adds. "But from what we're able to see, it's pretty clear they are not months away, but years away, from having a nuclear bomb. And that is deflating some of the pressure to act on this one way or the other right now."

Nations Discuss New Deadline For Iran (AP)

By Angela Charlton, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

The nations seeking to halt Iran's nuclear activities are working out a new deadline for Tehran despite differences over possible sanctions, the French foreign minister said Wednesday.

With world leaders gathered at the United Nations, the United States had hoped to move decisively this week toward political and economic sanctions against Iran after it missed an Aug. 31 U.N. Security Council deadline to halt disputed uranium enrichment that many believe is aimed at making a bomb.

But some U.S. allies are balking. France has instead proposed a compromise deal: a simultaneous suspension of all threats of sanctions and Iran's uranium enrichment.

French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy pushed ahead with this plan Wednesday. He suggested that the United States and others support it and said they were discussing a possible new timeline. He also discussed it with Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki and said the Iranian agreed that "time is an important factor."

Douste-Blazy gave no specific date. But a senior French diplomat said the nations involved in nuclear talks with Iran are mulling an early October deadline for Tehran to agree to a simultaneous suspension of uranium enrichment and talk of sanctions.

The United States and Britain remained cautious about the suspension plan. A U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment on the confidential discussions, confirmed that the group had discussed a new timeline — but said sanctions are still on the table.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday: "I'm not going to talk in terms of deadlines," but added, "This cannot go on for very much longer."

DOJ_NMG_0066749

She also reiterated the U.S. position that Iran suspend enrichment before negotiations can begin.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett would not discuss a possible new date, either.

"What we are looking for is a clear and sustained and concrete signal that Iran wishes to negotiate," she told reporters. "Our patience, I think, is not unlimited."

A dinner meeting Tuesday with Rice, Beckett, Douste-Blazy and the foreign ministers of Russia, China, Germany and Italy produced little consensus about the next step, U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said. He said the diplomatic effort to counter Iran was in "extra innings."

The Americans have little choice but to give the Europeans a little more time, since Washington needs Europe on board for sanctions to be effective.

U.S.-Iranian tensions are in the spotlight this week, with both nations' presidents speaking Tuesday to the U.N. General Assembly — and pointedly avoiding each other in the halls of the world body.

In his speech, President Bush said, "Iran must abandon its nuclear weapons ambitions," but said the U.S. has "no objection to Iran's pursuit of a truly peaceful nuclear power program."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad insisted in his speech that Tehran's nuclear activities are "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog. He also reiterated his nation's commitment to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Progress hinges on talks between EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani. Larijani had been expected in New York this week, but Beckett said Wednesday that it appeared that he would not be coming.

She also said the ministers have authorized Solana to go anywhere at any time to meet Larijani.

Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi met Ahmadinejad later Wednesday, but no details of the talks were released.

France appeared determined to resist sanctions, despite mixed messages this week.

President Jacques Chirac shook up diplomatic circles with a proposal to drop talk of sanctions on Monday, then appeared to soften the stance after meeting Tuesday with Bush. Chirac also said Tuesday he was not interested in new deadlines for Iran.

Douste-Blazy, however, was eager to set a new timeline.

"We cannot let the Iranians ... gain time," he said. "We must have a response rather fast."

Iran hinted last week that it might be willing to suspend uranium enrichment. That was enough to sow new division among the nations seeking to stem Iran's nuclear program — and brake the push for sanctions.

New Iran Deadline As Bush Watches Clock (AFP)

AFP, September 21, 2006

World powers handed Iran a new early October deadline to halt uranium enrichment, a senior European diplomat said, as President George W. Bush warned "time is of the essence" in settling the nuclear showdown.

Hopes of a snap breakthrough in the crisis however were already dimmed, with an announcement that European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana would not meet, as expected, this week in New York with Iranian negotiators.

The five permanent members of the UN Security Council plus Germany and Italy agreed late Tuesday to give European negotiators more time to convince Iran to give up enrichment before seeking sanctions under a UN resolution

A senior European diplomat told reporters the new deadline would stretch to early October, in the hope that new talks between Solana and Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani would bear fruit.

The UN Security Council had set an August 31 deadline for Iran to comply with the demand for a suspension of enrichment operations. But Tehran, which denies US claims it is seeking a nuclear weapons, has so far refused to comply.

Bush meanwhile warned time was running out for Iran, and again wondered out loud whether the latest delay was a symptom of Tehran running out the clock.

"I'm not going to discuss with you our intelligence on the subject, but time is of the essence," Bush said, when asked on CNN whether he backed the Israeli line that only a few months remained before Iranian scientists learned how to enrich uranium -- the critical step towards building a bomb.

"I'm concerned that Iran is trying to stall, and to try to buy time, and therefore it seems like a smart policy is to push this issue along as hard as we can and we are," Bush said.

Bush's secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice meanwhile declined to confirm the new deadline but also warned diplomacy couldn't stretch on indefinitely.

"Everyone wants to resolve this through negotiations and everyone wants to solve this thing quickly," she said here.

"There is a really excellent opportunity for Iran to engage with the international community, if it will simply meet a condition (freezing uranium enrichment)."

French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said Wednesday major powers -- Britain, China, France, Germany, Italy, Russia and the United States -- agreed that Iran must respond rapidly.

"We must have a response fairly quickly," he said, "it's becoming urgent."

At Tuesday's meeting, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice backed away from the long-standing US position that Iran should face sanctions immediately for failing to meet an August 31 UN deadline for suspending its uranium enrichment.

She agreed to permit a new round of negotiations between Solana and Larijani in hopes of convincing Tehran to meet the UN demand, US officials said.

If Iran suspends its enrichment, Rice said she would personally attend the launch of direct negotiations with Tehran aimed at rewarding the Islamic republic for winding down its nuclear program.

Chances of a quick breakthrough in the standoff were hit by the announcement that Larijani would not meet with Solana in New York this week as expected.

Instead, Larijani and Solana agreed in a telephone conversation to hold talks next week in an unidentified European capital, the official Iranian news agency reported in Tehran.

"It seems to have been difficult to get some of those (talks) scheduled and we would encourage the Iranians to take him up on his offer to meet with him and to clarify any remaining questions," said Rice.

"But this cannot go on for very much longer."

As well as the extended deadline for an Iranian response, Washington got its partners to agree to the new deadline for imposing sanctions if Iran stands firm, according to senior US and European officials present at the meeting.

Douste-Blazy said Tuesday's meeting had agreed on the need to give Iran one more chance.

"We all thought that we had to avoid confrontation and do everything possible to pursue a dialogue ... while also avoiding a situation where the Iranians, through meeting after meeting, are able to play for time and we end up with a fait accompli" of an Iranian nuclear weapons program, he said.

Concession Clears Way For Iran-EU Talks (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr

Financial Times, September 21, 2006

Iran's chief nuclear security official, Ali Larijani, is expected to resume talks with the European Union's Javier Solana next week following a concession by the US to give the process more time before pursuing a United Nations sanctions resolution.

The Iranian state news agency – reporting from Damascus where Mr Larijani met the Syrian president, Bashar al-Assad, on Wednesday – said Iran's chief negotiator would continue talks with Mr Solana, the EU's foreign policy supremo.

Although the meeting had been expected to take place at the UN in New York, reports from Tehran said they would meet in Europe. Iranian officials blamed the US for a delay in issuing visas for Mr Larijani and his delegation as the main reason for the nuclear team's failure to show up in New York.

"Only Mr Larijani and one deputy, Javad Vaeedi, hold visas now, while the rest are still waiting for their visas to be issued," an Iranian official told the Financial Times.

Diplomats are trying to work out a process whereby negotiations will begin and ran will suspend its uranium enrichment. The sequence is still unclear, but signs of progress and pressure from France, China and Russia have persuaded the US to put the sanctions drive on hold.

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad insisted on his country's right to develop nuclear energy in a forceful speech to the UN General Assembly in New York on Tuesday. He also reiterated Iran's adherence to its international safeguard commitments, while questioning the legitimacy of the Security Council and what he called the abuse of the UN by the veto-wielding powers, particularly the US and UK.

The position of Mr Ahmadi-Nejad in Iran's top leadership is stronger in domestic issues, while big international policies, including the nuclear decisions, are taken collectively by the top leadership. Sources have confirmed that Mr Ahmadi-Nejad, with a rather confrontational approach, is in the minority within the leadership.

Although his speech lacked any suggestion of dialogue and compromise with the west over the nuclear programme, it was less confrontational than some western observers had feared. Ahead of the speech European diplomats had warned that if it was too aggressive it could jeopardise the chances of striking a deal on opening formal negotiations.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad also used the speech to again display his millennialist approach to world affairs, starting and wrapping up his speech by praying for the return of the last Imam of Muslim Shia, Mahdi, who is supposed to save the world.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad adopted populist language on Middle Eastern issues, including Iraq, the Palestinian territories and Lebanon, but he did not repeat his earlier controversial comments about "wiping Israel off the map" and questioning the truth of the Holocaust, which brought him popularity in the Islamic world

Iran's Leader Relishes 2nd Chance To Make Waves (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

When President Bush and his advisers decided to allow President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran into the country to address the United Nations, their strategy was simple: containment.

There would be no visits to other cities where he could denounce Washington or question Israel's legitimacy. There would be no opportunities, beyond his speech to the General Assembly, to turn questions about his nuclear intentions into repeated diatribes about America's nuclear arsenal.

It turned out that Mr. Ahmadinejad had a Plan B.

The scope of his determination to dominate not only the airwaves but the debate became evident yesterday evening, when he entered a hotel conference room on the East Side with a jaunty smile, a wave and an air of supreme confidence.

Over the objections of the administration and Jewish groups that boycotted the event, Mr. Ahmadinejad, the man who has become the defiant face of Iran, squared off with the nation's foreign policy establishment, parrying questions for an hour and three-quarters with two dozen members of the Council on Foreign Relations, then ending the evening by asking whether they were simply shills for the Bush administration.

Never raising his voice and thanking each questioner with a tone that oozed polite hostility, he spent 40 minutes questioning the evidence that the Holocaust ever happened — "I think we should allow more impartial studies to be done on this," he said after hearing an account of an 81-year-old member, the insurance mogul Maurice R. Greenberg, who saw the Dachau concentration camp as Germany fell — and he refused to even consider Washington's proposal for Russia to provide Iran with nuclear reactor fuel, and take it back once it is used. (Without the capacity to enrich fuel on its own soil Iran would be unable to make fuel suitable for a nuclear weapon.)

He traced the history of 50 years of unfilled deals with the United States, Germany, France and others — skipping over the Iranian revolution and the hostage-taking that followed — and concluded, "How can we rely on these partners." His solution? The United States should shut down its own fuel production and "within five years, we will sell you our own fuel, with a 50 percent discount!" He settled back into his seat with a broad smile that some in the group described as a smirk.

The decision by the council's president, Richard N. Haass, to invite Mr. Ahmadinejad to the session touched off a rare outcry protest in an organization whose meetings are usually as staid as the portraits of long-forgotten diplomats on its walls.

Mr. Haass, who ran the policy planning branch of the State Department during Mr. Bush's first term, first had to fend off senior administration officials who had argued that he should not give Mr. Ahmadinejad the legitimacy of a hearing — especially with the likes of Brent Scowcroft, who served as national security adviser under President Bush's father, or Robert D. Blackwill, who directed Iraq policy at the White House under Condoleezza Rice.

"It's fair to say that Dr. Rice thought this was a bad idea," one senior State Department official said. "A really, really bad idea."

So did leaders of several Jewish groups, whom Mr. Haass invited — and who promptly asked if the council would have invited Hitler in the 1930's. "Some of us considered quitting to make it clear how offensive this is," said Abraham H. Foxman, the national director of the Anti-Defamation League, who was one of the Jewish leaders whose attendance Mr. Haass sought.

But after a flurry of phone calls, including with Elie Wiesel, the writer and Holocaust survivor, they decided against a mass resignation — particularly after the council made the session a "meeting" rather than a dinner. (There were light hors d'oeuvres on the side; Mr. Ahmadinejad never touched them.)

"It is more offensive to break bread with the guy," Mr. Foxman said. "I thought dinner was crossing the line."

But the council pointed out that it had served as host for many world leaders equally skilled at repressing dissidents, developing suspected weapons programs, shutting down a free press and denouncing Israel.

"We've had Castro," said Lisa Shields, the council's communications director, ticking off the gallery of leaders Washington considered rogues. "We've had Arafat, and Mugabe. We've had Gerry Adams."

The greeting yesterday evening was not exactly overwhelming. There were no introductory handshakes, no diplomatic niceties. All of the Americans who were invited to attend, including four journalists, were members of the council. Iran's effort to bring in television cameras was deflected, apparently because the council feared that the session would be used for political purposes in Iran, where Mr. Ahmadinejad is presumably eager to show that even if President Bush refused to meet him, he got his message across.

In fact he did — meeting academics in the morning and religious leaders at midday, and speeding from the council meeting for another television interview. He did most of this without leaving the Intercontinental Hotel on 48th Street in Manhattan.

The council would not say how many of the invitees had refused to attend. But members said they knew of more than a half-dozen, from the publisher Mort Zuckerman to the former Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright. It is unclear why some declined. A few claimed scheduling conflicts, rather than moral objections.

The handful who had a chance to quiz the Iranian president went out of their way, within the limits of diplomatic etiquette, to make clear to Mr. Ahmadinejad that they thought his characterizations of Israel and the Holocaust were repugnant and that his nuclear strategy was self-defeating. He gave no ground.

When Martin S. Indyk, a former American ambassador to Israel, told Mr. Ahmadinejad that Iran "did everything possible to destroy'' efforts to bring peace between Israel and the Palestinians, the president said, "If you believe Iran is the reason for the failure, you are making a second mistake.'' Why, he asked, should the Palestinians be asked to "pay for an event they had nothing to do with'' in World War II, saying that they had nothing to do with the systematic killing of Jews — if those killings, he added, had happened at all.

"In World War II about 60 million people were killed,'' he said at one point, when pressed again on his refusal to accept that the Holocaust happened. "Two million were military. Why is such prominence given to a small portion of those 60 million?''

A few minutes later, he asked a question himself: "In the Council on Foreign Relations, is there any voice of support for the Palestinians?''

Mr. Ahmadinejad's habit of answering every question about Iranian policy with a question about American policy was clearly wearing on some of the members, but at the end they acknowledged that he was about as skillful an interlocutor as they had ever encountered. "He is a master of counterpunch, deception, circumlocution,'' Mr. Scowcroft said, shaking his head. Mr. Blackwill emerged from the conversation wondering how the United States would ever be able to negotiate with this Iranian government.

"If this man represents the prevailing government opinion in Tehran, we are heading for a massive confrontation with Iran," he said.

In fact, on the main issue speeding the two countries toward confrontation, Iran's nuclear program, the president was unwilling to discuss specifics. He insisted that he was fully cooperating with the International Atomic Energy Agency, even though it had pages of questions his government refused to answer.

Instead, he steered the whole conversation toward Iran's rights under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, ignoring an effort by Ashton B. Carter, a Harvard professor, to get him to answer whether the nuclear effort was worth the cost to Iranian society.

"The U.S. doesn't speak for the whole world,'' Mr. Ahmadinejad responded, noting that at a meeting of nonaligned nations in Cuba over the weekend "118 countries defended the right of Iran to enrich.''

And as he left, it was with a jab to his hosts. "At the beginning of the session, you said you were an independent group,'' he said. "But almost everything that I was asked came from a government position.'' Then he smiled, thanked everyone and left the room with a light step.

Israel Calls Iran Its Greatest Threat (AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

The Israeli foreign minister on Wednesday warned that Iranian leaders pose the biggest threat to the world's values because they "speak proudly" of their wish to destroy Israel and pursue weapons to achieve that objective.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni told the annual U.N. General Assembly session that the international community must stand up against Iran, which she claimed is pursuing the weapons to destroy Israel, a reference to its suspect nuclear program.

"There is no greater challenge to our values than that posed by the leaders of Iran," Livni said. "They deny and mock the Holocaust. They speak proudly and openly of their desire to wipe Israel off the map. And now, by their actions, they pursue the weapons to achieve this objective, to imperil the region and to threaten the world."

She said Iran's support of the Islamic militant group Hezbollah in south Lebanon showed the threat it poses to the region. The world must ensure that it enforces the U.N. Security Council resolution that ended more than a month of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah, Livni said.

"There is no place for such a regime in the family of nations," she said.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has said in the past he wants to wipe Israel off the map and dismissed the Holocaust as a myth. In his own speech to the General Assembly on Tuesday, Ahmadinejad said Israel was created by driving millions of people from territory that was rightfully theirs, something he called "a great tragedy with hardly a precedent in history."

He also harshly criticized Israel's policies, saying the country was a source of insecurity in the Middle East that was "waging war and spilling blood and impeding the progress of regional countries."

While Livni spoke, a lone Iranian diplomat sat in the back row of the section of six seats reserved for the Islamic republic in the General Assembly hall. After her speech ended, the diplomat moved up to the front row to listen to the following official, from Belgium.

Livni struck a more conciliatory tone toward the Palestinians, saying the two did not necessarily have to remain at odds and the only way to resolve their conflict was at the "bilateral negotiating table."

"We have no illusions about the difficulties before us — we must face them and not ignore them," she said.

Livni met with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas at the U.N. a day before the General Assembly session began, and both described the meeting as positive. In her speech, she reiterated their desire to reopen a serious dialogue, including with the creation of a permanent channel "to pursue ways to advance together."

On the sidelines of the summit on Wednesday, President Bush called Abbas a "man of courage" for trying to revive Mideast peace talks despite a continued political stalemate with Hamas militants. Abbas has been weakened since January when Hamas, which seeks the destruction of Israel, won the Palestinian elections.

Prospects for a return to active peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians have looked dim this year, partly because the political upheaval in both governments kept leaders' attention focused inward.

DOJ_NMG_0066754

Israel has new leadership too as Ariel Sharon remains incapacitated after his sudden massive stroke on Jan. 4. The new prime minister, Ehud Olmert, is on the defensive at home because of widespread dissatisfaction with the conduct and outcome of Israel's summer war against Hezbollah.

Lessons From U.N. Week (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

One of the lessons of this past week is that the international system is broken. The world community might make declarations — on preventing Iranian and North Korean nukes, disarming Hezbollah, or preventing genocide in Darfur — but when it comes to actually uniting to take action, words and resolutions lead nowhere. Thanks to a combination of American errors, European escapism, and Russian and Chinese greed, the worst people in the world now drive events while the best people do nothing.

The second big lesson of the past week is that five years after 9/11 we are farther from reaching a consensus on the nature of the threat than ever before. Instead of clarity, there is a cacophony of theories that attempt to explain the extremists — emphasizing religion or ideology or feelings of historic humiliation or some combination of all three.

The core of the dispute is: Do the extremists play by the normal rules of geostrategy, or are their minds off in some mystical sphere that is utterly alien to our categories?

Do they respond to incentives and follow the dictates of what we call self-interest? Can they be deterred by normal threats to their security? Or, alternatively, are they playing an entirely different game? Are the men who occupy the black hole that is the Iranian power elite engaged in a religious enterprise based on an eschatological time frame and driven by supernatural longings we can't begin to fathom?

The definition of the threat determines the remedies we select to combat it, and yet what we have now is a clash of incongruous definitions and an enemy that is chaos theory in human form — an ever-shifting array of state and nonstate actors who cooperate, coagulate, divide, feud and feed on one another without end.

The third lesson is that a huge gap is emerging between the way ordinary Americans see the Arab world and the way members of the political, media and intellectual elites see it.

Elite debate is restrained by a series of enlightened attitudes that amount to a code of political correctness: be tolerant of cultural differences, seek to understand the responses of people who feel oppressed, don't judge groups, never criticize somebody else's religion.

As anybody who has traveled around the country or listened to talk radio of left, right and center knows, these genteel manners do not inhibit the masses. Millions of Americans think the pope asked exactly the right questions: Does the Muslim God accord with the categories of reason? Are Muslims trying to spread their religion with the sword?

These millions of Americans believe the pope has nothing to apologize for. They regard the vicious overreaction to his speech, like the vicious overreaction to the Danish cartoons, as another sign that some sort of intellectual disease is sweeping through the Arab world.

What these Americans see is fanatical violence, a rampant culture of victimology and grievance, a tendency by many Arabs to blame anyone other than themselves for the problems they create. These Americans don't believe they should lower their standards of tolerable behavior merely for the sake of multicultural politeness, and they are growing ever more disgusted with commentators and leaders who are totally divorced from the reality they see on TV every night.

The fourth lesson is that we are drifting toward a policy that does not match the threat we face. Extremism is not an isolated cult in the Muslim world. It is a diverse and vibrant movement, which inspires the smartest of the young and treats the psychological wounds of those who are trapped between tradition and modernity.

The Muslim millenarians possess a habit of mind that causes them to escalate conflicts. They seem confident they can prevail, owing to their willingness to die for their truth. They don't seem to feel marginalized, but look down on us as weak, and doubt our ability to strike back.

With America exhausted by Iraq, with the threat of Iranian sanctions dissolving before our eyes, Western policy is drifting toward the option that most resembles passivity. That is containment — accepting Iranian nukes and trying to deter their use with our arsenal.

In other words, a policy that was designed to confront a secular, bureaucratic foe — the Soviets — will now be used to confront a surging, jihadist one. The survival of Tel Aviv, and maybe New York and Washington, will depend on the Clausewitzian rationalism of the Iranian mullahs, or the angry younger brothers who will replace them.

Letter To America (WP)

By Akbar Ganji

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

My brief journey to your beautiful and amazing country began in New York City with a symbolic hunger strike in front of United Nations headquarters. Its purpose was to bring to the world's attention the plight of political prisoners in my country, Iran. We demand that all political prisoners in Iran be freed. I am certain that you appreciate our desire for freedom; it was, after all, the main principle upon which your country was founded.

My American journey commenced shortly after I was released from prison in Iran. I spent six years behind bars on the bogus charge of endangering national security. I came here bearing a message from a movement whose members are hard at work promoting the values of democracy, human rights, social justice and civil liberties. We want our country to play a positive role in promoting peace, security and cooperation in the region. To achieve our goals, we need the support of the entire world, particularly your vast and powerful country.

To end the tensions between our countries, we appeal to your natural sense of independence, liberty and fairness -- to your belief that the pursuit of happiness is not just the prerogative of some classes or nations. Happiness, peace and security can be achieved and sustained when we succeed in making these values universal. The sense of physical pain as well as injury to our sense of human dignity and self-esteem are common to us all. No less common is our shared sense of peace, security, joy and laughter.

The history of the United States as a nation begins with the establishment of a polity based upon a constitution. In modern Iran, that is still a relatively new idea. Although it dates to our Constitutional Revolution of 1906, we have in fact achieved only some of the goals of that revolution. We are, a century later, still struggling to create a polity based on a constitution and the rule of law.

Even the 1979 revolution could not turn this dream into reality. The political and ideological forces that came to dominate that revolution denied the people the right to exercise their free will. The official ideology of the ruling clerical regime considers all humans to be less than adult and says that without the supervision of the clergy, they will act like children, if not madmen. According to this clerical theory, the people are most virtuous when they are most docile.

This is similar to the concept of the ruler as shepherd and guardian, and the people as flock. The official ideology of the Islamic regime calls for fully implementing this idea in the political domain. The idea is not, of course, limited to the world of Islam. Religious fundamentalism, whether it appears in Islamic, Christian, Jewish or Buddhist hue, shares the desire to humiliate the people and deny them their rights.

In Iran, we hope to achieve our goal of a new polity and a new constitution not by violence but by following a peaceful and democratic path. And in this struggle we need moral support from all freedom-loving people around the world -- particularly the United States.

We want the world to know that our rulers do not represent the Iranian people and that their religion is not the religion of the entire nation. We ask that in shaping its policies toward the Iranian regime, the United States not overlook the interests of Iranian civil society. In particular, we hope that America listens to those in Iran who fear that policies intended to contain the current crisis might in fact lead to a greater crisis, and to war.

We are convinced that the outbreak of a new war in the Middle East, particularly against a large and populous country such as Iran, would destabilize the region and the world. And it would deprive us of the chance to found a peaceful and democratic political order. We are also against policies, such as economic sanctions, that bring extraordinary hardship to the lives of ordinary Iranians.

It is both possible and desirable to solve the problems between the United States and Iran through direct talks. Such diplomacy will best serve the interests of the American and Iranian people if it is conducted in a transparent fashion. This transparency would not only make it impossible for advocates of war to increase tensions but also would help isolate them. Iranian democrats are opposed to secret diplomacy.

If, in the 1980s, the United States had pursued a policy of never establishing ties with enemies of human rights, and if it had given priority to the interests of civil society, it could be reaping the benefits of a successful foreign policy today. And the danger of terrorism would have been less than it is now. In fighting nuclear proliferation, all countries must be treated equally. The Iranian people do not accept double standards in this matter.

We believe the government in Tehran is seeking a secret deal with the United States. It is willing to make any concession, provided that the United States promises to remain silent about the regime's repressive measures at home. We don't want war; nor do we favor such a deal. We hope that the regime will not be allowed to suppress its people, foment a crisis in the region or continue with its nuclear adventurism.

But the dangers of the Tehran regime are not limited to the nuclear question. The regime is dangerous mostly because it is willing to brutally trample on the democratic and human rights of the Iranian people. It is dangerous because it is willing to create gender apartheid in the name of religion and to suppress religious and ethnic minorities. Finally, it is dangerous because it considers all forms of dissent unforgivable sins. The real goal of the nuclear program is to make these policies permanent. In its negotiations with the Iranian regime, the West must not overlook this important fact.

Today I stand among a large number of Iranians who live in the United States. Most are now citizens of this country, educated and successful. They owe their success not just to their resourcefulness and hard work but also to the admirable ability of American society to accept strangers and immigrants on its shores, and to America's cultural tolerance. The large community of Iranians in America is imbued with affection for it. They, as well as the people of Iran, hope that political conflicts will be resolved and replaced by bonds of friendship and peaceful cooperation.

A Bush-Ahmadinejad Debate? Why Not? (USAT)

By Lionel Beehner

USA Today, September 21, 2006

The presidents of the United States and Iran squared off at the United Nations, yet nothing of substance materialized. They spoke hours apart Tuesday, sticking to their usual talking points. Alas, this might be as close as these men ever get to meeting in a public forum. And that's unfortunate.

Just last month, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad challenged President Bush to a televised debate. Though the White House scoffed at the request, perhaps it's not so crazy after all. Sure, it would make for intriguing TV, but more important, it would offer a public airing of both leaders' views on perhaps the most daunting issue of our time: nuclear proliferation.

Here's how it might work. Unlike the “Kitchen Debate” between Vice President Nixon and Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev in 1959, the participants would debate live via satellite with simultaneous, uncensored translation. The moderator would be a prominent yet impartial diplomat from a third-party state.

A debate is in both countries' interests. Iranians rarely get unfettered access to American politicians' views, while Ahmadinejad's anti-U.S. screeds usually hit the Iranian press unfiltered and unchallenged.

State Department spokesman Tom Casey has said it was “somewhat odd for the president of a country that represses all debate within its own society to be talking about free and open exchange of ideas.” But if anything, this exchange could spur greater political discussion and freedom of speech in Iran, not less. In the process, Iranians just might learn why the world opposes their nuclear program.

The face-off also would make sense for Bush, whose approval ratings have been sagging for months and might receive a boost from such a debate. It could also burnish Bush's foreign policy credentials at home, while demonstrating to moderates in the Middle East the folksiness many Americans admire about the president. It might also salvage his faltering Middle East policy during an important election year.

Iran is one issue where the president's no-nonsense approach seems to resonate with voters (no one supports a nuclear Iran). Yet he is short on solutions. Bush has dismissed Ahmadinejad's longwinded letter in May to him, ignored the Iranian leader's quirky blog, and demurred on directly engaging Tehran until it first suspends its uranium-enrichment activities.

Of course, Bush's supporters will say he should not dignify a request to debate a Holocaust denier. But Ahmadinejad is not going away. And the nuclear issue will not likely be resolved through intermediaries in Europe or bureaucrats at the U.N. Like President Nixon's decision to deal with Communist China in 1972, Bush should directly engage his enemies, no matter how muddled their political philosophies or grotesque their views on history.

Some policymakers might say agreeing to a public debate would establish a bad precedent or open up a dangerous can of worms. World leaders groping for a soapbox to stand on — Venezuela's Hugo Chavez or North Korea's Kim Jong Il come to mind — might challenge their foes to debates, creating needless sideshows that would distract from serious disagreements on issues of foreign policy. It might also create havoc for diplomats should their leaders misspeak or misrepresent their positions in the heat of debate.

Even so, the benefits would far outweigh the risks. Regular televised debates would provide a forum for world leaders to openly exchange views, unencumbered by underlings and diplomatic niceties, while educating their respective publics in the process. Much like President Roosevelt's “fireside chats” in the 1930s, live debates would bring leaders and their citizenry closer together, as well as hold world leaders accountable for their actions and statements. In the process, leaders might become more humanized. Americans would see Ahmadinejad not as the unruly dictator hawks make him out to be, while Iranians might see Bush not as the Christian cowboy he is portrayed as in the Middle East.

A similar gulf in perception divided the Americans and “10-feet-tall” Soviets at the height of the Cold War. As Nixon shrewdly put it to Khrushchev in 1959, “We should hear you more on our televisions. You should hear us more on yours.” Same goes for Bush and Ahmadinejad in 2006.

Ideals And Realities Clash In Bush 'Freedom Agenda' (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

At the United Nations lectern this week, President Bush hailed the spread of democracy. "From Beirut to Baghdad," he said, "people are making the choice for freedom." Yet even as he spoke, tanks were rolling through the streets of Bangkok as a military coup toppled the elected leader of Thailand, who at that moment was in New York for the U.N. session.

Bush made no mention of the dramatic events on Tuesday and left New York yesterday without ever seeing the deposed prime minister, much less offering any public support for a onetime strong ally of the United States. The president's spokesman later provided a strikingly mild response only after being asked by a reporter, pronouncing the White House "disappointed" by the coup.

The timing of Bush's address on democracy to the U.N. General Assembly and the overthrow of a democratically elected government underlined the complexities and contradictions in his "freedom agenda." With the president's attention focused on the Middle East, the state of democracy elsewhere in the world does not rate as high on his priority list. In the case of Thailand, the situation is complicated by growing U.S. unease with the ousted prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra.

"The president's freedom agenda is inherently selective," said Thomas Carothers, head of the democracy project at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "We care very much about democracy in Afghanistan and Iraq, but . . . Thailand's just not part of the story, so this falls off the map a bit."

Thailand is hardly the only example. Bush strongly supports Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the Pakistani president who took power in a military coup, and plans to meet with him at the White House twice in the next week. Bush will also host Kazakhstan's president, Nursultan Nazarbayev, at the end of next week despite the suppression of opposition parties, newspapers and human rights groups in the oil-rich Central Asian republic.

The administration has likewise embraced autocratic leaders in such disparate places as Azerbaijan and Ethiopia while generally tempering criticism of anti-democratic policies in Russia and China. Even in the Middle East, Bush has treaded lightly in nudging allies such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia to reform.

On the other hand, the White House ratcheted up its pressure this month on the repressive government in Burma. After meeting with a dissident, Bush personally lobbied to get the U.N. Security Council to put Burma on the agenda last week for possible sanctions. And first lady Laura Bush hosted a roundtable at the United Nations on democracy in that country.

When the president talks about promoting democracy, as he did in New York on Tuesday, he focuses mainly on Iraq and Afghanistan. Some other countries that he once highlighted as success stories have been dropped from his speeches, most notably Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan.

In Ukraine, the popular coalition that led the "Orange Revolution" of December 2004 has splintered and the new prime minister is the same one the street protests targeted. In Kyrgyzstan, the brother of the president who took office after the revolution of March 2005 has been accused of trying to frame an opposition leader by planting a heroin-filled wooden doll in his luggage.

The coup in Thailand poses the latest challenge to Bush's commitment to "ending tyranny in our world," as he vowed in his second inaugural address. Aides said yesterday that he did not mention the coup in his U.N. speech because they were still gathering information, but they did not explain why he said nothing later in the day as it became clear that the military had ousted Thaksin.

"We're disappointed in the coup," White House press secretary Tony Snow said yesterday aboard Air Force One on the return flight to Washington. "We hope those who mounted it will make good, and make good swiftly, on their promises to restore democracy."

Thaksin had been a U.S. favorite for years, but relations soured recently when he was accused of abusing power for profit and undermining the parliament, the opposition and the media. Although Thaksin won reelection handily last year, the opposition took to the streets this year to protest the sale of the prime minister's family holdings in a telecommunications and satellite company for $1.9 billion -- tax-free. Thaksin announced he would step down, but he stayed in office with elections scheduled for this fall.

The distaste for Thaksin may have colored the tepid U.S. response. "Nobody wants to go to bat for Thaksin. He's just an odious figure," said Michael A. McFaul, director of Stanford University's Center on Democracy, Development and the Rule of Law. "But there's the problem -- democracy's not about picking winners and losers, it's about defending institutions."

Lorne W. Craner, former assistant secretary of state under Bush and now president of the International Republican Institute, agreed that U.S. concerns with Thaksin did not justify a coup. "You can't sanction a coup just because you don't like the guy if you're going to stand up for democracy," he said. "It's unconstitutional."

Analysis: Bush Policy Tempered (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, September 21, 2006

President Bush sees the world as a struggle between good and evil, but his push for democracy often collides with geopolitical reality.

Free elections handed power to Palestinian militants and led to a fractious government in Iraq. And he associates with leaders from Kazakhstan, Azerbaijan and authoritarian Mideast states that don't necessarily practice what he preaches.

In his speech to the U.N. General Assembly, Bush depicted the U.S. as leading the charge to defeat the forces of darkness and to spread freedom and democracy, particularly in the Middle East. "It is the calling of our generation," he said.

The refrain was echoed by Vice President Dick Cheney. "We know that the hopes of the civilized world ride with us," Cheney told an audience in Washington.

But the formulation doesn't always serve U.S. interests.

Bush commonly brushes aside the democracy debate to stand with hardline leaders who happen to be terror-war allies or economic partners.

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf — a general who seized power in a coup — will be at the White House on Friday and again next week. The president of Kazakhstan, Nursultan Nazarbayev, will be there Sept. 29. The president of Azerbaijan, Ilham Aliev, visited in April.

Human rights groups have criticized all three leaders. No matter. The two former Soviet republics are oil-rich allies in the war on terrorism and Musharraf is the leading U.S. partner in the Muslim world.

"The United States turns a blind eye to human rights abuses when it seems politically expedient," said Sam Zarifi of Human Rights Watch.

"The failure to uphold standards of democracy and push for some of the issues that President Bush has identified as being top in his mind erodes the U.S.'s ability to criticize other countries like Iran," said Zarifi, the group's Asia research director.

On Pakistan, human rights activists have said Bush should press Musharraf to restore civilian rule, end discrimination against women and stop using torture and arbitrary detention in counterrorism operations.

Bush remains on chummy terms with Russian President Vladimir Putin, despite Putin's moves to centralize authority and to restrict press and political freedoms. And in pushing for wider trade with China, Bush ignored complaints of democracy activists and evangelicals about Beijing's religious persecutions.

Meanwhile, democracy has not always turned out the way Bush had hoped.

A military coup suspended democratic government in Thailand this week. The militant Hamas group, sworn to Israel's destruction, swept Palestinian parliamentary elections in January. Iraq's elections produced a wobbly government that took months to form and fundamentalist Shiite leaders wield far-reaching influence amid rising sectarian violence.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai warned Thursday that efforts to build democracy in his country had suffered setbacks and that terrorism was rebounding, especially in the volatile south.

Emile A. Nakhleh, a recently retired top CIA expert on Islamic politics and institutions, said the U.S. "lost a generation of goodwill" in the Muslim world.

"The president's democratization and reform program for the Middle East has all but disappeared, except for official rhetoric," Nakhleh said in an interview posted on Harper's Magazine Web site Wednesday.

In Bush's good vs. evil world, there are certain leaders he refuses to meet, among them Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Syrian President Bashar Assad and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

In a General Assembly speech, Chavez on Wednesday called Bush "the devil.... He came here talking as if he were the owner of the world."

The day before, Ahmadinejad criticized U.S. policies in Iraq and Lebanon and accused Washington of abusing its veto power in the Security Council after Bush sought to assure Muslims he is not waging war with Islam.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the administration stands by its hope that "all the people in the region will be able to achieve a democracy in which they're able to speak freely and pursue their destinies freely."

Bush refused throughout his first term to meet with longtime Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, who died in 2004. Bush did meet in New York on Wednesday with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, a moderate with limited authority since the Hamas victory.

Bush still is pushing for a democratic Palestinian state alongside Israel. But, Deputy National Security Adviser Elliott Abrams told reporters: "He's well aware of the fact that conditions may, in the end, not exist to make it possible."

Bush, Cheney, and other administration officials often exaggerate the nature of the battle against Islamic terrorists, suggested Dan Benjamin, a Middle East analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"I don't think it's a struggle for civilization," Benjamin said. "I don't see any states being seized by jihadists anytime soon."

Bush At The U.N.: Another Political Masterstroke? (TIME)

By James Carney

Time, September 21, 2006

President Bush has been so busy lately giving speeches and taking questions about terrorism and Iraq and the ideological battle against Islamo-fascism that he's practically owned the airwaves. Which is exactly the way Karl Rove planned it. Bush's address at the United Nations General Assembly today may have been a long-scheduled, annual diplomatic event. But it was also a key piece in an elaborate Labor Day political strategy devised by the man whose job it is to keep Republicans in control of Congress in November and thereby salvage the President's legacy. In the past two and half weeks Bush has given a major address on detainee policy, a series of speeches surrounding the five-year anniversary of the 9/11 attacks and an extensive press conference — all of them covered as Presidential rather than political events by the cable channels and, for the most part, the broadcast networks. ABC even broke into its daytime programming to carry Bush's United Nations speech this morning. The result has been saturation coverage of the President talking tough on terror, just as Rove planned.

Democrats and some observers have argued that the old strategy — that making the election about national security, a traditional GOP strength — wouldn't work this time because voters have gotten wise to it and are generally fed up. But this morning's Gallup Poll numbers in USA Today suggest otherwise; Democrats may have reason to panic. Bush's approval at 44% isn't great, but it's a 12-month high. Still better news for the GOP is the so-called " generic " — in which likely voters say whether they plan to vote Republican or Democratic in congressional races this fall. The result — a 48-48% tie — is potentially catastrophic for the Democrats. Recent polling history suggests the Dems need at least a 5-point advantage in the generic just to break even in the mid-terms. This is just one poll, and it's just a snapshot. The Democrats' advantage may reappear. But for now, it's clear that Rove's strategy is working.

As politics, the President's United Nations speech was genius. It almost didn't matter what he said as long as he talked tough. He lectured the bad guys — Syria, Iran, Hamas, etc. — and promised to stay the course in Iraq. He invoked 9/11. He said he hoped for a diplomatic solution to the nuclear crisis with Iran but offered no new means to achieve it. He was Presidential. Expect another bump up in the polls.

Chavez Calls Bush 'Devil' At U.N. (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

NEW YORK -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez yesterday used his annual address to the United Nations to call President Bush "the devil himself" and "world dictator," topping the rhetorical blast of his Iranian counterpart the previous day.

Echoing Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's criticism of the current U.N. structure, Mr. Chavez said American dominance and a Security Council with veto-holding permanent members had made the world organization "worthless."

"The hegemonic pretensions of the American empire are placing at risk the very existence of the human species," Mr. Chavez said.

"The devil himself is right in the house. The devil came here yesterday, ... talking as if he owned the world," Mr. Chavez said. Then he crossed himself and added: "It still smells of sulfur today."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice declined "to dignify" the Venezuelan leader's comment, saying only, "I think it's not becoming for a head of state."

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, called the remarks a "comic-strip approach to international affairs."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said the Venezuelan people should "determine whether President Chavez represented them in a way they would have liked to have seen."

The "devil" comment elicited some giggles among the audience of presidents, prime ministers and diplomats from around the world, and Mr. Chavez's speech won light applause, although no one publicly sided with him. Still, it was not clear how much support his argument gathered among delegates.

Several diplomats said they were not surprised by Mr. Chavez's style and did not take him seriously. Others noted that the issue of U.N. reform deserved attention, but there are more appropriate ways to express one's opinion about Security Council members.

"I don't think anybody in this room could defend the system," Mr. Chavez said. "Let's be honest. The U.N. system born after the Second World War collapsed. It's worthless."

Mr. Ahmadinejad said in his speech to the General Assembly on Tuesday that some of the governments objecting to his country's nuclear program, which he insisted was for peaceful purposes, "have abused nuclear technology for nonpeaceful ends including the production of nuclear bombs."

"The question needs to be asked: If the governments of the United States or the United Kingdom, who are permanent members of the Security Council, commit aggression, occupation and violation of international law, which of the organs of the U.N. can take them to account?" the Iranian president said Tuesday night.

"As long as the council is unable to act on behalf of the entire international community in a transparent, just and democratic manner, it will neither be legitimate nor effective," he added.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett yesterday rejected the notion that the United States and Britain "are causing problems for the rest of the international community."

Also yesterday, the five veto-wielding Security Council members gave Iran a new deadline of early October to suspend uranium enrichment and begin negotiations on a package of incentives in order to avoid a nuclear showdown, European diplomats said.

Meanwhile, the Iranian president told Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi he is ready for nuclear talks with major powers but flexibility is needed on all sides.

"Ahmadinejad indicated that Iran is willing to negotiate but there needs to be flexibility on both sides," Mr. Prodi said in a written statement issued after his meeting with the Iranian leader during the U.N. general debate.

Mr. Chavez and Mr. Ahmadinejad have become good friends in the past year, and the Iranian leader made a much-publicized visit to Venezuela before flying to New York.

U.S. officials said that Mr. Chavez's speech yesterday had given the United Nations a glimpse of what it might expect if Venezuela succeeded in its bid for one of Latin America's two rotating seats on the Security Council, which is currently held by Argentina and will become available in January.

The Bush administration supports Guatemala's candidacy, and officials said their efforts to keep Mr. Chavez away from another U.N. forum would increase in the coming weeks and months.

The Security Council consists of 15 members. Ten are elected for two-year terms and do not have the veto power, which is reserved for each of the five permanent members -- the United States, Britain, China, France and Russia.

Chavez Launches Bush Broadside At U.N. (AP-Y)

By Ian James

AP, September 21, 2006

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez called President Bush "the devil" in a speech to the United Nations on Wednesday, making the sign of the cross in a dramatic gesture and accusing him of "talking as if he owned the world."

The fiery speech by the leftist leader, one of the Bush's staunchest critics abroad, was harsher in tone than that of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who sparred with Bush the previous day over Tehran's disputed nuclear program but avoided any personal insults.

"Yesterday, the devil came here," Chavez said, referring to Bush's address before the U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday. "Right here. Right here. And it smells of sulfur still today, this table that I am now standing in front of."

He then made the sign of the cross, brought his hands together as if praying and looked up at the ceiling.

"Yesterday, ladies and gentlemen, from this rostrum, the president of the United States, the gentleman to whom I refer as the devil, came here, talking as if he owned the world. Truly. As the owner of the world," Chavez said.

Chavez's words drew tentative giggles at times from the audience, but also applause at the end of the speech and when he called Bush the devil — a word he used no fewer than eight times.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Chavez's remarks were "not becoming for a head of state."

"I am not going to dignify a comment by the Venezuelan president to the president of the United States," Rice told reporters in New York. The main U.S. seat in the assembly hall was empty as Chavez spoke, though the U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told The Associated Press that a "junior note-taker" was present, as is customary "when governments like that speak."

The address appeared to be one of Chavez' boldest moves yet to lead an alliance of countries firmly opposed to the Bush administration. The speech came after the leftist leader crisscrossed the globe this summer visiting like-minded nations from Iran to Belarus.

The Venezuelan has become Latin America's leading voice against the U.S. government, and his speech was reminiscent of crusading addresses by his mentor Fidel Castro of Cuba and the late Argentine revolutionary Ernesto "Che" Guevara.

In his 23-minute address, Chavez also called Bush a "spokesman of imperialism" who was trying "to preserve the current pattern of domination, exploitation and pillage of the peoples of the world."

"An Alfred Hitchcock movie could use it as a scenario. I would even propose a title: `The Devil's Recipe,'" Chavez said.

He accused the U.S. of planning and financing a failed 2002 coup against him, a charge the U.S. denies. And he said the U.S. tries to impose its vision of democracy militarily in countries like Iran and Iraq.

"We appeal to the people of the United States and the world to halt this threat, which is like a sword hanging over our head," he said. "The imperialists see extremists everywhere. It's not that we are extremists. It's that the world is waking up."

At the start of his talk, Chavez held up a book by American writer Noam Chomsky, "Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance," and recommended it to everyone in the General Assembly, as well as to the American people.

"The people of the United States should read this ... instead of the watching Superman movies," Chavez later told reporters.

He called U.S. consumerism "madness," saying Americans have wasteful habits in using oil and energy. He held up a satellite photo showing the world at night, with bright light emanating from the U.S. and other wealthy countries.

Consuming less should be an environmental priority, he said, "instead of looking for oil" through the war in Iraq.

The United States continues to be the top buyer of Venezuelan oil, bringing the South American country billions of dollars in earnings that help fund Chavez's popular social programs.

Accusing Bush of neglecting the poor, Chavez started a program last winter for Venezuela's U.S.-based oil company Citgo to sell discounted heating oil to poor American families. It distributed more than 40 million gallons of oil last winter to low-income Americans, and Chavez announced a doubling of that this winter.

Chavez also lambasted the U.S. government for trying to block Venezuela's campaign for a seat in the U.N. Security Council. He said if chosen over U.S.-favorite Guatemala in a secret-ballot U.N. vote next month, Venezuela would be "the voice of the Third World."

The council currently consists of five permanent members with veto power — the United States, Britain, Russia, China and France — and 10 non-permanent members who serve two-year terms and have no power to veto resolutions.

The U.S. argues that Venezuela — closely allied with Iran, Syria and Cuba — would be a disruptive force. The campaign for a U.N. seat is shaping up to be a formidable diplomatic test for Chavez, gauging his ability to lobby head-to-head against the United States.

Chavez said the U.N. in its current system "doesn't work" and is "antidemocratic." He called for the world body to be overhauled, saying the U.S. government's "immoral veto" had allowed recent Israeli bombings of Lebanon to continue unabated for more than a month.

The Mideast was in the spotlight, with ministers from the Quartet that drafted the stalled so-called "road map" peace plan — the U.S., the U.N., the European Union and Russia — planning to meet. The Security Council also was scheduled to hold a ministerial meeting Thursday that Arab leaders hope will help revive the peace process.

On Wednesday, Bush met with Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas and described him as "a man of peace" who can help move forward the stalled peace process.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai also addressed the General Assembly, warning that terrorism is rebounding in his country. He said efforts to build democracy there had suffered setbacks over the past year as violence increased, especially in the volatile south where NATO forces have been battling Taliban militants in some of the fiercest battles since the hard-line government was toppled in 2001.

"We have seen terrorism rebounding as terrorists have infiltrated our borders to step up their murderous campaign against our people," he told the General Assembly.

He also expressed concern about "the increased incidents of Islamophobia in the West," saying it does not "bode well for the cause of building understanding and cooperation across civilizations."

Chávez Refers To Bush As 'the Devil' At The U.N. (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, September 21, 2006

NEW YORK — Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez called President Bush "the devil" Wednesday in a rare personal attack on the floor of the U.N. General Assembly. The fiery speech challenged Bush's assertive foreign policy in an effort to galvanize anti-American sentiment.

"Yesterday, the devil came here … and it smells of sulfur still today," said Chávez, whose international reputation has grown largely on the strength of his opposition to U.S. policy. Chávez said Bush was "talking as if he owned the world."

His remarks came one day after Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad gave a speech at the United Nations in which he defended his country's nuclear program. The United States has demanded that Iran stop its uranium-enrichment program.

The United States dismissed Chávez's remarks. U.N. Ambassador John Bolton called Chávez's speech a "comic strip approach to international affairs."

"Too bad President Chávez doesn't extend the same freedom of speech and the press to the people of Venezuela," he said.

In his remarks Tuesday, Bush urged member nations to back efforts to forge democracy in the Middle East, including new governments in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"From Beirut to Baghdad, people are making the choice for freedom," said Bush, who ended his three days of diplomacy in New York after meeting Wednesday with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Israel got its opportunity to rebut critics at the U.N. podium Wednesday when Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni warned that Iranian leaders pose the biggest threat to international values. "There is no greater challenge to our values than that posed by the leaders of Iran," Livni said.

"They deny and mock the Holocaust," she said. "They speak proudly and openly of their desire to wipe Israel off the map. And now, by their actions, they pursue the weapons to achieve this objective, to imperil the region and to threaten the world."

Chávez scoffed at Bush's foreign policy goals. "They say they want to impose a democratic model," he said. "It's the false democracy of elites, and, I would say, a very original democracy that's imposed by weapons and bombs and firing weapons.

"What type of democracy do you impose with Marines and bombs?"

The vitriolic attack was rare, historians say. "It's pushing the envelope," said Stephen Schlesinger, author of Act of Creation: The Founding of the United Nations. "He's obviously trying to bait Bush."

Stanley Meisler, author of United Nations: The First Fifty Years, said he could not recall another example of such a personal attack.

The closest, he said, came when Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev banged his shoe on his desk at the General Assembly in 1960 to protest an anti-Soviet speech by a Filipino diplomat. Khrushchev, from the floor of the hall, called the diplomat, Lorenzo Sumulong, "a jerk, a stooge and a lackey of imperialism."

"There have been instances when countries have gone after other countries," said Linda Jamison, a senior fellow with the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "But personal attacks are unusual. It is, to some degree, unprecedented. And it's also shocking."

Chávez has become a leading Bush antagonist. He has established close ties with Cuban leader Fidel Castro and Ahmadinejad and given aid from oil revenue to regimes hostile to the United States.

Venezuela is the fourth-largest supplier — after Canada, Mexico and Saudi Arabia — of crude oil, gasoline and other petroleum imports to the USA, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

During his speech, delegates nodded their heads and smiled at some of Chávez's remarks. At times there were tentative giggles from the audience.

Chávez held up a book by American leftist writer Noam Chomsky titled Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance and recommended it to everyone in the General Assembly.

He likened Bush's policy to a scary movie.

"An Alfred Hitchcock movie could use it as a scenario," Chávez said. "I would even propose a title: The Devil's Recipe."

Chávez Rails Against 'devil' Bush At UN (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, September 21, 2006

Hugo Chávez, the Venezuelan president, assured his place in UN history on Wednesday by calling George W. Bush, the US president, "the devil" and saying he could still smell the "sulphur" hanging around the General Assembly chamber.

His diatribe against US "imperialism," and calls for a re-foundation of the United Nations, may be nothing new, but the grandeur of his stage and the applause he won hammered home the mounting sense of developing world anger at an organisation many countries believe to be irretrievably under the sway of rich western powers.

Mr Chávez's invective came one day after Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, the Iranian president, slammed the inequities of the Security Council, and Evo Morales, the indigenous Bolivian leader, brandished a coca leaf before the hall and called for an end to injustice.

While the 15-member Council has returned to centre stage in trying to resolve many of the world's most intractable crises, the General Assembly – of 192 countries – has found itself deadlocked over efforts to reform the way the UN is managed and how its resources are spent.

It cannot agree on a definition of terrorism, and has proved incapable of agreeing a strategy on nuclear non-proliferation.

All countries claim the UN needs reform, but the developing world is deeply sceptical of US efforts to overhaul its systems in the wake of the oil-for-food scandal, and believe the secretariat incapable of resisting the demands of its industrialised paymasters.

Even more moderate leaders such as Thabo Mbeki, the South African president, warned that unless the UN gave a greater voice to the poor it risked losing legitimacy. "For the UN to continue occupying its moral high ground, it has to reform urgently, and lead by practical example as to what it means to be democratic."

Mr Chávez was less forgiving. "Let's be honest," he said. "The UN system born after the second world war collapsed. It's worthless."

He suggested: "We could call a psychiatrist to analyse Wednesday's statement by the president of the United States," referring to Mr Bush's upbeat assessment of the situation in the Middle East.

"The hegemonistic pretensions of the American empire are placing at risk the very existence of the human species," he said. "We appeal to the people of the United States and of the world to halt this threat which is like a sword hanging over our heads."

Chavez Slams Bush, U.N. Before General Assembly (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez called President Bush "the devil" and pronounced the U.N. "worthless" in a fiery speech to the General Assembly on Wednesday, giving a preview of clashes to come if Venezuela wins a seat on the Security Council next year.

Standing at the lectern where Bush had delivered his speech the day before, Chavez said, "yesterday, the devil came here. Right here." He crossed himself. "Right here. And it smells of sulfur still today." Many diplomats in the vaulted chamber laughed and clapped.

Chavez criticized the United States for using the U.N. as a tool to dominate other countries, saying that "the government of the United States doesn't want peace. It wants to exploit its system of exploitation, of pillage, of hegemony through war."

The world body needs to be completely renewed if it is to be able to counter Washington's control, he said, declaring that "the U.N. system born after the Second World War collapsed. It's worthless."

To applause from the packed room, he objected that developing nations, "have no power to make any impact on the terrible situation in the world. And that is why Venezuela once again proposes, here, today, 20 September, that we re-establish the United Nations."

Many diplomats came just to hear what has become the most provocative bit of showmanship in an series of foreign policy speeches that are often soporific. The crowd in the hall did not include any senior U.S. diplomats, however. They boycotted the speech, leaving a young note taker to occupy one of the otherwise empty group of U.S. seats.

A White House spokesman said that Chavez's performance did not merit comment. U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said the speech was "insulting" and called it a "comic-strip approach to international affairs."

But Washington will have to take Venezuela seriously if it wins a vote this fall for the seat on the Security Council that by tradition goes to a Latin American nation. Of the 15 council seats, five are up for rotation every year, and Venezuela is competing with Guatemala to represent its region.

The campaign has divided Latin American. Guatemala has won the backing of the United States, along with Mexico, Nicaragua, Honduras, El Salvador, Costa Rica and Colombia.

Venezuela has won support from other nations that oppose U.S. policy and has used its oil money to bolster its likely vote total. Cuba, Bolivia, Brazil, Argentina, Paraguay, Uruguay and 15 Caribbean nations now back the Venezuelan bid.

Chile and other countries caught between the U.S. and Venezuela are searching for a compromise candidate. But so far, potential candidates, including the Dominican Republic, have been unwilling to risk Chavez's wrath by entering the race.

If the Latin American nations fail to reach a consensus, the entire General Assembly will hold a secret ballot next month to break the deadlock. The winner in that case would need to garner two-thirds of the General Assembly's 192 votes.

Chavez said the U.S. has launched "an immoral attack" to prevent his country from joining the Security Council. He accused the CIA of trying to kill him and described how his personal doctor and security chief had to stay in his locked airplane when it landed this week because U.S. immigration authorities would not allow them to enter the country.

Whether Chavez's speech helped or harmed his nation's bid was the subject of considerable discussion Wednesday.

More than half the U.N.'s member states are developing countries, many of whose leaders may find appeal in Chavez's message. And even among wealthier nations, his defiant speech struck a chord among those nursing resentment over Washington's treatment of the world body. Some simply found his speech entertaining.

Guatemala's ambassador to the U.N., Jorge Skinner-Klee, said that despite the laughter and applause, Chavez's speech helped Guatemala more than Venezuela.

"You can not attack what you want to be part of," he said. "We need to address the world in a rational manner, not a confrontational way."

Chavez has promised that if his country wins a seat, he will come often to the U.N. to use the bully pulpit of the Security Council to press for change and to stand up to the United States.

"It will be fun to have Venezuela in the Security Council," said Cesar Mayoral, the ambassador from Argentina, which strongly supports Venezuela. "But it will mean the end of consensus."

That prospect may make some nations uncomfortable, said one expert from an independent think tank on Latin America.

"I think he's playing a risky game," said Michael Shifter, vice president for policy at the Inter-American Dialogue.

"It's true that the U.S. is not very popular, but this kind of vitriolic discourse doesn't win a lot of support," he said. "The applause and warm reaction were understandable in that moment. But when countries have to confront the really polarizing, poisonous politics going on, they may think twice about their support for him."

In Venezuela, Chavez's speech produced divided reactions. In Caracas, the capital city, the official government television network installed a giant screen in Plaza Bolivar downtown to broadcast the address.

Luis Mercedo, an office worker, described the speech as "a dignified position that confronts imperialism." By contrast, Cristina Maldonado, 35, a bank employee, said that calling Bush the "devil" was a "shame because it doesn't represent the majority view of Venezuelans."

Political leaders of all persuasions jumped into the fray, supporting or criticizing the speech. Oswaldo Alvarez Paz, an ex-legislator and director of COPEI, an opposition party, said the speech was a calculated effort "to make an impact before the world" as part of Chavez's Security Council campaign.

Chavez's principal opponent in the Dec. 3 presidential elections, Manuel Rosales, slammed Chavez for "constantly generating a violent discourse, of aggression and permanent bellicosity."

Special correspondent Mery Mogollon in Caracas contributed to this report.

Iran Who? Venezuela Takes The Lead In A Battle Of Anti-U.S. Sound Bites (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 20 — In the end, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran lost the much-hyped war of words waged against President Bush at the General Assembly. A stealth opponent swooped in and took the prize.

Speaking on Wednesday from the same lectern Mr. Bush had occupied the day before, President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela announced, to gasps and even giggles: "The devil came here yesterday, right here.

"It smells of sulfur still today, this table that I am now standing in front of," he said.

Just hours before, Mr. Ahmadinejad took issue with the great Satan, too. But what a difference. Where Mr. Chávez was Khrushchevian, waving around books and stopping just short of shoe-banging, Mr. Ahmadinejad was flowery, almost Socratic in his description of behavior that only the devil would condone.

"By causing war and conflict, some are fast expanding their domination, accumulating greater wealth, while others endure poverty," Mr. Ahmadinejad lectured. "Some seek to rule the world relying on weapons and threats while others live in poverty. Some occupy the homelands of others, interfering in their affairs and controlling their oil and resources, while others are bombarded daily in their own homes, their children murdered in the streets."

Mr. Ahmadinejad, who has been known for inflammatory language in his sound bites at home, suggesting that Israel should be wiped off the map and denying the Holocaust, was much less direct in his United Nations speech, asking question after question.

An example: "The question needs to be asked: if the governments of the United States or the United Kingdom, who are permanent members of the Security Council, commit aggression, occupation and violation of international law, which of the organs of the U.N. can take them to account? Can a Council in which they are privileged members address their violations? Has this ever happened?"

Mr. Ahmadinejad's speech received all the buildup beforehand, particularly since he was scheduled on Tuesday, the same day as Mr. Bush. At the end of his speech, Mr. Ahmadinejad, as Mr. Bush did before him, received polite, diplomatic-style applause from the assembled officials, junior note-takers and various United Nations bureaucrats.

And for Mr. Chávez?

The gasps. The horrified giggles. The loud applause that lasted so long that the organization's officials had to tell the cheering group to cut it out.

President Bush's defenders noted that at least the United States had let Mr. Chávez and Mr. Ahmadinejad come here and say whatever they pleased without being thrown in jail. John R. Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations, who said that someone at the "junior note-taker" level was chronicling Mr. Chávez's speech for the United States, offered: "You know, it's a phenomenon of the United States that not only can he say those things in the General Assembly, he could walk over to Central Park and exercise freedom of speech in Central Park, too, and say pretty much whatever he wanted. Too bad President Chávez doesn't extend the same freedom of speech to the people of Venezuela."

For her part, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Mr. Chávez's comments were "not becoming of a head of state."

But compared with Mr. Ahmadinejad, Mr. Chávez was just more colorful. He brandished a copy of Noam Chomsky's "Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance" and recommended it to members of the General Assembly to read. Later, he told a news conference that one of his greatest regrets was not getting to meet Mr. Chomsky before he died. (Mr. Chomsky, 77, is still alive.)

DOJ_NMG_0066767

At that same news conference, just after his speech, he made eyes at a pretty Colombian journalist who asked him why he went around calling President Bush names. “Are you Colombian?” Mr. Chávez asked, performing a quick merengue move with his upper body and flashing her a grin.

He suggested that Americans read Mr. Chomsky’s book instead of spending all their time “watching Superman and Batman” movies.

Minutes later, at the same news conference, Mr. Chávez offered to double the amount of heating oil Venezuela donates to poor communities in the United States. He reminded reporters that Citgo, which is owned by Petróleos de Venezuela S.A., delivered free and discounted oil to Indian tribal reservations and low-income neighborhoods in the United States, including the Bronx.

“We are ready to double our oil donations,” Mr. Chávez said. “That is a Christian gesture.”

Mr. Ahmadinejad did not offer any Iranian oil to poor United States neighborhoods.

Venezuelan Leader Demonizes Bush (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 20 -- President Hugo Chavez, the combative Venezuelan leader, denounced President Bush in a U.N. speech Wednesday as a racist, imperialist "devil" who has devoted six years in office to military aggression and the oppression of the world's poorest people.

Speaking from the lectern where Bush spoke a day earlier, Chavez said he could still smell the sulfur -- a reference to the scent of Satan. Even by U.N. standards, where the United States is frequently criticized as the world's superpower, Chavez's remarks were exceptionally inflammatory. They were also received with a warm round of applause.

Chavez's address followed a series of strident speeches by U.S. adversaries, including Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir. Together, they represent an emboldened alliance of oil-rich states that defy U.S. demands to change their policies on a range of issues, including the development of nuclear technology and the role of U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur.

"Yesterday, ladies and gentlemen, from this rostrum, the president of the United States, the gentleman to whom I refer as the devil, came here, talking as if he owned the world," Chavez told the chamber of international diplomats. "I think we could call a psychiatrist to analyze yesterday's statement made by the president of the United States. As the spokesman of imperialism, he came to share his nostrums, to try to preserve the current pattern of domination, exploitation and pillage of the peoples of the world."

Bush administration officials dismissed Chavez's remarks as the ravings of a reckless political leader. "I'm not going to dignify a comment by the Venezuelan president towards the United States," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said. "I think it's not becoming for a head of state."

In an effort to bolster his case, Chavez waved a copy of Noam Chomsky's book "Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Domination" and recommended that everyone read it. The book, written by the American linguist and longtime critic of U.S. foreign policy, argues that the United States' pursuit of political supremacy is having devastating consequences for the majority of the world's people.

"The president of the United States came to talk to the peoples -- to the peoples of the world," Chavez said. "What would those peoples of the world tell him if they were given the floor? . . . I think I have some inkling of what the peoples of the south, the oppressed people, think. They would say, 'Yankee imperialist, go home.' "

"The world is waking up," he added. "I have the feeling, dear world dictator, that you are going to live the rest of your days as a nightmare because the rest of us are standing up, all those who are rising up against American imperialism."

Chavez's U.N. appearance is part of a Venezuelan campaign to gain election to the Latin American seat on the U.N. Security Council, a post that would place it in a position to challenge U.S. policies. The United States, which vigorously opposes Venezuela's candidacy, is supporting a competing bid for the post by Guatemala, a poor Central American republic with little political influence at the United Nations.

In portraying the United States as an imperial power, Chavez sought to evoke memories of the Cold War, when Third World revolutionaries such as Cuban President Fidel Castro (an ally and mentor of Chavez) and Zimbabwean leader Robert Mugabe delivered scathing attacks against the United States.

U.N. experts said that though Chavez's speech may resonate with delegations who oppose a new world order built around American power, it was so undiplomatic that it may undermine his chances of getting into the Security Council. It "confirms the worst stereotypes about the U.N. General Assembly being a circus sideshow filled with venom and rabid anti-Americanism," said Edward Luck, an expert on the United Nations at Columbia University. "I never thought anyone could make Ahmadinejad look like a moderate, but Chavez has done it."

Although Chavez is renowned for his caustic views on the Bush administration, some senior U.N. diplomats were startled by his statement. Asked if Chavez had gone too far, China's Foreign Minister Li Zhao Xing said: "He really said that? Are you sure? He would go that far?"

Britain's Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett suggested that the Chavez comments went beyond the pale of diplomatic protocol at the United Nations. "Even the Democrats wouldn't say that," she said.

Some of the world's poorest countries, such as Bolivia, sought to prove they could stand up to the United States. Bolivian President Evo Morales, a close ally of Chavez, chastised the Bush administration for adding his nation to a list of major drug-producing countries because it permits the cultivation of coca, which is consumed by many Bolivians as tea but is also used to make cocaine.

Holding a coca leaf in his hand, Morales told the General Assembly he would never yield to U.S. pressure to criminalize coca production. "With all respect to the government of the United States, we are not going to change anything. We do not need blackmail or threats," Morales said.

Anti-Americanism Is A Big Hit At U.N. (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

UNITED NATIONS -- A day after President Bush's speech at the same lectern here drew tepid applause, Venezuela's leader earned laughter and ovations from the world leaders on hand by calling Mr. Bush "the devil" and comparing the U.S. to a "sword hanging over our heads."

While President Hugo Chávez's anti-American jabs were hardly new, they marked a theatrical high point for an annual U.N. gathering where full-bore anti-Americanism is not only back in fashion, but also much appreciated by many in attendance.

The leaders of Iran, Venezuela and Bolivia have all delivered full-throated harangues this week against Mr. Bush and U.S. foreign policy. Less expected were persistent pokes delivered by more-centrist leaders from places such as Brazil or Mexico.

Speeches by leaders of 57 nations over the past two days -- and many more to come -- reveal a world body awash in grievances over trade, the Iraq war, perceived U.S. unilateralism, Washington's drug policy in Latin America and the "great powers" structure of the U.N. itself. All illustrate, some observers say, a rising chorus of discontent with the world order envisioned by the U.S.

"In their inflammatory and provocative way, Chávez and the others are expressing a sentiment that is deeply resentful of the way the U.S. uses its power," said Julia Sweig, a scholar at the Council on Foreign Relations and author of "Friendly Fire," a recent book on the rise of anti-Americanism.

"People who say these guys are just outliers are wrong," said Mark Weisbrot, a Latin America specialist at the Center for Economic and Policy Research, a left-leaning think tank in Washington. "They are saying things that many other leaders only think."

But this week's U.N. confab has put on full display a new generation of leaders in the Castro mold who revel in lobbing rhetorical missiles at Washington and lambasting U.S. policies abroad. And in the case of the Iranian and Venezuelan presidents, their fiery populism comes backed by soaring oil wealth, a lever Castro never had.

Bolivia's populist President Evo Morales, a former coca grower elected in December, drew a rousing response Tuesday when he pulled a coca leaf from his pocket during his speech to the General Assembly, then blasted the U.S. for its "neocolonialist" efforts to eradicate coca production.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad then took to the podium for a far more scathing and almost scholarly critique of the use of U.S. power, accusing the Bush administration of employing its nuclear and military might to intimidate other countries and to control the U.N. Security Council.

"Some seek to rule the world relying on weapons and threats, while others live in perpetual insecurity and danger," he said. In a theme echoed by many speakers, Mr. Ahmadinejad said that the U.S. and other powers, such as Britain, had turned the U.N. Security Council into "an instrument of threat and coercion" that now has to be reorganized.

Yet no one found a more receptive audience than Mr. Chávez, who got laughs right off when he raised high -- and highly recommended -- a copy of leftist professor Noam Chomsky's 2003 tome, "Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance."

According to Mr. Chávez, the book told everything one needs to know about the world. Then he lashed into Mr. Bush. "The devil came here yesterday. Right here," he said, pointing at the lectern before him. "It smells of sulfur still."

In his speech the day before, Mr. Bush had sought to speak directly to the citizens of undemocratic countries such as Iran and Syria, and to express U.S. support for a future free of extremism.

Mr. Chávez lashed into what he described as Mr. Bush's obsession with extremists, suggesting it was racist. "He looks at your color, brother, and he sees an extremist," he said to an audience made up largely of diplomats from Africa, the Middle East and Asia.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters that Mr. Chávez's remarks were "not becoming for a head of state." The U.S. ambassador to the U.N., John Bolton, called Mr. Chávez's antics "insulting" and said it was "too bad President Chávez doesn't extend the same freedom of speech to the people of Venezuela."

Mr. Chávez is campaigning heavily to win for Venezuela next year a rotating seat on the U.N. Security Council, and U.N. watchers say Mr. Chávez may well garner the 128 country votes needed to prevail.

Bush Praises Abbas As 'Man Of Courage' (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, September 21, 2006

President Bush on Wednesday called embattled Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas a "man of courage" for trying to revive Mideast peace talks despite a continued political stalemate with Hamas militants.

On the sidelines of a U.N. General Assembly meeting, Bush tried to breathe new life into negotiations to resolve the long-running conflict between the Israelis and Palestinians. Supporting the moderate Abbas was Bush's final undertaking before returning to Washington.

"In order to achieve this vision, there must be leaders willing to speak out and act on behalf of people who yearn for peace, and you are such a leader, Mr. President," Bush said after his 40-minute meeting with Abbas at a New York hotel. "I can't thank you enough for the courage you have shown."

Israel wants to reopen a serious dialogue with Abbas and work with him to establish a Palestinian state. But Abbas has been in a weakened position since January when Hamas, which seeks the destruction of Israel, won the Palestinian elections.

Abbas retains his position as president but he is caught between Hamas and the West, which considers Hamas a terrorist group and refuses to underwrite it with vital international aid. Abbas has tried to persuade Hamas leaders to moderate their anti-Israel policies and join with his Fatah Party in a coalition government, but the United States and Israel are leery of the plan.

"We look forward to your support and your help and your aid because we are in dire need for your help and support," Abbas said to an audience that included Bush and TV viewers. "Mr. President, we will always be faithful and truthful to peace and we will not disappoint you."

While Bush said Tuesday in a speech to the U.N. General Assembly that he views achieving Mideast peace as one of his presidency's "great objectives," he realizes it's an uphill battle.

"He's well aware of the fact that conditions may, in the end, not exist to make it possible," deputy national security adviser Elliott Abrams told reporters. "But he wants it understood that his interest, his commitment, his view that the establishment of a peaceful, democratic Palestinian state is very, very much in the interest of Palestinians and Israelis alike — none of that has changed."

Prospects for a return to active peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians have looked dim this year, partly because the political upheaval in both governments kept leaders' attention focused inward.

Israel has new leadership too following Ariel Sharon's sudden massive stroke. The new prime minister, Ehud Olmert, is on the defensive at home because of widespread dissatisfaction with the conduct and outcome of Israel's summer war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon.

Still, the Bush administration is focusing fresh attention on the Israel-Palestinian question as a foundation for initiatives in other areas of the Mideast.

Arab nations, including the few moderate states that are key to U.S. goals in Iraq, Iran and Lebanon, view improving the Palestinians' lot as essential. The festering grievances of the stateless Palestinians feed unrest and radicalism elsewhere.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is likely to travel to friendly Mideast nations next month, her first visit since a U.N.-brokered cease-fire ended the monthlong cross-border war in Lebanon. She met with moderate Arab nations Wednesday on the sidelines of the U.N. meeting.

Hamas has given no sign that it will meet international demands that would resolve the stalemate with Abbas and allow aid to flow: Renounce violence, recognize Israel and abide by agreements made by the previous secular Palestinian leadership.

Rice suggested to reporters that Hamas risks losing political traction among its own supporters as a result.

"It has been difficult for the Hamas-led government to actually deliver on its promises of a better life," Rice said.

Diplomats from the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations met Wednesday to take stock of the Mideast peace process. The group is the would-be shepherd for a U.S.-backed peace plan that would eventually establish an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel.

In a statement, the group welcomed the prospect of a meeting between Abbas and Olmert and welcomed Abbas' efforts to form a unified national government.

The group said it hopes any Palestinian national unity government would reflect the group's principles. European diplomats said that language could allow wiggle room for Hamas to moderate its position without taking the dramatic step of fully recognizing Israel, but U.S. officials disputed that.

US Gives Boost To Abbas' Unity Drive (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Mark Turner

Financial Times, September 21, 2006

Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president, on Wednesday received a significant diplomatic boost to his efforts to form a unity government after the Bush administration made its second concession in as many days to the European powers over a Middle East crisis.

The "Quartet" of the European Union, Russia, the United Nations and the US agreed to ease sanctions imposed on the Palestinians, called on Israel to release revenues due to the Palestinians and, most significantly, softened the language regarding international demands of the new government, once it is formed.

"The Americans have shown understanding and openness," Benita Ferrero-Waldner, the EU external relations commissioner, told the FT after the Quartet meeting in New York.

A day earlier, President George W. Bush had relented at the UN over Iran, putting his sanctions efforts on hold to give the Europeans more time to find a way to resume negotiations with Tehran over its nuclear programme.

Some European diplomats and UN officials saw the Bush administration adopting a more realistic foreign policy in the Middle East. At the same time the European powers appear more assertive, seeking to undo what they see as the damage caused by the US through its invasion of Iraq, the fallout from the Lebanon conflict and the continued Israeli-Palestinian impasse.

"There is a message to the Israelis that they should transfer to the Palestinians their due money," Ms Ferrero-Waldner said, referring to €500m ($760m) held by Israel in customs revenues and taxes. The Quartet also agreed to expand and extend the Temporary International Mechanism that passes aid and funding to the Palestinians while bypassing the Hamas government which the US and EU refuse to recognise.

A senior US official denied the US was going soft over the militant group Hamas which swept Palestinian parliamentary elections in January.

"There is not an erosion or softening of our position, but a strengthening of the common position," he told reporters. The Quartet was still demanding that a new Palestinian government that would include Hamas must adopt certain conditions, including recognition of Israel, he said.

"There is no nuance here," he said, referring to the Quartet statement which expressed the hope that a government of national unity would "reflect" the conditions previously set out by the Quartet, including recognition of Israel.

Mr Bush, meeting Mr Abbas in New York, described him as a "man of peace".

"We are in dire need of your help and support," Mr Abbas said.

Separately, the Palestinian president has floated a four-stage plan within the UN that would restart the peace process with Israel, starting with prisoner releases on both sides. Officials said he had not raised the plan with Mr Bush.

Margaret Beckett, the British foreign secretary, said there were growing questions over negotiations between Mr Abbas and Hamas, cautioning that "it was not quite clear whether the basis for discussions (on a unity government) still remains".

The new Abbas plan also envisaged an international conference, attended by the Quartet and Arab countries. Jacques Chirac, the French president, endorsed the conference idea during his speech to the UN General Assembly on Tuesday.

U.S. Supports Abbas In Bid To Assemble Unity Cabinet (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 20 — The Bush administration expressed support on Wednesday for the efforts by the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, to establish a national unity government with Hamas, but said the United States would continue to withhold aid from the Palestinian Authority.

Washington's European allies have been pushing President Bush to engage more fully in peace efforts in the Middle East. An announcement on Wednesday by the four powers of the so-called quartet that have been working to promote peace negotiations — the European Union, the United States, Russia and the United Nations — that they supported Mr. Abbas's efforts came as part of talks on the periphery of the General Assembly.

"The quartet welcomes the efforts of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to form a government of national unity, in the hope that the platform of such a government would reflect quartet principles and allow for early engagement," Secretary General Kofi Annan and foreign ministers of the quartet said in a statement.

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, said Wednesday that he believed the Palestinians were close to establishing a unity government. But he said he and his Hamas movement were not prepared to accept the demands made by Israel and Western countries.

His statements underscored the uphill battle facing Mr. Abbas as he seeks to restore international aid. "Conditions are being imposed on the Palestinian people," Mr. Haniya said as a rally in Gaza, according to Agence France-Presse.

Western countries have cut off money to the Palestinian Authority, and Israel has not turned over the $50 million a month in taxes and customs receipts that it collects on the Palestinians' behalf. The cutoffs came when Hamas won elections in January and then took over leadership of the Palestinian government.

The West and Israel want the Palestinian Authority to agree to three conditions: to recognize the right of Israel to exist, to forswear violence and to accept all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

"They want us to condemn the resistance and recognize agreements," Mr. Haniya said. But Hamas is committed to a platform that "does not recognize the legality of the occupation and reaffirms the legality of the resistance," he added.

The proposed unity government is intended to bring about a restoration of Western aid. But with increasing friction, the internal Palestinian talks were put on hold while Mr. Abbas is abroad, and some in his party are questioning the rationale for such a government if Hamas is not willing to meet the demands that could restore assistance.

President Bush met with Mr. Abbas in New York on Tuesday. Elliott Abrams, the deputy national security adviser, said Mr. Abbas had told White House officials that Hamas would strike a deal only under terms that allowed for some public ambiguity over its stand on Israel, even if it agreed to recognize previous agreements and Israel's right to exist.

But Mr. Abrams said the United States had argued that the Hamas leadership was being quite explicit in its anti-Israel stand and its support of terrorist tactics.

Abbas Appeals To Bush, Cites 'Dire Need' For Help (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

NEW YORK -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas pleaded with President Bush yesterday that his government is "in dire need" of U.S. aid and support as the two leaders sought to jump-start the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

Hours later, the Bush administration joined the European Union, the United Nations and Russia in calling on Israel to release $500 million in tax revenues it has collected on behalf of the Palestinian Authority but has refused to free up -- a move one U.N. official privately said was a concession by the White House.

"We look forward to your support and your help and your aid, because we are in dire need for your help and support," Mr. Abbas said after a 40-minute meeting with Mr. Bush. "Mr. President, we will always be faithful and truthful to peace, and we will not disappoint you."

"I can't thank you enough for the courage you have shown," Mr. Bush told Mr. Abbas.

Mr. Abbas, a member of the Fatah party, is trying to form a coalition government with Hamas, the terrorist group that won a majority in legislative elections earlier this year but has refused to renounce violence or recognize Israel's right to exist -- conditions the international community has set for major members to resume aid to the Palestinian Authority.

In the afternoon, foreign ministers of the Quartet -- composed of the United Nations, Russia, the United States and the European Union -- met for more than an hour to assess progress on the somewhat tattered "road map" to Middle East peace.

The statement they released afterward showed an incremental easing of pressure on the Palestinian Authority. The Quartet called on Israel to release the $500 million and endorsed a three-month continuation and an expansion of a separate EU-affiliated program.

The EU program collects and disburses through nongovernmental organizations money earmarked for humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people and funds to help the PA pay its civil servants.

"The Quartet noted that the resumption of transfers of tax and customs revenues collected by Israel on behalf of the Palestinian Authority would have a significant impact on the Palestinian economy," the group said.

The Quartet meeting, hosted by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, was attended by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, Finnish Foreign Minister Erkki Tuomioja on behalf of the European Union, as well as EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and EU external relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner.

"This is a strong statement," said a U.N. official involved with Middle East affairs, adding that "the Americans have conceded a bit," particularly in urging Israel to release the tax revenues.

Mr. Bush was wrapping up 48 hours in New York that included his address to the U.N. General Assembly and meetings with seven world leaders. In addition to trying to rally opposition to Iran's nuclear program, Mr. Bush spent much of his time trying to persuade Mr. Abbas and other Middle Eastern leaders he considers moderates to face radical Muslim movements in their countries.

That includes Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who is trying to keep order amid sectarian violence. The administration yesterday strenuously rejected reports that it is losing confidence in Mr. al-Maliki.

"That's absolutely false," said White House spokesman Tony Snow. "The man has been in power for barely more than 100 days and, frankly, there has been significant progress."

Mr. Bush, in an interview with CNN's Wolf Blitzer yesterday, said that both Army Gen. George Casey, the highest-ranking U.S. military official in Iraq, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad have confidence in Mr. al-Maliki.

In Reversal, Germany Will Join Lebanon Force (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

BERLIN, Sept. 20 — German warships will set sail for the Mediterranean on Thursday, after Parliament voted Wednesday to send up to 2,400 troops to patrol the waters off Lebanon. Haunted by the Holocaust, Germany had resisted sending soldiers to the Middle East for fear of potential clashes with Israeli troops.

The deployment, the country's first in the Middle East since World War II, was approved by a three-to-one ratio. It thrusts Germany into an uncertain phase of its steady development into a nation that projects military force outside its borders.

Chancellor Angela Merkel, whose government pushed for the deployment despite the deep misgivings of many Germans, described the mission as having a "historical dimension."

"There is perhaps no other area of the world," Mrs. Merkel said in Parliament, "where Germany's unique responsibility, the unique responsibility of every German government for the lessons of our past, is so clear."

German soldiers now patrol dusty towns in northern Afghanistan, jungles in central Africa and wooded hills in Bosnia and Kosovo.

To avoid conflicts with Israeli soldiers, this deployment will include no ground troops — only two frigates with helicopters, two supply ships and four fast-patrol boats. Even with a full complement of 2,400 troops, it would rank third in size for Germany's foreign deployments, after Afghanistan and the Balkans.

Still, Mrs. Merkel said it was Germany's duty to support the foreign peacekeeping force being assembled in southern Lebanon, to enforce a truce between Israel and the Hezbollah militia.

The German ships, which will try to prevent the smuggling of weapons to Hezbollah, are part of a maritime force that includes ships from Denmark, Norway, Sweden and the Netherlands. The German sailors will be authorized to stop ships suspected of carrying weapons — by force if necessary — board them, and turn them over to Lebanese authorities.

On Tuesday, the foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, said, "We in the international community are obliged to draw on our strength to help Lebanon as long as it is not itself in a position to do so."

Whether Germany should play any military role in the Middle East conflict has been a source of debate here for weeks. Parliament approved the mission a day after the chief of the Israeli military said Israel hoped to pull its last forces out of Lebanon by sundown on Friday.

The vote in the lower house of Parliament — 442 to 152, with 5 abstentions — was not a surprise, given the commanding majority of Mrs. Merkel's "grand coalition."

But opposition leaders voiced strident criticism, warning of the risks of sending troops to a volatile region where Germany has built up good will with its diplomacy rather than its military might.

"We should be under no illusions just because this is a navy mission and not a ground mission," said Guido Westerwelle, the leader of the opposition Free Democratic Party. Oskar Lafontaine, a leader of the Left Party, said Germany was risking terrorist attacks.

Germans have been on edge since August when the police discovered suitcases with unexploded bombs on two trains in western Germany. Two Lebanese men who had been living in Germany were arrested, and intelligence officials said the timing of the bungled plot might have been linked to the war.

Some critics said Mrs. Merkel's avowed support of Israel — combined with the decision to commit troops — would jeopardize Germany's traditional role as a go-between in the Middle East.

"In the past, Germany could be a mediator between Israel and the Palestinians," said Günter Meyer, director of the Center for Research on the Arab World at the University of Mainz. "But by clearly siding in this mission with the Israelis, we are alienating the rest of the Arab world."

The German public opposes the deployment, polls indicate, though people differ on how vociferously. Some of the opposition, experts say, is a reflexive tendency in postwar Germany toward pacifism. Some, they say, also reflects anger at how Israel conducted the war in its early days.

Critics fault Mrs. Merkel for not initiating a national debate about Germany's proliferating military engagements. The lack of discussion outside the capital could come back to haunt her, they say, should this deployment or, more likely, the Afghanistan mission, become messy.

"A lot of people are having doubts about these missions," said Rainer Arnold, a spokesman on military issues for the Social Democratic Party, which is in a coalition with Mrs. Merkel's Christian Democrats. "I'm very concerned about the risks to German soldiers in Afghanistan."

On Thursday, Parliament is expected to extend the army's mission in Afghanistan by a year, though.

Mr. Arnold said the German military would soon reach the limits in resources for foreign deployments, not because it lacks troops — 8,000 out of 250,000 military personnel are serving in foreign missions — but because it lacks the specialists these missions require.

"If you compare that with the United States, it's a smaller percentage," said Sascha Lange, an analyst at the German Institute for International and Security Affairs. "But we are in a transformation to make it possible to deploy troops outside of Germany, and this is only the beginning."

Israel: Pullout Unlikely Before Weekend (AP)

By Ravi Nessman, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

Israel's army chief said Wednesday his nation's troops were unlikely to withdraw from Lebanon by the weekend, as he initially predicted, because final details remained to be worked out with the U.N. peacekeepers taking their place.

The delay came even as the international peacekeeping mission grew to 5,000 troops, the number Israel said was needed before it could pull out of southern Lebanon. The force, known as UNIFIL, will eventually number 15,000.

Israel's troop presence in southern Lebanon had been as large as 30,000 during the fighting against Hezbollah guerrillas. But the army has slowly withdrawn the soldiers since a cease-fire took effect on Aug. 14, and international peacekeepers and the Lebanese army began deploying in the area. There are currently about 9,000 Lebanese soldiers there.

The Israeli army will not say how many of its troops remain in Lebanon, but the number is believed to be several thousand concentrated in three pockets along the border. The full withdrawal of Israeli troops will remove a remaining point of friction and help bolster the cease-fire.

Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz told Israeli lawmakers Tuesday that he hoped to bring the last soldier home before the start of the Jewish New Year, which begins Friday evening.

But Wednesday, he said that timetable did not appear realistic because of ongoing talks with the U.N. peacekeepers.

"We very much hoped it would happen by Friday, but in the dialogue we have been holding with the United Nations and the Lebanese army, there are a few issues to be wrapped up," he said.

"I hope it will take place in the next few days, but it looks likely to be after the holiday," he said. The New Year holiday ends Sunday evening.

The fighting between Israel and Hezbollah began July 12 when the Lebanese guerrilla group crossed the border and attacked an army patrol, capturing two Israeli soldiers. The fighting ended after 34 days with more than 850 Lebanese and 150 Israelis killed.

UNIFIL commander Maj. Gen. Alain Pelligrini said in a statement that a meeting took place Tuesday between senior Israeli and Lebanese officers and top U.N. peacekeepers.

"The meeting was positive, we are making progress," he said, adding the Israeli army withdrawal and the Lebanese army deployments were on track.

Commitments to the international force continued to grow Wednesday, with German lawmakers approving the deployment of warships to Lebanon's coast to stop arms shipments to Hezbollah.

Germany will send eight warships — its largest naval deployment since World War II — and lead the multinational naval force patrolling Lebanon's coast.

Wary of its Nazi past and the Holocaust, Germany ruled out sending ground troops to southern Lebanon to ensure that German soldiers do not get caught up in any confrontation with Israeli forces.

Rebuffing concern about the deployment, Chancellor Angela Merkel said Germany's history obligated it to help stabilize the region because Israel — as well as Lebanon — had given its approval for the naval mission.

That was "a signal of trust in Germany, in the country in whose name the destruction of the Jews and World War II began," Merkel said. "We should take such a signal seriously."

The German ships, which are to leave Thursday, are being accompanied by three from Denmark and are expected to take 10 to 14 days to reach the area. Greek, Italian and French warships are patrolling the Lebanese coast until they arrive.

Norway, Sweden and the Netherlands are also expected to send ships.

Also Wednesday, Malaysian officials said their country would contribute 360 members of the U.N. mission in Lebanon, after the United Nations approved the deployment.

Malaysia had previously offered to send as many as 1,000 troops, and Deputy Prime Minister Najib Razak said it remains ready to dispatch more peacekeepers if asked to.

The deployment comes despite Israel's initial objections to the involvement of countries without diplomatic relations with the Jewish state — including Malaysia and Indonesia. Israel later dropped objections to Indonesia's participation, although it was unclear if Malaysia was acceptable to Israel.

Meanwhile, a group of reserve soldiers, angry at Israel's conduct of the war, heckled Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert during a speech to members of his Kadima Party.

"Olmert, resign!" one said. "Take responsibility?" yelled another.

Security guards escorted some of the protesters out of the hall, and Olmert brushed off their criticisms, saying most Israelis agreed with his positions.

Reserve soldiers, many of whom said they were not properly equipped or trained for the battle, have taken the lead in protesting the government's war effort.

U.S. Urges Arab Help On Darfur (AP-Y)

By George Gedda

AP, September 21, 2006

The Bush administration has begun quietly urging Arab countries to help overcome Sudan's resistance to deploying 20,000 U.N. peacekeepers and police to the troubled Darfur region, the new U.S. special envoy for Sudan said Wednesday

In a telephone interview with The Associated Press, Andrew Natsios said U.S. contacts with Arab countries have begun. He declined to identify the countries.

"We are engaging and we are going to continue to engage with them," Natsios said. The initiative is based on the premise that as the humanitarian crisis in Darfur deepens, the Islamic government in Khartoum will be more receptive to pressure from fellow Arab countries than from non-Muslim countries.

The U.N. Security Council approved a resolution three weeks ago for the deployment a U.N. force, but the Sudanese government has rejected the plan.

Natsios expressed disappointment that China, a permanent member of the Security Council, has shown little willingness to lobby Sudan to accept peacekeepers. The two countries have close economic and political ties.

"The role of China cannot be overstated," said Natsios. "They are the country with the most influence with the Sudanese government."

With the humanitarian situation in Darfur worsening by the day, President Bush appointed Natsios as special envoy this week. Natsios was deeply involved in Darfur policy as administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development, a post he held from 2001 until early this year.

The African Union agreed Wednesday to extend the mandate of its underequipped peacekeeping forces in Darfur through the end of 2006.

The United Nations and many human rights groups say that since 2003, fighting between rebels and government-backed militias in Darfur has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million.

African Union Troops Will Remain In Darfur (WP/AP)

By Nick Wadhams

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 20 -- The African Union said Wednesday that it would extend the mandate of its peacekeeping force in Darfur through the end of the year, ensuring that international troops will remain in the war-torn Sudanese province for now.

The United Nations will provide material and logistical support to the mission, though Sudan is still resisting demands that the world body take over the mission from the African Union, said Burkina Faso President Blaise Compaore, head of the A.U. Peace and Security Council.

The decision was made in a morning meeting of the A.U. body also attended by U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan and Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir. When Bashir left about halfway through the meeting, he withheld comment except to shout "No!" when a reporter asked if he would allow the United Nations to take control of the peacekeepers.

An underfunded A.U. force in Darfur has been unable to stop the violence there. Both the African Union and the U.N. Security Council have called for the United Nations, with its superior funding and resources, to run the mission.

For now, the A.U. mission will be reinforced and infused with U.N. logistical and material support, Compaore said. "Sudan is disposed to work with the United Nations," he said.

The United Nations and many rights groups say that fighting between government troops, with the support of a militia called the Janjaweed, and rebel groups has left at least 200,000 people dead and displaced 2.5 million since 2003.

Bashir denies that there is a major humanitarian disaster there and said Tuesday that human rights groups have exaggerated the crisis in a bid for more money.

"The picture that volunteer organizations try to give in order to solicit more assistance and more aid has given a negative result," Bashir said at a news conference.

In a speech to the U.N. General Assembly earlier Tuesday, President Bush called the Darfur killings a genocide and said the A.U. force was "not strong enough" to protect the population. He called for the force to be strengthened and demanded that the United Nations take control.

The United States and its allies are weighing whether there are other options for confronting the Sudanese government, including the possibility of military intervention despite Bashir's objections.

It's The Bushes And Clintons, Finding Common Ground (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

It's not often that you see a current American president and his predecessor in New York City, on the same morning, trying to foster peace in the Muslim world, and trying to burnish their own legacies as statesmen.

Nor is it common to have the wife of one of them on hand to help out the other guy.

But there was President Bush meeting with the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, at the Waldorf-Astoria. And there was former President Bill Clinton convening a conference on global concerns at a nearby Sheraton, and listening to President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan chastise Pope Benedict XVI for the pope's remarks about Islam. And there was the first lady, Laura Bush, giving the Clinton conclave some juice by announcing a new project to deliver clean water to 10 million Africans by 2010.

Mr. Musharraf, echoing an old slogan of Mr. Clinton's, could have been reflecting the ethos of the Midtown diplomacy — not to mention the Bushes and the Clintons — when he told the conference that in dealing with all religious faiths, "This is a time to build bridges and not burn bridges."

In truth, it was just another day in the intriguing world of BushClinton (or ClintonBush, if you will): A world in which a Bush presidency begat a Clinton presidency that begat a Bush presidency that may lead to — well, one can speculate. In this world, the former presidents named Bush and Clinton are apparently thick as thieves, while son Bush and wife Clinton are regularly at odds over the geopolitical issues under discussion yesterday.

Certainly, though, no one was calling a Bush (or a Clinton) a devil as the two families overlapped at Mr. Clinton's conference. President Bush and Mr. Clinton had a pleasant-looking run-in at the United Nations on Tuesday afternoon, and Mr. Clinton warmly welcomed Mrs. Bush to his conference dais yesterday to announce the $10 million federal commitment for the water project.

She did so in front of an audience of hundreds of officials from developed and undeveloped nations, who first sat and listened to a list of Bush administration goals to support the third world. If there were Bush skeptics in the room, they were politely silent, and Mr. Clinton was beaming like a proud presidential spouse as he sat and listened to Mrs. Bush champion her husband's agenda.

The major speakers at the conference were a little less love-soaked and a good bit more opinionated, apparently to the applauding audience's delight.

Mr. Musharraf took the lead as news-making head of state. He said "a lot of tensions in the Muslim world" were caused by the furor involving Pope Benedict XVI's citation of a medieval text saying some of Muhammad's teachings were "evil and inhuman." Mr. Musharraf added that the pope's remarks "were most unwarranted."

"It is a time for interfaith harmony," Mr. Musharraf said later in the conference session. No one has the right, he continued, "to hurt anybody else's feelings, least of all at this time."

Referring to Muslims, Mr. Musharraf added: "The world thinks that we don't believe in democracy, we don't believe in modernization, we don't believe in secularism. Let me assure this house that Islam in theory believes in all of them."

Mr. Musharraf also said the continued presence of American troops in Afghanistan was contributing to the resurgence of the Taliban and was intensifying instability there.

"They are coming back because of the presence of foreign troops," he said. "There certainly is an antipathy to foreign presence in Afghanistan."

The Pakistani leader emphasized that in his view, the conflict between the Israeli and Palestinian governments remained the greatest threat to security and political stability in Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan and Lebanon.

"It lies at the core of everything," he said. "We must not open new fronts — we must start closing fronts."

Javier Solana, the foreign policy chief of the European Union, said he believed that "the Clinton parameters are still probably the best solution" to bringing peace to the Middle East, referring to the former president's aggressive diplomacy to mediate the Israeli-Palestinian disputes.

Mr. Solana also said clashes of ideology, religion, politics and economics went beyond the Israeli and Palestinian governments.

"The divide that persists in the world is more profound than we think, and we better be aware of that," he said. "It's not getting smaller, but growing."

In remarks that seemed aimed at the news media, Mr. Solana also warned that the West should not carelessly provoke Muslims even in the spirit of free speech and open thought. He made the comment when asked about the newspaper cartoons lampooning Muhammad last winter that led to a spasm of violence worldwide.

Mr. Clinton said that so far he had secured more than $2 billion in "commitments" from businesses and others to help address the themes of his conference: energy and climate change; mitigating religious and ethnic conflict; alleviating poverty; and global health.

The conference, known as the Clinton Global Initiative, lined up $2.5 billion from 300 sponsors last year.

US-China Launch 'economic Dialogue' (FT)

By Krishna Guha, Richard Mcgregor And Raphael Minder

Financial Times, September 21, 2006

The US and China on Wednesday announced the creation of a new "strategic economic dialogue" in which both countries would aim to grapple with the long-term issues arising from China's emergence as a leading economic power.

The dialogue will be led by Hank Paulson, the new US treasury secretary, and Wu Yi, the vice-premier responsible for trade and foreign investment policy. It will not directly address the vexed issue of China's renminbi policy or other near term issues, which will continue to be dealt with through existing bilateral contacts.

Each government will establish an inter-agency group bringing together top officials in economic and foreign policy, to support the strategic dialogue.

Mr Paulson and Ms Wu will meet twice a year, and the process will continue at a senior official level.

In a joint statement, Mr Paulson and Ms Wu said they had agreed to "focus on bilateral and global strategic issues of common interests and concerns."

They said the new dialogue would "promote economic co-operation and the growth of China-US relations" and contribute to "world economic development as well as global economic stability and security."

Mr Paulson and Ms Wu said President George W. Bush and President Hu Jintao "will strongly support and take an active role in the strategic economic dialogue."

The initiative dovetails with longstanding Chinese ambitions to elevate the US-China relationship into one unencumbered by the many difficult issues that divide them, such as piracy of intellectual property, the swelling trade imbalance and, to some extent, human rights.

"Whenever you have a higher level dialogue, it will be to the benefit of the overall relationship," said Yan Xuetong, international relations professor at Tsinghua University in Beijing.

"Because of Mr Paulson's background, they will talk more about economic issues, but I would regard this as a political dialogue as well."

A US senior administration official said the mechanism was the "first of its kind" in US international economic relations. She said the US wanted to build a "mature" and long-term economic relationship with China, as it has for instance with Europe.

The official said that the idea for the dialogue had come from Mr Paulson, and Mr Bush had proposed it in a telephone call to President Hu on August 21.

The US said likely themes include innovation, globalisation, energy security and the environment.

The US hopes the process will help lock in a continuing process of economic reform in China as the nation completes the implementation of its World Trade Organisation commitments.

Speaking in Cairns, Susan Schwab, the US ttrade representative, said that the new dialogue was "not inconsistent with existing groups."

Trade issues are now discussed in the Joint Commission on Commerce and Trade, established only four years again to handle difficult bilateral disputes.

The US side is jointly chaired by the USTR and the commerce ministry, and in China, by Ms Wu, who is also the chief point person for Mr Paulson.

U.S., China Plan Regular Talks On Long-Term Economic Issues (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

BEIJING -- The U.S. and China announced a top-level economic dialogue that they vowed would move their relationship beyond such day-to-day issues as currencies and copyright piracy.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, who will lead the cabinet-level U.S. team in semiannual meetings with Chinese counterparts, said yesterday that the approach will focus on longer-term concerns and will set the tone for better relations. Most importantly, he said, top officials from both countries will have a regular opportunity to sit down and talk privately about what their nations want most from each other.

"The key to working with the Chinese is being able to get access to all the right people at whatever level," said Mr. Paulson, who winds up a four-day trip to China tomorrow.

Among the issues the U.S. would like to broach are how China can change copycat manufacturing into genuine innovation and retool its economy to promote domestic consumption more than exports. China is particularly interested in energy conservation and environmental protection.

Whether the effort will be productive is uncertain. The U.S. had similar frustrations with Japan and its trade surplus during the late 1980s and 1990s. In the first Bush administration, the U.S. and Japan launched a "structural impediments initiative" aimed at getting Japan to deregulate and play by what the U.S. considered international rules. But it took until the Japanese economy fell into a recession, which lasted a decade, for Tokyo to make the changes.

The plan for the new meetings underscores the influence that Mr. Paulson, a former Goldman Sachs Group Inc. chief executive with long experience in China, has amassed only two months into his job. Mr. Paulson conceived the idea of the dialogue and secured President Bush's endorsement before taking office in July. Last month, the president telephoned his Chinese counterpart, Hu Jintao, to lobby for the plan. In less than a month, Mr. Paulson helped persuade the Chinese to sign on -- giving him something to bring home from this week's visit.

Administration officials believe the proposal appealed to Chinese leaders in part because it singled the country out for special treatment and, without making new demands or raising new complaints, overtly recognized its growing economic power.

The U.S.-China relationship has been fraught with perils recently, including American anger over alleged Chinese violations of U.S. intellectual-property rights, a spat over trade in auto parts, and persistent disagreement over the weak yuan, which U.S. companies say gives their Chinese competitors an unfair edge.

Washington officials said the top-level strategic discussions would elevate -- rather than distract from -- efforts to resolve those daily issues. "We hope with this dialogue we'll create confidence in and support for continued reform" of the Chinese economy, one senior administration official said.

Mr. Hu chose Vice Premier Wu Yi, considered by American officials to be an enthusiastic reformer, to lead China's side. Mr. Hu gave her "full decision-making authority across all aspects of the Chinese economy," according to the Treasury Department.

The first meeting is slated to take place in Beijing before year end, but the new approach might not be sufficient to cool anti-China ardor in the U.S. Congress. The Senate appears headed for a vote this month on a measure to impose stiff tariffs on Chinese goods to counter the alleged price advantage they receive from the country's weak currency.

"I have tremendous respect for Secretary Paulson, and if he brings back significant accomplishments from his trip, so much the better," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.). "However, we have had four years of talk. Everyone knows the Chinese are flouting the rules. We need action."

Furthermore, it isn't clear whether another discussion mechanism would necessarily improve bilateral relations. The U.S. and China already have at least nine two-way or multilateral commissions, dialogues, partnerships and forums that address particular aspects of their relationship, from health care to energy to trade policy. And Treasury officials have repeatedly asserted that they have constant contact with their Chinese counterparts over the bilateral trade deficit and other issues.

Mr. Paulson tapped Deborah Lehr, a former National Security Council official and one of his advisers at Goldman Sachs, to handle the practical and substantive details of the new dialogue.

--Bob Davis in Washington contributed to this article.

High-level Economic Talks Planned For U.S., China (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 21, 2006

BEIJING — The United States and China agreed on Wednesday to open high-level talks aimed at managing an increasingly complex and contentious commercial relationship.

DOJ_NMG_0066780

President Bush, who launched the proposal with an Aug. 21 phone call to Chinese President Hu Jintao, named Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to head the new "Strategic Economic Dialogue." Paulson, in Beijing for meetings with Chinese leaders, unveiled the initiative during an appearance with Chinese Vice Premier Wu Yi at China's Great Hall of the People.

"We're both thinking the same way," Paulson said. "This is a unique opportunity to create an initiative that reflects the 21st-century global economy and redefines the economic relationship between the United States and China."

The U.S. and China already engage in at least three sets of lower-level talks about various commercial issues. But Paulson says Wednesday's announcement marks a significant reshaping of the U.S. approach to China.

"The level we have here is unprecedented. There's never been anything close to it. That indicates how serious both sides are," he said in a late-night interview with reporters from five major newspapers.

Reflecting a negotiating style Paulson honed while CEO of Goldman Sachs, the new process will:

•Involve top decision makers in both countries, not their deputies.

•Replace the traditional scattershot tactic with a single negotiation that prioritizes economic disputes.

•Occur behind closed doors to facilitate frank brokering.

•Explicitly aim for an eventual understanding that benefits both sides.

China is the fastest-growing market for U.S. exporters. But U.S. manufacturers complain China keeps the value of its currency, the yuan, artificially low as an effective export subsidy, fueling an annual trade deficit of more than $200 billion.

Sens. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., are seeking a Senate vote next week on their proposal to slap tariffs on Chinese exports to the USA unless China revalues. On Wednesday, Schumer said: "We have had four years of talk. … We need action."

Paulson said that failing to launch a broader discussion with China raises the risk of today's irritations degenerating into "punitive actions … (or) trade wars." Chinese leaders, including the powerful Wu, likewise have become aware of the need to safeguard their most important trade link.

"They have a sense of doing some real things, including concessions to the U.S., to prevent too much protectionist pressure in the U.S.," says Shi Yinhong, professor of international relations at Beijing's Peoples' University. "If there's too much dissatisfaction, maybe the Congress will do things that really hurt the Chinese economy."

The new talks are scheduled to begin in Beijing before the end of the year. Follow-up meetings will alternate between Washington and Beijing.

Said Paulson: "We don't intend to sit around the table and write communiqués. We intend to get things done."

Why US Speaks Softly With China On Trade (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2006

America's economic point man is taking the tack of cooperation rather than confrontation on a visit to China this week, despite a widening trade deficit and disputes over everything from pirated movies to barriers that hinder US exports of auto parts.

It's a softer tone driven by China's rising economic power, by the interdependence of the two nations, and by a pragmatic approach to financial diplomacy.

But for Henry Paulson, America's new Treasury secretary, it also reflects an assessment of risk that may come as a surprise to many Americans.

For all its rapid strides, China is in some ways a fragile economy. That, trade experts say, is a danger not just to leaders in Beijing but to the world economy.

"If reform stalls, the Chinese economy will stall, and that is in nobody's interest," says Daniel Griswold, an economist at the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank in Washington. Paulson "understands that our interest is in a thriving, liberalizing China."

China has committed itself down the road to an increasingly market-based economy. Its surging output of electronics and other goods has been stunning - and unsettling to rival manufacturers in other nations.

But this doesn't mean China's path of progress will necessarily remain smooth. Among the challenges: an outdated financial system heavy on bad loans, state-owned businesses in distress, a volatile social rift between prosperous urbanites and the rural poor, and the looming burden of a rising elderly population. Paulson outlined China's challenges

Secretary Paulson pointed to many of these challenges in a major speech before heading overseas.

"The biggest risk we face is not that China will overtake the US," he said, "but that China won't move ahead with the reforms necessary to sustain its growth and to address the very serious problems facing the nation."

Paulson's stated goals for the US-China economic relationship have much in common with those of his predecessor, John Snow. Both put the issue of a more flexible Chinese currency high on their list - a move that could bolster the exports of struggling US manufacturers.

But Paulson's tone appears at once softer and more ambitious. He is not simply calling for change from Beijing officials. He expects to work with them regularly, building on the ties he established there in his career as a globe-trotting investment banker.

Wednesday, Paulson and a Chinese official announced the creation of a new high-level dialogue designed to deal with long-term issues between the two nations. At the same time, he has dampened expectations for any quick victories on issues such as the yuan-dollar exchange rate.

All this reflects a tempered approach to China at a time when critics continue to press the Bush administration for punitive measures if China is not responsive.

"Time is running out. I hope that Hank returns with tangible results," Sen. Charles Schumer (D) of New York said in a statement last week. He and Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina say they may have "no choice" but to call for a vote on their proposal that China face a 27.5 percent tariff in the US if Beijing fails to act on the currency issue.

His sentiment is backed up by many small- and medium-size manufacturing companies. Kevin Kearns, president of the US Business and Industry Council, said this week that America needs a get-tough approach. Use China's reliance on exports to the US and the threat that those sales could be lost, he suggested, to leverage concessions from Beijing. A trade war if US pushes too hard?

Many economists, however, caution that a trade war could harm both nations and the world economy. Their arguments include:

• The US and China, currently the twin engines of global growth, have become increasingly interdependent. Supporting gradual reforms, and a healthy Chinese economy, is more important than winning concessions.

• China's increasing clout makes it likely that its leaders will continue to make decisions based on perceptions of their own interests, not outside pressure.

• Even if the yuan were to rise sharply against the dollar, it is unclear how much impact that would have on the mammoth US trade deficit. America might simply import more from other nations, or pay more for imports from China.

Moreover, a large revaluation of the yuan might destabilize China.

"If they did it suddenly, their financial system might not be able to withstand the adversity," says Michael Cosgrove, an economist in Dallas who publishes the Econoclast newsletter.

A recent study, prepared for Congress's Joint Economic Committee, outlines a collection of challenges China confronts. It calls the banking system "dysfunctional," dominated by four state-owned banks and wrestling with a tide of nonperforming loans. One estimate, by the US accounting firm Ernst & Young, reckoned that the bad loans totaled $911 billion, or 41 percent of China's gross domestic product, at the end of last year.

China also has a jobless or underemployed "floating population" of some 140 million. By 2015, a decline in the working-age population promises to shore up the labor market.

But the flip side of that trend is an aging population without a social safety net. Already, this has distorted the economy by pushing China's domestic savings rate sky high. That's hindering the nation's hoped-for shift from an export-driven economy to one fueled more by domestic consumption.

"They themselves have come to the view that their current growth path is not sustainable," says Nicholas Lardy, an expert on China at the Institute for International Economics in Washington.

He says China is making headway with financial and other reforms.

Now it needs to find a way to boost domestic consumption while reducing runaway investment in industrial production - and to achieve this in lock step so that the economy doesn't slump. "The whole strategy is fraught with risk," Dr. Lardy says.

A more flexible exchange rate could help, he says. That would allow the central bank to focus more on domestic conditions and less on maintaining the yuan.

Paulson echoed that view in his recent speech on the global economy.

He spoke of "freeing up an inflexible currency regime" that hinders the development of a balanced economy. A more nimble monetary policy and financial system in China, he said, could "keep its economy from veering out of control." IMF pushes US, China on imbalance

Member nations of the International Monetary Fund are also nudging China and the US to do more to address imbalances in the world economy. To many, that means exchange-rate shifts in the dollar and yuan. It also means more saving (and less borrowing) in the US, and more consumption within China.

Lardy and others say China isn't fragile to the point of breaking. But it faces some tough transitions.

The reforms "will be when they feel it is in their interest to do so," Lardy says. "Paulson, at the margin, could help them see their way to the decision."

Thai Leader Says No Elections For A Year (AP)

By Sutin Wannabovorn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

Thailand's new military ruler, winning crucial royal backing for his bloodless coup, announced Wednesday that he would not call elections for another year. The U.S. and other Western nations expressed disapproval and urged a swift restoration of democracy.

Army commander Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, appearing relaxed and confident in his military uniform at his first news conference since seizing power Tuesday night, said he would serve as de facto prime minister for two weeks until the junta — which calls itself the Council of Administrative Reform — chooses a civilian to replace him and drafts an interim constitution.

Sondhi sealed the success of his coup by receiving royal endorsement as leader of the new junta, while ousted Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra, who watched events unfold from abroad, pondered his future and the threat of possible prosecution at home.

Receiving the imprimatur of revered King Bhumibol Adulyadej legitimizes the takeover, and should effectively quash any efforts at resistance by Thaksin's partisans. Thaksin's ouster followed a series of missteps that prompted many to accuse the prime minister of challenging the king's authority — an unpardonable act in this traditional Southeast Asian nation that is a popular vacation destination for Westerners.

There appeared to be a sense of relief among many Thais at the resolution of political tensions that had hung over the nation since the beginning of the year, when street demonstrations demanding Thaksin step down for alleged corruption and abuse of power gained momentum. Thailand has had no working legislature and only a caretaker government since February, when Thaksin dissolved parliament to hold new elections in an effort to reaffirm his mandate.

The presence of tanks and armed soldiers on the streets of Bangkok, a city of more than 10 million, was taken with good humor in an almost holiday atmosphere. Schools, government offices and the stock market were closed Wednesday but were to reopen Thursday.

There was also hope that a new regime could more effectively address an Islamic insurgency in the south that has resulted in more than 1,700 deaths in the last two years.

One insurgency leader voiced support for the coup in a statement released early Thursday.

"It is the right thing that the military has taken power," said Lukman B. Lima, an exiled leader in one of several groups fighting the central government for a separate Muslim state. "We hope that the political (situation) can be resolved."

In an e-mailed response to questions from The Associated Press, Lukman said that Sondhi was the "only one who knows the real problems" of the Muslim-dominated provinces of southern Thailand. Lukman, exiled in Sweden, is vice president of the Pattani United Liberation Organization.

Sondhi, a 59-year-old Muslim in a predominantly Buddhist country, had proposed several weeks ago opening talks with the separatists, but Thaksin's government vehemently opposed such a move.

"Thaksin's government has totally failed to quell the violence, so we are pinning our hope on the Council of Administrative Reform," said Srisompob Jitpiromsri, a political scientist from Prince of Songkhla University in the southern province of Pattani.

Outside Thailand, the coup drew criticism from several foreign governments and human rights groups, who expressed dismay at the overthrow of a popularly elected government.

The Bush administration denounced the coup and hinted that U.S. aid, military cooperation and improved trade relations might be in jeopardy.

"There is no justification for it," State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said. "It is a step backward for democracy."

Casey said U.S. assistance programs for Thailand had been put under review. At the White House, spokesman Tony Snow said negotiations on a free trade agreement with Thailand depended on restoration of democracy.

"We hope those who mounted it make good and make good swiftly on their (promise) to restore democracy," Snow said.

One of the stronger reactions came from the European Union, which demanded "that the military forces stand back and give way to the democratically elected political government."

Human Rights Watch said the military "should immediately restore fundamental human rights and protect those exercising their rights to free expression, association and assembly."

The economic fallout was still hard to judge. The stock market was closed, but in currency markets the Thai baht fell sharply, its weakness rippling out to other Asian currencies, including the Singapore dollar, Malaysian ringgit and Philippine peso. The International Monetary Fund, which bailed Thailand and some of its neighbors out of a financial crisis in the late 1990s, believed the region would be little affected, said the IMF's chief, Rodrigo de Rato.

"Thailand's economy is fundamentally strong," he said.

The swift and bloodless nature of the coup gave hope that the effects on Thailand's large tourist industry might be minimal, though several nations advised caution.

The U.S. Embassy, in an e-mail to its citizens living in Thailand, said while there had been no reports of violence, Americans should "monitor the situation closely, avoid large gatherings and exercise discretion when moving about" Bangkok.

"At this point, we are not advising Americans to leave Thailand; however, Americans planning to travel to Thailand may wish to carefully consider their options before traveling until the situation becomes clearer," the e-mail read.

Britain told its citizens in Thailand to stay in their homes, while Japan, Australia and Canada similarly advised caution.

Sondhi made two public appearances Wednesday, the first to make a brief formal announcement:

"We would like to reaffirm that we don't have any intention to rule the country and will return power to the Thai people as soon as possible," he said, flanked by the three armed forces chiefs and the national police chief.

His second appearance came at a news conference attended by about 300 Thai and foreign journalists. Seated on a stage, he spoke calmly but with confidence and smiled occasionally.

Sondhi said Thailand's foreign policy and international agreements will remain unchanged, and that new general elections will be held by October 2007.

He said the coup, the country's first in 15 years, was necessary to heal rifts in Thai society, and to end corruption, insults to the king, and what the general called Thaksin's attempts to destroy democratic institutions.

Although Thaksin handily won three general elections, opponents accused him of emasculating democratic institutions, including packing the state Election Commission with cronies and stifling media that were once among Asia's freest.

Thaksin had a power base among the rural majority, a previously neglected segment who benefited from his populist policies of government assistance.

The junta warned farmers and workers not to stage protests, and military roadblocks were set up on the outskirts of Bangkok, reportedly to keep Thaksin's supporters from reaching the capital.

Two minor pro-Thaksin demonstrations were briefly staged in Bangkok before being gently broken up by the authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0066784

Thaksin flew from New York, where he had been attending the U.N. General Assembly, to London, where he maintains a residence. He did not comment on his plans.

With Thaksin out of power, speculation has been rising on whether a new government might try to prosecute him for alleged corruption.

Asked if there would be moves to confiscate Thaksin's vast assets, Sondhi said "those who have committed wrongdoing have to be prosecuted according to the law."

Coup Leader Vows To Restore Democracy (FT)

By Amy Kazmin And Tom Burgis

Financial Times, September 21, 2006

Thailand's monarch on Thursday confirmed coup leader Sonthi Boonyarataklin as the head of the interim government.

The army chief behind Thailand's coup said on Wednesday he would step down in two weeks and promised fresh elections next year.

A day after ousting Thaksin Shinawatra, the country's controversial prime minister, General Sonthi Boonyaratkalin said he would appoint an interim prime minister to run the country until parliamentary elections under a new constitution in October 2007.

Gen Sonthi said that the Council for Administrative Reform – the name the coup leaders have given themselves – had "no intention of running the country by itself, and will return power, under the constitutional monarchy, to the people as soon as possible".

He added that the military was considering possible candidates for prime minister. "We want a person who loves democracy and constitutional monarchy," he told a news conference.

An announcement broadcast on Thai television on Wednesday night said that Thailand's revered King Bhumibol Adulyadej backed the country's new leadership. But the US appeared to take issue with the coup leaders' decision to hold no new elections for more than a year.

"We very much urge that democratic elections be held as soon as possible," the State Department said.

While tanks remained in position at Thailand's Government House on Wednesday, other parts of Bangkok were quiet as Thais stayed at home on what was declared a holiday. The military has banned gatherings of more than five people, and human rights activists expressed concern about civil liberties.

Mr Thaksin, who had been visiting New York for the annual meeting of the United Nations, flew to London, where he owns a flat and his daughter attends university. Diplomats said the ousted prime minister could face prosecution if he returned home.

The British government said it had no reason not to allow Mr Thaksin into the country and has not to date received any request for his extradition. A spokeswoman declined to comment on whether the British government considered Mr Thaksin the legitimate prime min-ister. However, the European Union called for the military to "give way to the democratically elected political government".

Gen Sonthi told foreign diplomats that there would not be a "witch hunt" against Mr Thaksin's loyalists. But Chitchai Wannasathit, a deputy prime minister, and Thammarak Issrangkura Na Ayutthaya, the defence minister, both members of Mr Thaksin's inner circle, are said to be in army custody as are several other of his key allies.

Mr Thaksin "caused an unprecedented rift in society, widespread corruption, nepotism and he interfered in independent agencies, crippling them," Gen Sonthi said on television.

Foreign investors indicated that Thailand would quickly get back to business.

"Thailand's economy is fundamentally strong and financial market reactions have been limited," said Rodrigo Rato, International Monetary Fund managing director.

Thai Coup Leader Delays Elections For A Year (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman And Ratchada Chitrada

USA Today, September 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066785

BANGKOK — A day after grabbing power in a bloodless coup, Thailand's army chief announced Wednesday that the military will postpone elections for a year while a constitution is drafted.

Despite international criticism, Thailand's king endorsed the military takeover that deposed Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra while he was out of the country Tuesday.

The army chief, Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, who led the coup, promised that the Thai armed forces will quickly surrender authority to a "neutral" caretaker prime minister.

"We will be in power for two weeks," Sondhi told reporters at military headquarters here. During that time, the country will be ruled by a six-member Council of Administrative Reform, made up of military and police officials. Parliamentary elections, which had been scheduled for this fall, will be pushed back until about October 2007, said Sondhi, 59.

Tuesday night's coup has been criticized by several countries, including the United States. "We hope those who mounted it will … make good swiftly on their promises to restore democracy," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

The takeover has been welcomed in the Thai capital. The urban elite have turned against Thaksin, even though he won re-election in February 2005.

King Bhumibol Adulyadej appointed Sondhi, a Muslim in a predominantly Buddhist country, as head of the council "in order to create peace in the country," according to an announcement Wednesday on state-run television.

Sondhi said the king, who is influential but has no official political role in Thailand, had not been involved in planning or executing the coup. "I am the one who decided to stage the coup," he said. "No one supported me."

The capital was calm Wednesday. Backpackers on Kao San Road barely noticed the political upheaval. "Nobody's up in arms about it," said Amy Farquhar, 21, a recent college graduate visiting from Aberdeen, Scotland.

The U.S. Embassy on its website advised Americans "to monitor the situation closely," but added, "At this point, we are not advising Americans to leave Thailand."

The political crisis had been building for months. Many of the capital's residents were tired of Thaksin's governing style and the way the former telecommunications tycoon blurred his private and government business.

In January, Thaksin's family maneuvered to skip taxes on the $1.9 billion sale of a controlling stake in its telecommunications empire to the investment arm of Singapore's government.

"He takes care of his cronies, and he looks out for his family," said grocer Thongdee Wonghaew, 64. When army tanks rolled into the prime minister's office complex Tuesday night, Wonghaew said, she brought the soldiers coffee and snacks.

A standoff between Thaksin and his opponents had paralyzed the Thai government for months. After intensifying street protests in January and February, Thaksin scheduled a snap election for April 2, hoping to win another popular mandate and silence his critics.

The opposition staged a boycott. Thai courts jailed three election commissioners accused of favoring Thaksin's political party and annulled the election as undemocratic and unconstitutional. New elections had been scheduled for October or November.

Thaksin was in New York for a meeting of the United Nations General Assembly when the coup occurred. He flew to London on Wednesday. It's unclear whether he will try to return to Thailand.

He still has strong support in the countryside. "He promised to give free cows, and he did," said Sutatip Sritao, 44, a farmer in Khonkaen in northeastern Thailand's Isan province, a Thaksin stronghold. "If Thaksin is not around, I won't vote for anyone else." Rural Thais have not come out strongly against the coup.

Political scientist Neil Englehart of Bowling Green State University warned that support for the coup could disappear if the military doesn't hand power to an elected government.

"If the military can keep up the impression that they have acted for the good of the nation, then opposition is likely to be muted," he said. "If it appears that they want to stay in power, opposition will get stronger."

Thai Coup Uproots A Thin Democracy (CSM)

By Simon Montlake And Daniel Ten Kate

BEIJING AND BANGKOK

A bloodless coup in Thailand has upended the country's fragile democracy, to the delight of many middle-class activists who had campaigned for months for the removal of Thaksin Shinawatra, the populist prime minister. But the manner of his removal by Army officers loyal to the Thai monarch exposes the shallow roots of the democratic institutions that grew in the shadow of past military regimes.

Mr. Thaksin, whose party has won three elections since 2001, had repeatedly accused his opponents of plotting a coup. Wednesday, Thailand's king endorsed the military coup leaders, who have pledged to restore civilian rule within weeks.

The readiness of self-styled democrats to condone the military action reflects the conservative grounding of Thailand's urban political culture, which is shaped more by royalist hierarchy than well-defined checks and balances on a strong executive.

"They should use the rule of law to pin him down, rather than use a gun to get him out," says Pasuk Phongpaichit, coauthor of a critical biography on Thaksin. "I think it's important now that the coup group puts in place a new Constitution very quickly, or it could backfire and impact the economy."

Other critics of Thaksin, however, say that given his lock on the political system, and gutting of institutional checks and balances, there was no other way to end the stalemate. Thaksin packed courts with allies, politicized the nominally nonpartisan Senate, and muzzled television news. During a 2003 antidrugs campaign, Thaksin cheered when over 2,000 suspected dealers were shot dead in what rights groups called extrajudicial killings.

"There was no peaceful solution because Thaksin didn't play by the rules of the game, he only played by his own rules. We've tried all possible means to remove Thaksin," says Kasit Piromya, a member of the opposition Democrat Party and former ambassador to the US. "Thailand has not been a democracy for the past five years. Thaksin turned the whole democratic system into an authoritarian regime."

The coup leaders described their action as a response to deepening social rifts and to widespread corruption. "The government's rule was widely tainted with corruption and to benefit cronies," said Army commander Sondhi Boonyarataklin. "Letting that situation continue could have hurt the nation's security and economy."

The new ruling council has the power to censor domestic and foreign news reports and ban public gatherings of five or more people. But General Sondhi vowed to restore constitutional rule and undertake political reforms - a rallying cry of the opposition parties in Parliament - within two weeks. He said no action would be taken against members of the ousted government. However, several Army officers loyal to Thaksin have reportedly been detained, including the head of the civilian intelligence agency.

As for Thaksin himself, it remains unclear if he would return immediately to Thailand or seek diplomatic support as the leader of a government-in-exile, said an aide. Thailand is a close US ally and Thaksin has positioned himself as a trusted partner in the US-led war on terror. Thai news reports said Thaksin flew Wednesday to London where his daughter is enrolled in university.

The coup leaders might face a situation down the road where Thaksin returns - and wins another election.

On the streets, Bangkok residents wearied by months of political gridlock struck a note of cautious support for the coup. But many also said they would again vote for Thaksin if he returns to politics. "I was glad we had a coup because the political problem had gone on for such a long time," said Rittiporn Yomrum, a motorcycle driver. "But I would still vote for [him] again."

Analysts say the coup-prone military has to move quickly to install a civilian administration under royal endorsement in order to preempt any public backlash. The last time the military seized power in 1991, the public mood soured after the coup leader clung to office, then ordered a violent crackdown on protesters in Bangkok the following year. King Bhumibol then intervened to steer the country back from the brink of further civil strife.

Memories of that bloody event were revived this year by a wave of anti-Thaksin protests in the run-up to an April election that was later annulled by the Constitutional Court. A new vote was due to be run in November by a newly elected commission.

Analysts had predicted another win for Thaksin, who commands the loyalty of millions of rural Thais. He gained their support with subsidized healthcare, a freeze on farmers' debts, and cheap loans to villages.

But middle-class voters began turning their backs, angered by reports of widespread corruption in Thaksin's cabinet and his brash style of governing and refusal to countenance public criticism. Urban elites were dismayed by the appointment of his family to key roles in the military and police, and his attempts to radically overhaul the top-heavy government bureaucracy.

Unable to win at the ballot box, Thaksin's opponents now seem ready to turn the clock back on the gains of the 1990s, when the Constitution was changed to promote more stable parliamentary politics, a shift that spawned Thaksin's winning party machine, at the expense of the royalist old guard.

Thaksin made few efforts to woo the palace during his first term, ignoring protocol that for decades has put the monarchy above elected officials. The king offered only indirect criticism of Thaksin, leaving it to his aides to deliver public rebukes.

Foreign diplomats were caught off-guard by the coup timing, given the unfavorable light it casts on Thailand at the UN and the preparations to rerun the elections.

"It seems almost idiotic to do this right as Thaksin is about to get up on the biggest stage in the world," a Western diplomat says. "There was no real obstruction to reform or a national election."

Many In Bangkok Embrace Military Takeover (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

BANGKOK, Sept. 20 -- Jubilant crowds in this sultry capital embraced Thailand's new military leadership on Wednesday, as Thais showered soldiers with flowers, posed for photos with tanks and welcomed a bloodless coup that deposed Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra a day earlier.

Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratkalin, the army chief who led the rebellion and who is now acting prime minister, vowed that an interim leader would be appointed within two weeks. But in an indication that the restoration of democracy is a long way off, he made clear that elections may wait until October 2007, after the drafting of a new constitution.

For now, the military remains in control of a country that had become one of the strongest beacons of democracy in Southeast Asia. Provincial governors -- including many still loyal to Thaksin -- are being forced to report to four regional army commanders. To prevent any uprisings among Thaksin's supporters, based in the rural north and northeast, the provisional military authority also advised farmers to "remain calm" and banned political gatherings of five or more people. Some television and radio reports have been blocked or censored.

Despite the new period of uncertainty, ushered in by a coup that was denounced by the United States and other foreign governments, many Thais in the capital appeared overjoyed.

"Democracy has won!" said an ecstatic Orathai Dechodomphan, 59, a tailor and Thaksin opponent who joined hundreds of people handing out roses to soldiers near the army headquarters. "Thaksin tried to steal power and did not respect our king. He never would have left on his own. What happened yesterday is our first step toward recovering a real democracy."

King Bhumibol Adulyadej, who was seen by many here as having effectively allowed Thaksin's removal, endorsed Sonthi, appointing him the official head of a new governing council charged with creating "peace in the country," according to an announcement televised nationally.

Sonthi is close to the king, and there had been speculation that the monarch played a role in the coup. Sonthi dismissed those suggestions Wednesday, telling reporters: "I am the one who decided to stage the coup. No one supported me."

The general, who only a week ago had ruled out the chance of a coup, said the military had been forced to act because Thaksin's moves to remain in power had divided the country. At the same time, Sonthi said, Thaksin's actions were dangerously bordering on lese-majeste, a powerful charge in a country where the king is widely revered.

The ousted prime minister, a billionaire tycoon who rose to power in 2001, was extremely popular among rural Thais largely because of a series of lucrative local programs he backed. But allegations of corruption and abuse of power earned him the hostility of the country's elite, mostly in Bangkok. He had been accused of monopolizing the media, altering the constitution to enhance his powers and stocking electoral commissions with his supporters. He was also scorned for mishandling the increasingly violent Islamic insurgency in the south of Thailand, a mostly Buddhist country.

In a public opinion poll released Wednesday by Rajabhat Suan Dusit University, almost 84 percent of respondents supported the coup. The overwhelming majority of those taking part in the poll were from the capital.

Sonthi suggested that Thaksin could face prosecution if he returned to Thailand. Thaksin, for his part, did not immediately appear ready to stage a comeback. "I volunteer to work for the country," he told the Thai News Agency in London, where he arrived Wednesday after departing early from the opening session of the U.N. General Assembly. "If they don't want me to do that, I won't."

Thaksin received international support. The European Union demanded "that the military forces stand back and give way to the democratically elected political government." The Bush administration denounced the coup and said negotiations on a free-trade agreement with Thailand depended on restoration of democracy.

Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, called the developments a "step back for democracy."

Sonthi insisted the military had no interest in maintaining power. "We have two weeks; after two weeks, we step out," he said, referring to his search for a caretaker prime minister, who analysts say would probably still operate under the scrutiny of the military.

While activists who had long sought Thaksin's ouster cheered the military's move, some opposition leaders acknowledged that Thailand must find some way out of its political crisis.

"Of course we would have liked to see this handled another way, but we also recognize that Thaksin's abuse of power had grown to the breaking point," said Abhisit Vejjajiva, head of the main opposition Democrat Party. "Now, at least, we will see a new constitution written and the path of a clean electoral process. That is what the people of Thailand want and deserve."

Diplomatic sources and Thai officials said there was little indication that the remaining Thaksin loyalists in the military and police would attempt to resist the coup. Although analysts said such a response could not yet be ruled out, Bangkok newspapers reported that at least two high-ranking military figures linked to Thaksin had pledged allegiance instead to Sonthi's "political reform council."

[Early Thursday, Lukman B. Lima, an exiled leader in one of several groups fighting the central government for a separate Muslim state, told the Associated Press that "it is the right thing that the military has taken power" and that Sonthi was the "only one who knows the real problems" of the Muslim-dominated provinces of southern Thailand.]

Thailand has suffered 17 successful or attempted military takeovers, but Tuesday's was the first in 15 years and something of a shock for Thais who thought they had left the days of coups behind. Many leading opposition figures have called this coup different in nature from the others -- mostly because the military is being trusted to simply act as a caretaker and restorer of democracy -- but others here recalled the coup in 1991. A year after that takeover, when pro-democracy activists began demonstrating against the interim military commander, at least 50 people were gunned down by troops.

"We are entering another vicious circle in Thailand -- of coups, democracy, corruption and more coups," said Thitinan Pongsudhirak, a political analyst at Bangkok's Chulalongkorn University. "We had hoped that we would get beyond this. We went 15 years without a military intervention, but clearly recent events have shown that we have yet to escape that cycle."

U.S. 'Disappointed' In Thailand Coup (AP-Y)

The Bush administration on Wednesday denounced the military coup that seized control of Thailand and hinted that U.S. aid and improved trade relations might be in jeopardy.

"There is no justification for it," said State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey, adding, "It is a step backward for democracy."

Casey said U.S. assistance programs for Thailand had been put under review. At the White House, spokesman Tony Snow said negotations on a free trade agreement with Thailand depended on restoration of democracy.

"We hope those who mounted it make good and make good swiftly on their (promise) to restore democracy," Snow said as President Bush returned to Washington from a speech and meetings at the United Nations in New York.

The coup leaders Tuesday seized control from a government headed by Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra, suspended the Constitution and declared martial law in Bangkok, the capital.

The army commander who led the coup said elections would be held by October 2007.

The military took control while the prime minister was in New York preparing to address the special session of the U.N. General Assembly.

"The most important thing is to see a restoration of constitutional rule as soon as possible," Casey said.

Thailand's Leap Backward (WP)

THAILAND'S ARMY commander claimed yesterday that the military coup against the country's democratic government on Tuesday was necessary to end corruption and domestic political conflict. In fact the principal result of his condemnable action will probably be to worsen both. Thailand has a history of military coups, but for the past 15 years the army had appeared to accept the fact that such interventions invariably harmed rather than helped the country. Now the lesson will have to be learned again.

Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratkalin, who led the coup, said yesterday that the military did not want to rule; he promised to restore civilian government in a couple of weeks. But his intervention, which apparently had the support of King Bhumibol Adulyadej, was clearly intended to end the career of Thailand's most popular civilian politician, Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra. Mr. Thaksin was a bad leader who himself weakened Thai democracy by trying to intimidate and monopolize the media and by supporting brutal tactics in campaigns against drug traffickers and Muslim separatists. But it's pretty clear that he was supported by a majority of Thais and that his party would have won the parliamentary election that was to have been held this fall.

Gen. Sonthi said yesterday that the parliamentary election would be put off for a year while Thailand's constitution -- which he suspended -- is rewritten. That agenda may have the support of some Thai political parties, whose members have been trying all year to force Mr. Thaksin from power through such undemocratic means as street demonstrations. The coming constitutional reforms will probably be aimed at preventing prime ministers from monopolizing power, as Mr. Thaksin tried to do. But such reform could have been achieved through the democratic system; now it will be overseen by military officers or civilian politicians who didn't -- or couldn't -- win an election.

Thailand's democratic allies should not tolerate this rupture. The Bush administration designated Thailand as a major non-NATO ally because of its cooperation in the war on terrorism, but now it must respect the U.S. law mandating a suspension of military aid in the event of a coup. The administration should join with allies such as Australia, Japan and the European Union in insisting that the interruption of democracy by the Thai military is unacceptable. The White House made a start yesterday by indicating that talks on a free-trade agreement would be suspended. It should go further: Any government appointed by the Thai military should be shunned and U.S.-Thai relations frozen until a free and fair election is held.

For King And Country? (WSJ)

By Colum Murphy

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

BANGKOK -- The teenage soldiers standing outside the Erawan Shrine here on Tuesday night seemed unusually calm, given the task at hand. With yellow ribbons tied to their machine guns -- signifying loyalty to King Bhumibol -- they chatted idly while guarding a key intersection. And in doing so, they played a bit part in Thailand's 18th coup -- the first in 15 years.

Hours earlier, talks mediated by the king's right-hand man, Privy Council President Gen. Prem Tinsulanonda, broke down between a section of the army that supported former Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra's government and sections that favored his ouster. Mr. Thaksin got wind of the plot from New York, where he was at the U.N. General Assembly, and declared a state of emergency. But by 11 p.m. back home, Army Chief Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratkalin took over Government House with little to no resistance.

Earlier that day, Gen. Prem, one-time prime minister and former commander-in-chief of the army, granted a rare interview at the white, modern Thai-style building that is home to the Privy Council. If he had an inkling of what was about to occur, the 86-year-old didn't show it. The crisply dressed general was unruffled and characteristically tight-lipped about the political turmoil that has plagued Thailand since February. But he reiterated what he said to the Royal Military Academy's graduating cadets this summer: "In this country, we belong to the king. The armed forces belong to the king." Ethics and moral standards, he added, are of paramount import for the governing class.

So how did the situation deteriorate so quickly? Mr. Thaksin's opponents accused him of corruption, cronyism and the hijacking of independent political institutions, such as the Election Commission. That led opposition leaders to band together and protest in the streets of Bangkok. Mr. Thaksin countered by holding a snap election in April. He won 57% of the vote.Since the opposition parties boycotted the election -- and technical reasons prevented a government from being formed -- on April 25 the king called on the courts to sort out the "mess." Between then and Tuesday evening, Thailand was under the authority of a caretaker government. Fresh elections were planned for later this year.

As late as July, few analysts foresaw that the situation would deteriorate into a coup d'etat. One exception is Ukrist Pathmanand, assistant director of the Institute of Asian Studies at Chulalongkorn University in Bangkok. According to Mr. Ukrist, division within the army was just a natural progression of the social divisions that were becoming more pronounced throughout Thai society -- divisions, he says, fostered by Mr. Thaksin and his Thai Rak Thai party. "It's bad to ban the constitution and ban the democratic process including elections," Mr. Ukrist said. "But I think this is a very special situation" -- namely, that the coup took place ahead of an opposition protest march originally scheduled for yesterday, but subsequently canceled. If it had proceeded, the demonstration surely would have drawn a crowd of pro-Thaksin supporters, resulting in clashes and the possible loss of lives, Mr. Ukrist believes.

Former Prime Minister Anand Panyarachun, who served under the previous military junta of 1991-92 and was head of the Constitution Drafting Assembly (1996-97) agrees. "I think you make two steps forward and retreat one step, you hope that you can catch up the steps you lose and that future steps would become even faster," he explained on a surprisingly calm afternoon, less than 24 hours after the coup. "It's not that every country has to emulate American democracy," he added. "It should be homegrown."

The idea of "Thai-style democracy" resonates with many Thais. It rests upon the authority of the king, who typically intervenes whenever a major critical crisis occurs. This is the only system that will work for Thailand, says Gen. Prem. "We will never be a republic or without a king," he said in his interview before the coup. "That is the only thing that induces the people together. . . . So long as we have this particular, very, very good king, we will go ahead either slowly or rapidly, but united."

However, a Thai-style solution to the current crisis runs the risk of treating the symptoms -- such as removing Mr. Thaksin -- without addressing the causes. As Mr. Ukrist suggested, Thai society has split between the urban elite and the rural poor, between an increasingly sophisticated middle class and a political system characterized by weak institutions and corruption.

Though painful, Thailand would be better off grappling with its political turmoil without resorting to the deus ex machina of military or royal intervention. The coup itself may not undermine confidence in Thailand's political stability. But the deep divisions in Thai society remain unresolved. Even if the junta can deliver free elections within a year, what guarantee is there that the same social conflicts won't resurface? That would herald a much more serious crisis -- because the Thai people have already tolerated a coup for change. If it fails, what comes after that won't be easy.

Abe Vows To Continue Policies For Japan Pursued By Koizumi (WSJ)

By Sebastian Moffett

TOKYO -- Shinzo Abe, chosen yesterday as leader of Japan's ruling party, pledged to continue the small-government policies pursued by current Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi.

The Liberal Democratic Party gave Mr. Abe 66% of its votes in a leadership election involving two other candidates. The LDP controls Parliament, so he is almost certain to become prime minister next Tuesday, when a special session meets to choose the next Japanese leader.

Mr. Abe immediately said he would broadly continue with the remodeling of Japan undertaken by Mr. Koizumi, who cast his vote for Mr. Abe in the election. Mr. Koizumi demanded after he took office in 2001 that the change-shy country "reform," and cut public spending to try to curb Japan's growing national debt. He privatized government-run bodies, notably the post office, and started to cut the number of public employees.

Yesterday, Mr. Abe said he would continue to rein in spending, while generating higher tax revenues by fostering economic growth. He said he would only later consider a rise in sales tax, which economists say is inevitable at some point, to cope with Japan's aging population.

"We must absolutely not stop reforming," he told reporters after the vote. "We must accelerate reforms."

The Japanese public generally likes Mr. Abe for his apparent combination of assertiveness and a calm demeanor. He first became popular when he negotiated the release of Japanese kidnapped by North Korea, and acquired an image as a robust defender of national interests.

But he is inexperienced for a Japanese prime minister. At 52 years old, he would be Japan's youngest premier since World War II. He has held his only major cabinet post -- Mr. Koizumi's chief cabinet secretary, an amalgam of spokesman and chief of staff -- for less than a year. What's more, he has a tough act to follow. Mr. Koizumi gave Japan its most vigorous leadership for decades, taking on vested interests in the LDP, forcing banks to clean up their bad loans, and making Japan more assertive abroad.

One area where Mr. Abe might stand out is foreign affairs. He favors a continuation of Japan's new assertiveness. But he is expected to be less brusque than Mr. Koizumi, who angered China with his annual visits to a controversial war shrine, and was not invited to visit Beijing.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang said he hopes Mr. Abe "works diligently at improving and developing China-Japan relations," according to a statement carried on the ministry Web site.

Mr. Abe indicated to Japan's national broadcaster, NHK, that he would like to find a way out of the problems between the two countries and set up a meeting with Chinese leaders. "It is quite regrettable that the summit meetings between Chinese and Japanese leaders haven't happened," he said. "It is necessary for both sides to make efforts and take a step ahead."

Better relations with China would go down well with a lot of Japanese, many of whom are hoping for a continuation of Mr. Koizumi's economic policies, but do not like the way relations with the country's Asian neighbors have soured.

"Koizumi was forceful but Abe is not, which I think is a good thing about him," said Kazuo Taguchi, 59, a Tokyo accountant. "He's well-balanced person, and does not look like he's going to do something extreme to make us worried or afraid. I think he will be able to restore Japan's relations with China and South Korea."

Set To Lead, Japan's Next Premier Reconsiders Postwar Era (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

TOKYO, Sept. 20 — After securing the Liberal Democratic Party's presidency on Wednesday, Shinzo Abe will become Japan's first prime minister born after World War II, with a clear eye toward re-examining the postwar era.

Mr. Abe, who will turn 52 on Thursday, received two-thirds of the votes in the election for the presidency of the Liberal Democratic Party. Because of the party's grip on the lower house of Parliament, which chooses the prime minister, Mr. Abe is now assured of succeeding Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi in a parliamentary session on Tuesday.

In a race that was his to lose, Mr. Abe (pronounced AH-bay) avoided specific comments about how he would pursue economic changes or how he would repair Japan's strained relations with China and South Korea.

Instead, he spoke of revising the United States-imposed Constitution, which forbids Japan to have a full-fledged military, passing legislation to allow Japanese troops to be deployed overseas and making it possible for Japan to exercise the right to collective self-defense with the United States. He also wants to revise the other legal document of the postwar American occupation, the Fundamental Law of Education, and emphasize moral values, patriotism and tradition in schools.

"By entrusting our national security to another country and putting a priority on economic development, we were indeed able to make great material gains," Mr. Abe wrote of the postwar era in his campaign book, "Toward a Beautiful Country." "But what we lost spiritually — that was also great."

The emergence of a prime minister with no personal experience of World War II is considered a turning point in Japan, where the absence of a consensus on the war still troubles relations with the rest of Asia.

Considered politically inexperienced, Mr. Abe, who will be the youngest prime minister in postwar Japan, rose to political stardom by talking tough on North Korea, China and national security. In Japan and in the rest of Asia, Mr. Abe is regarded as even more hawkish and conservative than Mr. Koizumi.

To his supporters, Mr. Abe is a politician unburdened by Japan's past, capable of forging a newly independent and strong path for the nation. To critics, he is a potentially dangerous ideologue ready to jettison the postwar values that have brought stability, peace and wealth to Japan.

Hakubun Shimomura, a Liberal Democratic lawmaker and an ally of Mr. Abe's, said the next prime minister would "look back objectively at the postwar period, removed from its trauma and able to make choices as part of the postwar generation."

"I think the symbolic start of the independent nation of Japan will be Mr. Abe's revision of the Constitution," Mr. Shimomura said.

But Shusei Tanaka, a professor at Fukuyama University and a former Liberal Democratic lawmaker, worried that Mr. Abe's greatest influence was from his grandfather, Nobusuke Kishi, a wartime cabinet member imprisoned as a Class A war crimes suspect but never tried, who became prime minister in 1957. Recently, Mr. Abe has avoided commenting on Japan's wartime past.

Only five years ago, few would have predicted that Mr. Abe would become prime minister. He was known mainly as the grandson of Mr. Kishi and the son of Shintaro Abe, a former foreign minister, whom the son long served as secretary.

Mr. Abe took over his father's parliamentary seat in 1993, after Shintaro Abe's death, and became quite popular among voters, earning a reputation as a strong leader by voicing national anger at North Korea's admission in 2002 that it had kidnapped several Japanese citizens in the 1970's and 1980's. Since then, he has kept his hard line against North Korea, and against China. After North Korea launched missiles in July, he suggested that Japan debate whether it should acquire the military capacity for a pre-emptive strike.

One of Mr. Abe's most pressing problems will be to restore normal relations with China, which has refused to hold high-level talks because of Mr. Koizumi's annual visits to the Yasukuni Shrine, the Shinto memorial where 14 Class A war criminals are enshrined. The shrine, also a memorial to Japan's 2.5 million war dead, is considered a symbol of Japanese militarism in the rest of Asia.

The visits have worried American politicians that Japan is provoking China, and hurting American interests in the region. Mr. Abe, despite past support of the visits, has said he would pursue a policy of ambiguity, neither confirming nor denying whether he has visited the shrine.

On wartime history, Mr. Abe has allied himself with Japan's right-wing politicians, news media and scholars. Unlike Mr. Koizumi, he has doubted the validity of the postwar Tokyo trials in which Japan's wartime leaders were condemned.

In the past he has indicated that he rejects the mainstream, postwar view that Japan waged a war of aggression and invasion in Asia. But he has not publicly embraced the hard-line position that Japan waged war in Asia to liberate it from Western imperialism. Unlike Mr. Koizumi and other prime ministers, Mr. Abe, though pressed many times, has avoided endorsing a landmark apology issued in 1995 by the Japanese government to Asian countries.

Japanese hard-liners regard him as a true believer, while they looked askance at Mr. Koizumi for trying to negotiate with North Korea and for proposing to change the Imperial Household Law so that a woman could ascend the throne. While Mr. Koizumi made decisions on his own, dividing people between enemy and ally, Mr. Abe emphasizes harmony.

"People tend to like Mr. Abe's personality," Mr. Shimomura said. Lacking Mr. Koizumi's larger-than-life personality, Mr. Abe has instead cultivated a soft image that has taken the sharp edges off his strong views. Mr. Abe, a teetotaler who is married but has no children, appeared on a talk show to announce that his favorite food was ice cream.

"In his appearance and his way of speaking, he's soft," Mr. Shimomura said. "But in the inside, he's rock solid. He sticks to his principles and won't compromise."

For Some In Yemen, Dashed Hopes (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0066793

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

SANAA, Yemen, Sept. 20 -- Former presidential candidate Sumayya Ali Rajja, her two children in tow, plodded from polling station to polling station Wednesday trying to take part in what she considered a historic moment: Yemen's first competitive presidential elections. But Rajja's frustration mounted when she was turned away from the third station and again told her name was not on the list of registered voters.

Despite apologies by election officials for what they said was a mistake, Rajja insisted that her name was intentionally removed from the list. The 51-year-old consultant, who dropped out of the presidential race last month, wrote an editorial this week criticizing President Ali Abdullah Saleh and announcing she would vote for his main opponent.

"This is proof that the government intends to do whatever it takes to win this election, that there's no real democracy here," she said as she walked out of the Tareq bin Ziyad middle school. "We're nothing but a corrupt dictatorship run by a mafia."

Whatever the reason behind Rajja's missing registration, her frustration and disappointment were real, echoed by many who had held high hopes for Yemen's democratic experiment, which had been closely watched as a barometer of pluralism in the Arab world. The country's announcement in 1990 that it would unify north and south and embrace democracy had inspired hope across the region.

Today, Rajja joins a growing chorus who believe President Saleh, in power for more than 28 years, has moved the country away from democratic ideals toward an authoritarian system based on patronage.

"Every election, instead of representing a step forward, was actually a step back," said Abdul-Wahhab al-Anisi, an official with Islah, an Islamic opposition group. "People have been losing faith in democracy because they see their lives deteriorating and oppression increasing during democracy."

Abdul-Ghani al-Iryani, a political consultant, said that eight modifications made to the constitution since 1990 had all served to increase the president's powers and make him less accountable. Saleh "is an authoritarian ruler who has subverted and sabotaged laws and established a system of patronage not conducive to democracy," said Iryani, driving around Sanaa. At a traffic light, three young boys rushed to his car begging for money to buy food. "People are actually going hungry," he said. "There's been an increase in poverty. Forty percent of the people are now living under the poverty line."

The main problem plaguing one of the Arab world's poorest countries is endemic corruption, critics say. "The government came to be seen as a place through which you could become wealthy and provide for yourself, your friends and your family," said Robert Burrowes, a political science professor at the University of Washington and author of several books on Yemen. "The people in the system don't want democracy if it limits their ability to use the state as a source of personal wealth."

Sanaa was quiet Wednesday, a national holiday to allow people to vote, as shops were shuttered and long lines formed at some of the polling stations. Soldiers in camouflage uniforms and red berets carried Kalashnikov assault rifles and frisked men entering the schools.

At the Shuhadaa al-Sabeen middle school, opposition supporters traded stories about how people affiliated with Saleh's ruling party canvassed neighborhoods, warning people that a vote for opposition candidate Faisal bin Shamlan would cause the country to slide toward Somalia-like anarchy. Those who agreed to vote for Saleh were offered cash, they said.

Early results show Saleh leading by more than 80 percent of the vote. But the opposition coalition has accused the ruling party of intimidating and arresting opponents and of forging voter lists.

"They came around to my father-in-law's house last night and offered money to the registered voters. My wife refused because she believes in reform, like I do, but my brothers-in-law took about 2000 riyals each," or about $10, said Muhammad Abdullah, an accountant at the Finance Ministry.

Despite the growing poverty, many people fear an alternative to Saleh, the only leader they've known for nearly three decades. At the Tareq bin Ziyad middle school, Amal Mohsen, a homemaker, wiped purple ink from her finger after voting. Behind her trailed her three young daughters, in threadbare clothes and bare hennaed feet, only the eldest wearing tattered sandals.

"We don't want change," she said, only her eyes visible behind a black veil and long black robe. "We want stability."

But without an overhaul of the government, the country will only get poorer and more backward, said Iryani, who believes that Saleh's administration has neither the will nor the ability to get Yemen back on the road to democracy.

Others still have faith in the system, believing it can be salvaged from within. Jalal Yaqoub, 38, a Planning Ministry official in charge of reform, left a well-paid job in the private sector for a monthly salary of about $250 because he's convinced Saleh is serious about reform. He said that earlier this year, just months after he suggested the judicial system be reformed, Saleh divested himself of the position of head of the judiciary.

"He's not corrupt," Yaqoub said. "He has the will to change. But it's not going to happen overnight. We're a 16-year-old democracy, teenagers, still going through the hardships of puberty. I'm optimistic."

Blue Danube: Turmoil In Hungary Spotlights Troubles In Eastern Europe (WSJ)

By Joellen Perry

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

BUDAPEST -- The streets here are boiling with violence not seen since Soviet tanks rolled along the city's medieval cobblestones in 1956. This time, it is a capitalist who is pushing people to the brink.

Demonstrators protested outside Hungary's Parliament for a third straight day yesterday following clashes earlier in the week with police armed with water cannons. The protests were triggered by Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsány's admission that he had lied "morning, evening and night" about the state of the economy ahead of April elections that returned him to power.

In a recording laced with expletives and leaked Sunday to local radio, the multimillionaire advocate of free markets is heard telling fellow Socialist Party officials that the "moment of truth will come swiftly" for the economy he has rushed to link to the outside world. "It was divine intervention, the abundance of cash in the world economy and hundreds of tricks...which helped us survive so far," he said. The 45-year-old prime minister, a favorite of Western investors, has confirmed the authenticity of the tape.

Hungary has huge budget and current-account deficits. Its plan to switch its currency to the euro from the Hungarian forint has suffered repeated delays.

While Hungary's economy is in more-serious straits than Poland's or the Czech Republic's, its problems highlight a troubling state of affairs in Eastern Europe. After economic crises in the 1990s, emerging economies in East Asia and Latin America learned to let their currencies float to reflect economic conditions and avoid excessive foreign debt. Many countries formerly behind the Iron Curtain haven't fully followed those lessons.

Poland, the Czech Republic and Hungary are trying to keep their currencies fairly close to the euro, in the hopes of joining the euro zone. Foreign investors, anticipating the euro conversion, have poured money in. The danger: If the countries keep postponing the conversion date, the foreigners all could try to rush for the exits at once, triggering a rapid weakening in local currencies. In this respect, many Eastern European countries "look like the Asian countries did in their run-up to their crisis in 1997," says Harvard professor Kenneth Rogoff, a former chief economist of the International Monetary Fund.

So far, Hungary's woes appear to be contained mostly within its borders, and Hungary itself doesn't appear on the verge of an Asian-style crisis. Yesterday, the forint was practically unchanged against the dollar and the Budapest stock market fell 2.2%. The country sold more debt successfully on global markets. "Events would really have to escalate" to trigger a broader crisis, said Barbara Nestor, a currency strategist at Commerzbank in London.

Still, a few emerging countries, including Turkey and South Africa, had their bonds and currencies weaken somewhat as a result of the unrest in Budapest. A coup in Thailand, a major emerging market, also raised some concerns. "The ugly scenario is Hungary gets into serious trouble, and there are problems in Turkey, and global conditions get worse," said Nouriel Roubini, an often-bearish professor at New York University's Stern School of Business.

Yesterday at the end of Europe's trading day, Fitch Ratings changed its outlook on Hungary's foreign and local currency debt to "negative" from "stable," a move it ascribed to the protests.

To repair Hungary's budget deficit, which is expected to balloon to more than 10% of national output this year, Mr. Gyurcsány has introduced an austerity campaign. He is raising taxes, laying off public workers and asking universities to charge tuition. People soon will have to pay fees to visit a doctor -- a jolt to those long accustomed to free service.

"I understand we have to go through rough times to make the country better, but I don't trust this government with the money," said protester János Erdelyi, a 37-year-old sales representative for a Budapest construction company, wrapped in the red-white-green Hungarian flag. "We want a new election."

Mr. Gyurcsány got his start in politics as a Communist youth leader. After the collapse of the Soviet bloc in 1989, he went into business, running an investment firm that profited handsomely from privatization projects.

His political philosophy is hard to pin down: While he leads the Socialist Party, the major left-leaning party in Hungary, he also is an enthusiastic capitalist and, more recently, a proponent of orthodox fiscal policy. He is friendly both with Russia's Vladimir Putin and Britain's Tony Blair.

Mr. Gyurcsány has offered an array of explanations for his remarks at the party meeting in May, when he acknowledged his lack of candor and said, "I almost died when for a year and a half we had to pretend we were governing." He said in his Web log, or blog, that he was referring to the dishonesty of the entire political elite since 1989, and on Hungarian television that he was criticizing politicians' unwillingness to persuade people of the need for painful changes.

It remains unclear who leaked the tape of the meeting. Some say the prime minister himself might have been behind it, perhaps to convince Hungarians of the direness of the situation prior to regional elections on Oct. 1 in which his party trails.

If that was the intention, it clearly backfired. Zoltan Istok, a 32-year-old sales manager for a medical-equipment maker who has attended demonstrations all three days this week, pointed out that the government campaigned on a platform of tax cuts. "There was a 180-degree turnaround before the election and after, so they have no credibility," he said.

Although violence made headlines, the crowds before Hungary's Parliament building have been overwhelmingly peaceful. Many are supporters of the leading conservative party. Tuesday, protesters lined up at a makeshift wooden cart where a bearded, large-bellied man pulled beer from a tap and scooped out cups of cinnamon-mulled wine. Hungarian flags fluttered above the crowed as thousands sang along to Szózat, the country's second anthem, which begins: "To your homeland without fail/Be faithful, O Hungarian!"

Andrew Olasz, a 57-year-old father of three, was particularly upset about the government's plan to introduce university fees. Wearing a cloth band around his neck labeled with the name of a bitter Hungarian herbal liquor, he said he is protesting against "the campaign of lies."

Shaky Fundamentals

Economic fundamentals across Eastern Europe are increasingly shaky, two years after Hungary and seven other Eastern European nations joined the European Union. Slovakia and Croatia have big budget deficits that are getting worse. Several nations, including Hungary, have foreign-currency debt coming due that exceed their reserves of hard currency.

There are some similarities between the Eastern Europe of today and Southeast Asia in the late 1990s. Then, high interest rates and rollicking growth attracted throngs of investors. The money helped spark domestic credit booms across the region. And exchange rates linked to the dollar in Thailand, Indonesia and South Korea encouraged banks and corporations to borrow abroad.

Then, as interest rates rose in the developed world -- much as they are doing again today -- investors started to back away from developing nations. The retreat turned into a rout after Thailand devalued its currency in July 1997, as investors rushed to pull out of nearby countries where they perceived similar weakness.

Eastern Europe's situation isn't identical to Asia's a decade ago. Poland and the Czech Republic have significantly reined in deficits in their current account -- a broad measure of money flows that includes trade in goods and services. Also, unlike the key Asian nations in the 1997 currency crisis, Eastern European countries haven't committed to keep their currencies within a tight band versus the euro, giving them more flexibility.

In some respects, Hungary more closely resembles a group of countries including developed nations such as Iceland and New Zealand that have attracted foreign money with high interest rates despite concerns about a large current-account deficit. Iceland's currency plunged this year when some of that hot money withdrew.

After a long hot streak, emerging markets fell hard in May and June, suffering their worst selloff since 1997 and 1998. They have snapped back in recent weeks and most are up comfortably for the year and are outperforming the developed-nation markets.

Mr. Gyurcsány is vowing not to flinch from his austerity plan. "The policy of raw emotions and radicalism are in no way a viable path," he said yesterday.

Unusually Sensitive

Ordinary Hungarians are unusually sensitive to the risk of their currency weakening because many of them borrow in foreign currencies. Over half of Hungary's housing loans are in euros or Swiss francs. Sixty percent of corporate debt, and a third of the government's, is denominated in foreign currencies.

Agi Cöveky, a 53-year-old widow and obstetric nurse, is struggling to keep up. From her apartment next to an apple orchard on Budapest's outskirts, she explains that the monthly payments on her car and pickup truck -- both of which she bought using Swiss-franc loans several years ago -- have risen by 7,000 Hungarian forints (about $35) since April, as the forint's value has weakened. A government subsidy for her 10-year mortgage was halved in 2004, raising her monthly payments to about $359.

The combination meant she had to take up part-time work last year. "I haven't bought anything new in years," she says.

Still, such cases haven't stopped Hungary's economy from consistently expanding at a 3% to 5% clip over the past few years. One reason: generous public spending. Hungary doubled its minimum wage to $240 a month and boosted public-sector salaries 50%. In 2002, the current ruling coalition decided to add a 13th month of pay to pensioners' annual allowances. "Fiscal policy has been indulgent," says György Kopits, a member of the National Bank of Hungary's monetary council and a former International Monetary Fund official.

While protesters call Mr. Gyurcsány's cuts too severe, some international observers say his plan, although heavy with new taxes, doesn't go far enough in shaving pensions and health-care spending. After he introduced it in June, Standard & Poor's responded by downgrading Hungary's debt.

Jean Christophe de Beaulieu, who runs Boston-based State Street Global Advisors' $7 billion emerging-market fund, sold his $125 million holdings in Hungarian equities this spring. "The macroeconomic situation is preventing us from putting any money to work in the country," he says.

Euro-zone policy makers fret about the impact unstable economies could have on the currency club. Lithuania's bid for entry was rejected by the European Commission in May because its inflation rate was just above the limit for admission.

Hungary still has a number of things going for it. The banking system, largely owned by Western parents, is sound. Foreign direct investment last year totaled $6.7 billion. János Kóka, the minister of economics, called this in a recent interview "the best long-term indicator of the country's economic expectations."

To date, Hungary's prospects of joining the euro zone have given it some protection by reducing the perception of risk in investing in the country. If Hungary weren't slated to join the euro, said National Bank of Hungary Gov. Zsigmond Járai in an interview, "international investors would absolutely have given up on us a long time ago."

The power of that buffer is fading. In July, after backsliding repeatedly, the Hungarian government dropped its latest formal target of switching to the euro in 2010. It now hopes to switch before 2012. Last week the Czech Republic also abandoned its euro-entry target. Governments in Eastern Europe, prodded by popular sentiment, have chafed at the targets on budget deficits and other economic indicators that are required to join the common European currency.

Protest In Hungary Draws 15,000 (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

BUDAPEST, Sept. 20 -- Thousands of Hungarians surrounded the parliament building here for the third straight night to demand the ouster of the country's prime minister after he admitted to lying "morning, noon and night" to win reelection in April.

In what he thought was a private meeting, Ferenc Gyurcsany said in May that he had won reelection only by duping voters about how badly his party had run the country. "We have screwed up," he said. "Not a little, but a lot. No country in Europe has screwed up as much as we have. . . . It was perfectly clear that what we were saying was not true."

On Sunday, someone leaked to Radio Hungary and other media a tape recording of the socialist prime minister's confession. The immediate result: round-the-clock protests demanding Gyurcsany's removal. On Monday night, rioters temporarily took over the state television station. Over the next day or so, 150 police officers were injured.

The political violence is the worst in the East European country since Soviet tanks crushed a revolt in Budapest in 1956.

By midnight Wednesday, an estimated 15,000 protesters had gathered in a square overlooking the Danube River, the largest crowd to materialize since the tape recording became public.

Instead of resigning in shame or apologizing for having lied, Gyurcsany, 45, has tried to spin the scandal to his political benefit. He not only acknowledged making the comments but posted a transcript of the entire recording on his blog. He said his statements showed he was merely being honest about the sorry state of Hungary's public finances, something voters and politicians alike have been loath to accept.

"We will work without reversing course," the millionaire businessman and former communist vowed at a cabinet meeting Wednesday. "The government will hold firm on the only track possible: the policies of reform to ensure development and economic stability."

The uprising in Hungary has rattled neighbors in Europe, which until this week had counted the nation of 10 million people as the only East European country stable enough to reelect a government since the fall of communism in 1989.

Leaders of the European Union, which admitted Hungary and nine other new member states in 2004, said they were monitoring the crisis closely. Finnish Prime Minister Matti Taneli Vanhanen, whose country holds the rotating presidency of the bloc, said the E.U. would not intervene, "at least not today." But he added, "I hope things will calm down."

Many of the unpopular economic policies that the government began to implement after the election were required by the E.U. to keep the country on track for eventual adoption of the euro common currency.

Student leaders who had planned a major demonstration for Thursday called it off, saying they were afraid of the potential for more riots. But authorities said they expected other protests to continue.

Demonstrators who gathered outside parliament Wednesday waved red, white and green Hungarian national flags. Others carried banners. "We Need Truth For Peace," read one. Props included a mock coffin with Gyurcsany's photo and a black cloth draped over it.

"Like everyone else, I think he should resign," said Nikolett Boncz, a 24-year-old university student from the capital who was there to listen to the speeches. "It was obvious that he's been lying all along."

With municipal elections scheduled for Oct. 1, Hungarian opposition parties were quick to take advantage of the truth-telling scandal. Viktor Orban, head of the center-right Fidesz party and the prime minister's chief rival, called Gyurcsany "a sick, lying dilettante."

Few people, however, were predicting that Gyurcsany would yield to the pressure and step down. Political analysts and lawmakers from several parties said most Hungarians were disgusted with the prime minister's admission that he had lied to win reelection but were equally upset by the outbreak of violence, which they blamed on his political opponents.

"This has been shocking for Hungarian society, because for the last 16 years we've never had anything like this, never any violent actions," said Krisztian Szabados, managing director of Political Capital, an independent political research and consulting firm in Budapest. "People are faced with a choice between a liar or a guy who burns down the whole city."

Attila Gosze, 23, a Budapest schoolteacher, said he was upset not only by Gyurcsany's duplicity but by the numerous obscenities in his tape-recorded remarks. But he said he could live with the lies and the foul language as long as the prime minister and his party prove able to fix Hungary's ailing economy.

"Perhaps he made a mistake, but he shouldn't resign," Gosze said. "That's his character, and we have to accept him for the way he is. If he does his job right, we'll stand by him."

Campaigning before April's national elections, Gyurcsany and his Socialist Party colleagues promised tax cuts and higher spending on social programs -- a popular platform with voters who had resisted calls to trim a long pattern of deficit spending in Hungary.

A few weeks after winning reelection, however, Gyurcsany told party allies in a closed meeting that the whole campaign had been a charade.

"I almost died, because I had to pretend for 18 months that we were governing," he said, according to a transcript of his remarks posted on his blog. "We kept the secret, while we knew and you did, too, that if the election victory comes, we will have to seriously settle down to work and that we have never had such a problem."

Instead of cutting taxes, Gyurcsany and his coalition partners have moved to raise them. They have also laid off public-sector workers and tried to trim spending.

Although opposition parties have pummeled the Socialists in recent months for their unpopular economic policies, they also campaigned last spring on a platform of cutting taxes and raising spending. Analysts and other lawmakers say that if nothing else, Gyurcsany's unvarnished comments will make it more difficult for all Hungarian politicians to make promises they know they cannot keep.

"It's unfortunately true that both big parties have been lying to the Hungarian people," said Matyas Eorsi, a lawmaker with the Liberals, a free-market party. "Now, the time of truth has finally come for Hungary. The rules of the market economy are also the rules for Hungary. We cannot ignore the rules anymore."

Politics, Lies And Audiotape (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

IT'S ONE OF HOLLYWOOD'S FAVORITE TROPES: A cynical politician becomes weary of his own platitudes, startles the world by confessing his lies and is then rewarded with a popular groundswell of support for speaking the truth. From the Depression-era "Gabriel Over the White House" to the 1998 fable "Bulworth," the "mad as hell" mea culpa has seduced media dreamers for decades.

But does it work in the real world? Maybe not, if this week's events in Hungary are any indication. On Sunday, an unknown leaker released a 25-minute audiotape of Hungarian Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany privately chewing out members of his Socialist Party a month after their April 23 reelection. "We [deleted] up. Not a little, a lot," Gyurcsany said, arguing for the necessity of emergency post-election austerity measures. "We have done nothing for four years. You cannot tell me of any significant government measure we could be proud of…. I almost died of having to pretend for the past year that we were actually governing. Instead we lied day, night and evening. I don't want to do this anymore."

Refreshingly blunt, for sure. But did a grateful nation hoist the truth-teller on its shoulders? Not quite. Angry demonstrators set fire to the state television building, attacked and injured more than 140 police officers, torched a dozen police cars and demanded Gyurcsany's figurative head. It was the worst public violence in the streets of Budapest since the Soviet-quashed revolution 50 years ago next month.

Gyurcsany is under intense pressure to resign, or at least scale back his economic reforms, but so far he's standing firm. The leak may even make it easier for him to sell his austerity package, a theory bolstered when the prime minister quickly published a lengthy transcript on his blog. Given that the violent demonstrators number only in the low thousands, it's conceivable that the telegenic young politician may yet pull a mini-Bulworth, or at least be able to do what his Socialist predecessors did 11 years ago shortly after winning election: bring the previous government's election-year spending binge into check.

But for the first time since Hungary reinstituted free elections in 1990, the previous government is the same as the one in power. And therein lies an important lesson: Some politicians will indeed lie "day, night and evening" if they can get away with it, especially to preserve their own power. Hearing an elected leader admit as much is both refreshing and depressing. If Hollywood ever decides to tell its own version of this week's events in Hungary, which aspect it emphasizes will depend on what happens in Budapest in the coming weeks and months.

TERRORISM NEWS:

CIA 'refused To Operate' Secret Jails (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, September 21, 2006

The Bush administration had to empty its secret prisons and transfer terror suspects to the military-run detention centre at Guantánamo this month in part because CIA interrogators had refused to carry out further interrogations and run the secret facilities, according to former CIA officials and people close to the programme.

The former officials said the CIA interrogators' refusal was a factor in forcing the Bush administration to act earlier than it might have wished.

When Mr Bush announced the suspension of the secret prison programme in a speech before the fifth anniversary of the September 11 terror attacks, some analysts thought he was trying to gain political momentum before the November midterm congressional elections.

The administration publicly explained its decision in light of the legal uncertainty surrounding permissible interrogation techniques following the June Supreme Court ruling that all terrorist suspects in detention were entitled to protection under Common Article Three of the Geneva Conventions.

But the former CIA officials said Mr Bush's hand was forced because interrogators had refused to continue their work until the legal situation was clarified because they were concerned they could be prosecuted for using illegal techniques. One intelligence source also said the CIA had refused to keep the secret prisons going.

Senior officials and Mr Bush himself have come close to admitting this by saying CIA interrogators sought legal clarity. But no official has confirmed on the record how and when the secret programme actually came to an end.

John Negroponte, director of national intelligence, who was interviewed by Fox News on Sunday, said in response to a question of whether CIA interrogators had refused to work: "I think the way I would answer you in regard to that question is that there's been precious little activity of that kind for a number of months now, and certainly since the Supreme Court decision."

In an interview with the Financial Times, John Bellinger, legal adviser to the state department, went further, saying there had been "very little operational activity" on CIA interrogations since the passage last December of a bill proposed by Senator John McCain outlawing torture and inhumane treatment of prisoners.

Mr Bellinger said the secret prisons remained empty for the moment. But he defended the US position that use of such prisons did not contravene international conventions as some in Europe have argued. He also said that, theoretically, the Pentagon as well as the CIA had the legal right to run such facilities. The CIA declined to comment.

Key figures among the 14 prisoners transferred to Guantánamo, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, had been held in secret centres for three years or more.

Independence Days (WP)

By David S. Broder

DOJ_NMG_0066803

American politics reached a critical turn last week. The revolt of several Republican senators against President Bush's insistence on a free hand in treating terrorist detainees signaled the emergence of an independent force in elections and government.

This movement is not new, but the moral scale of the issue -- torture -- and the implications for both constitutional and international law give it an epic dimension, even if it is ultimately settled by compromise.

The senators involved -- John McCain, Lindsey Graham and John Warner -- were also instrumental in forming the "Gang of 14," the bipartisan bloc that seized control of the Senate last year and wrote the compromise that prevented a drastic change in the filibuster rule that otherwise would have triggered a bitter partisan divide.

These are not ordinary men. McCain, from Arizona, is probably the leading candidate for the 2008 presidential nomination. Graham, from South Carolina, is the star among the younger Republican senators. Warner, from Virginia, embodies the essence of traditional Reagan conservatism: patriotism, support for the military, civility.

They were joined in their opposition to Bush's call for extraordinary interrogation techniques by Colin Powell, the former secretary of state and chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who is still, despite the controversies over his role in Iraq policy, one of the most admired Americans.

That these Republicans -- and others -- were ready to join the Democrats in rejecting Bush's plan caused the White House to scramble for alternatives and House Republican leaders to postpone a scheduled vote. The revolt goes well beyond three men.

What it really signals is a new movement in this country -- what you could rightly call the independence party. Its unifying theme can be found in the Declaration of Independence's language when Jefferson invoked "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind."

When Powell wrote that Bush's demand would compound the world's "doubt [about] the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," he was appealing to Jefferson's standard.

It is a standard this administration has flagrantly rejected. Bush was elected twice, over Democrats Al Gore and John Kerry, whose know-it-all arrogance rankled Midwesterners such as myself. The country thought Bush was a pleasant, down-to-earth guy who would not rock the boat. Instead, swayed by some inner impulse or the influence of Dick Cheney, he has proved to be lawless and reckless. He started a war he cannot finish, drove the government into debt and repeatedly defied the Constitution.

Now, however, you can see the independence party forming -- on both sides of the aisle. They are mobilizing to resist not only Bush but also the extremist elements in American society -- the vituperative, foul-mouthed bloggers on the left and the doctrinaire religious extremists on the right who would convert their faith into a whipping post for their opponents.

The center is beginning to fight back. Michael Bloomberg, the Republican mayor of New York, is holding a fundraiser for Sen. Joe Lieberman, a Democrat running as an independent against the bloggers' favorite, Ned Lamont.

His election is important, as is Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee's in Rhode Island, because both would signal that independence is a virtue to be rewarded.

Similarly important, though less publicized, is Republican Sen. Mike DeWine's race in Ohio. DeWine is an ally of McCain & Co. in forming a center for the Senate; his opponent, Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown, is a loud advocate of protectionist policies that offer a false hope of solving our trade and job problems.

A "decent respect" begins at home, with an acknowledgment of public opinion. Americans are saying no to excess greenhouse gases and no to open borders; yes to embryonic stem cell research, yes to a path to earned citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants and yes to a living wage. Six more states are likely to approve increases in the minimum wage through ballot initiatives in November.

A congressional election with lots of new faces and a scare for many returning veterans is important as a signal to next year's likely leaders such as Republican Sen. Mitch McConnell and Democratic Rep. Nancy Pelosi that they can't design their strategies simply to satisfy the most rabid of their party's extremes; they have to govern down the center and work across party lines.

And that in turn would set the stage for a 2008 election in which the two branches of the independence movement -- Republican and Democratic -- could compete in a campaign that would, for a change, show a "decent respect" for the intelligence of the American people.

Rendering Unto Syria (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

Opponents of interrogating al Qaeda detainees keep slandering the Bush Administration by equating all aggressive questioning techniques with "torture." What's more, they seem unable to draw the obvious lessons from our experience handling terror suspects thus far.

Take the case of Maher Arar, an apparently innocent Canadian citizen who was arrested at JFK airport in September 2002 and turned over to Syria -- a process known as "rendition" -- where he actually appears to have been tortured. According to some of our media colleagues, this shows that CIA officials can't be trusted with the authority they're seeking under the proposed new Detainee Act to use a number of "stress techniques" against high level al Qaeda detainees.

But Mr. Arar's case proves exactly the opposite. For starters, it was the Canadian government that supplied what appears to have been bad information about Mr. Arar's alleged al Qaeda ties. More to the point, the temptation to get vital information by "rendering" such suspects for interrogation by governments that have little respect for human rights will only increase if the CIA's own al Qaeda interrogation program is shut down. This may make some in Congress feel better about themselves, but it won't do much for the "rights" of those interrogated.

The White House has been negotiating over the issue with Senator John McCain so U.S. interrogators aren't left in legal limbo because Congress refuses to define our obligations under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. It's precisely such legal clarity that will limit potential abuses, rather than leaving Article 3 open to interpretation by individuals -- or by the likes of Syria, since as it stands every country in the world interprets Article 3 in its own way now.

Crucial to any compromise is that the new rules not only protect CIA interrogators under relevant U.S. law (the 1996 War Crimes Act), but also assert our understanding of our obligations under Geneva. This is not about "rewriting" Geneva, as Mr. McCain and others have previously suggested; it is about the necessity of fleshing out what vague Article 3 prohibitions against "humiliating" treatment and the like actually mean.

President Bush has been very strong on this issue so far. We trust he won't endorse anything now that falls short of the comprehensive legal clarity he's been right to demand.

Justice Dept. Amends Remark On Torture Case (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — In an embarrassing turnabout, the Department of Justice backed away Wednesday from a denial by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales of responsibility for the treatment of a Canadian who was seized by American authorities in 2002. The man was deported to Syria, where he was imprisoned and beaten.

Asked at a news conference on Tuesday about a Canadian commission's finding that the man, Maher Arar, was wrongly sent to Syria and tortured there, Mr. Gonzales replied, "Well, we were not responsible for his removal to Syria." He added, "I'm not aware that he was tortured."

The attorney general's comments caused puzzlement because they followed front-page news articles of the findings of the Canadian commission. It reported that based on inaccurate information from Canada about Mr. Arar's supposed terrorist ties, American officials ordered him taken to Syria, an action documented in public records.

On Wednesday, a Justice Department spokesman said Mr. Gonzales had intended to make only a narrow point: that deportations are now handled by the Department of Homeland Security, not the Department of Justice.

The spokesman, Charles Miller, said the attorney general forgot that at the time of Mr. Arar's deportation, such matters were still handled by the Immigration and Naturalization Service, which was part of the Department of Justice.

"He had his timeline mixed up," Mr. Miller said.

Asked why Mr. Gonzales appeared to cast doubt on the Canadian finding that Mr. Arar had been tortured, Mr. Miller said, "I wouldn't go beyond what he said."

He said Justice Department officials "have not fully reviewed" the commission's report since its release on Monday, and he noted that Mr. Arar had brought a lawsuit against United States officials that was dismissed by a lower court but was being appealed.

The attorney general's refusal to take responsibility for the government's conduct in the case comes when the treatment of people detained in the campaign against terrorism is again at the center of public debate. The White House is in negotiations with Republican senators who believe detainee legislation proposed by the administration would damage the international standing of the United States and possibly endanger American soldiers taken prisoner overseas.

For critics of the Bush administration at home and abroad, the Arar case has become an oft-cited example of both incompetence and brutality in the offensive against terrorism. It is often described as a rendition, the legal term for the seizure of a suspect overseas and delivery to imprisonment and interrogation in another country.

But the Arar case differs technically from other instances of rendition because Mr. Arar was detained in the United States and his expulsion resulted from a formal deportation order, a distinction Mr. Gonzales made.

Asked about Mr. Gonzales's remarks, Mr. Arar said in an interview on Wednesday with National Public Radio that American officials had sent him to Syria despite his protests that he would be tortured there.

"The facts speak for themselves, you know," Mr. Arar said. "The report clearly concluded that I was tortured. And for him to say that he does not know about the case or does not know I was tortured is really outrageous."

Maria C. LaHood, Mr. Arar's lawyer at the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York, called Mr. Gonzales' comments "unbelievable."

"I had hoped that they would actually step up and say, 'We made a mistake, we accept the report's findings, we clear Mr. Arar's name and we apologize,' " Ms. LaHood said.

Mr. Arar, now 37, is a former telecommunications engineer who was born in Syria but did not live there after his teenage years.

In September 2002, as he changed planes at Kennedy International Airport in New York on his way home to Canada, he was detained because his name was on a terrorist watch list. His name was included on the basis of incorrect information from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that he was linked to Al Qaeda, the commission found.

American officials wanted more information about what threat he might pose and decided to deport him to Syria, an option legally possible because he had been born there. Officials have said that as is standard in such cases, the United States sought "assurances" from Syria that Mr. Arar would not be tortured.

In fact, he was held there in a dank cell that measured 3 feet by 6 feet by 7 feet and beaten repeatedly with a metal cable, according to Mr. Arar's description and the commission report.

In October 2003, Mr. Arar was released by Syria, where officials found no evidence that he had any connection to terrorism, and returned to Canada. In January 2004 the commission, headed by a judge, Dennis R. O'Connor, began two years of hearings and investigation. The United States refused to cooperate with the commission, declining Canadian requests for documents and testimony related to the case.

On Wednesday, Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, introduced five "resolutions of inquiry" aimed at forcing the release of government documents related to the case.

Under Congressional rules, the resolutions must be voted on in five House committees within 14 days, or Mr. Markey will be able to force a vote by the full House, his staff said.

The Torture Of Liberty (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

After traveling to Ottawa to interview Maher Arar last year, I wrote: "If John Ashcroft was right, then I was staring into the malevolent, duplicitous eyes of pure evil ... But all I could really see was a polite, unassuming, neatly dressed guy who looked like a suburban Little League coach."

It turns out John Ashcroft was wrong. After an exhaustive investigation, a government commission in Canada ruled definitively and unequivocally this week that Maher Arar was no terrorist. He was nothing more than a quiet family man who found himself sucked into a vortex of incompetence, hysteria and a so-called war on terror that has gone completely haywire.

He's lucky he survived. Mr. Arar, a Canadian citizen who was born in Syria, was snatched by American authorities as he waited for a connecting flight home from Kennedy Airport in September 2002. The Americans apparently were acting on bad information fed to them by Canadian investigators.

As in the witch hunts of old, no one seemed to care whether there was any factual basis for the allegations against Mr. Arar. Without even a nod in the direction of due process, the Americans put him on a government jet and shipped him off to Jordan, where he was promptly driven to Syria, where he was tortured.

Welcome to extraordinary rendition, a reprehensible practice in which people are kidnapped by the U.S. government and sent off to countries that specialize in the evil arts of torture.

Mr. Arar lived in torment for nearly a year, confined most of the time to a tiny underground cell, about the size of a grave. Despite the torture, the Syrians were unable to connect him to terrorism in any way. The Canadian government managed to secure his release in October 2003.

If this were just a bad but honest mistake, we might be able to simply wish Mr. Arar well and vow never to let it happen again. Instead, the United States is about to ensure that many more individuals who are falsely accused are deprived of the single most fundamental tool they need to establish their innocence.

In the push to enact legislation dealing with the interrogation and prosecution of terror suspects, both the White House and dissident Republicans in the Senate intend to strip away the hallowed safeguard of habeas corpus for some noncitizens held in U.S. custody outside the United States.

Habeas corpus (literally "produce the body") is a legal proceeding that allows one to challenge his or her detention in a court of law. It is the most significant safeguard against arbitrary imprisonment. Someone deprived of this right — which is enshrined in the U.S. Constitution and has been recognized by various societies all the way back to the Middle Ages — can be locked up, whether innocent or guilty of any offense, and never heard from again.

I can't believe that most Americans think this is all right.

"This is recognized as a broad common-law and constitutional right," said Bill Goodman, the legal director for the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York, which has been fighting to secure basic legal protections for prisoners in American custody at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

At a minimum, said Mr. Goodman, "A person has a right to know what crime he's being charged with. And a court can demand that the government produce evidence indicating that there is a reason to hold that person."

The authority to demand that even the highest officials in a nation — even the president, even the king back in the days of the Magna Carta — justify the detention of a human being is powerful, and essential in a free society.

The right to file for a writ of habeas corpus, insisting that this authority be exercised, is a crucial check on naked governmental power. It's a check on injustice.

In Washington, instead of saluting this cornerstone of freedom, politicians are about to deep-six it for some people without even much in the way of debate.

Talk about freedom is cheap. We hear it all the time. Real protection against tyrannical behavior by powerful government officials is another matter.

I spoke to Mr. Arar by phone yesterday. He said now that the Canadian government has publicly cleared his name, he would like the U.S. government to follow suit. But the U.S. government is busy trying to make sure that other innocents, trapped unfairly in a cage, have absolutely nowhere to turn. No recourse at all.

Frist Hopeful Of Deal On Detainee Treatment; Wiretap Bill Altered (AP)

AP, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's embattled anti-terrorism plans got a boost Wednesday when a wiretap bill was revised and a Senate Republican leader said he was hopeful a deal was near on treatment of detainees.

Prospects for the two critical pieces of legislation remained unclear; Congress is speeding toward a recess next week as Republicans fight to retain majority control in the November elections.

Nevertheless, a bill by Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., made some progress Wednesday after she rewrote it to allow warrantless wiretapping when an attack is imminent, as Bush has demanded. Even so, she told reporters differences between the House and Senate versions were unlikely to be worked out before Congress reconvenes after the Nov. 7 elections.

Democrats sat on the sidelines "watching the catfights" among Republicans on terrorism surveillance and detainee legislation, said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. He noted that Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee was forced to postpone consideration of those bills this week; the Senate instead is holding a floor debate on border security "because they have nothing else to do."

Neither the White House nor rebellious Republican senators had the votes necessary to move forward on how to handle the nation's most dangerous terror suspects. The two sides remained at odds over how to adhere to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and simultaneously give the CIA leeway to conduct interrogations.

In the House of Representatives, there was more evidence that support was far from solid for the detainee bill approved overwhelmingly last week by the Armed Services Committee. A second panel, the Judiciary Committee, on Wednesday reported the same bill with an "unfavorable recommendation," a procedural bump expected to be smoothed before the legislation reaches the House floor next week.

House Intelligence Chairman Pete Hoekstra, R-Mich., said he expected significant differences between any bills passed by the House and Senate. "If the Senate and the White House have reached an agreement, that is probably what would end up becoming law and making its way to the president's desk," Hoekstra said at the American Enterprise Institute.

Despite the stalemate, Frist sought to reassure the GOP troops that a deal still was possible. "I am hopeful that very soon agreement can be reached with the president and with the majority of Republicans," Frist said.

He spoke as House Republicans moved closer to the administration's position on domestic wiretapping.

Wilson's bill initially would have given legal status to Bush's domestic surveillance program only after an attack. Instead, her bill now would grant the administration's plea to allow wiretapping against Americans without warrants when it is believed a terrorist attack is imminent.

That concession carried a price for the president, according to a draft. Under the measure, the administration would be required to share more details of the nature of the threat with House and Senate leaders and the chairmen of both intelligence committees, who then would decide without administration input which lawmakers would receive the classified information.

House Panel Approves Wiretapping Bill (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

The House Intelligence Committee approved by voice vote a bill that would put into law the Bush administration's program of wiretapping without warrants. The sponsor, Representative Heather A. Wilson, Repubican of New Mexico, had rewritten the measure to make it more to Mr. Bush's liking. The Judiciary Committee later endorsed a similar version, by 20 to 16. But Ms. Wilson's revision, likely to draw Mr. Bush's support, is the bill that probably will make it to the full House. Under her bill, the president may conduct the secret surveillance only under specific conditions. For example, the president must notify Congress within five days of authorizing the surveillance, name the entity that poses the threat and state the reason for believing the attack is imminent.

House Panel Endorses Controversial Spy Bill (CNET)

Republicans push through legislation designed to rewrite wiretapping law but blasted by civil liberties groups and Democrats.

Republicans on a key congressional committee on Wednesday approved legislation they described as a necessary rewrite to electronic surveillance law but attacked by Democrats, civil libertarians and technology advocacy groups as flawed and unconstitutional.

By a 20-to-16 vote mostly along party lines, the U.S. House of Representatives Judiciary Committee backed an amended version of the Electronic Surveillance Modernization Act of 2006, a Republican-sponsored measure introduced in July. Two Republicans and all 14 Democrats present rejected the proposal.

"This legislation is a priority for the president and critical to our national efforts to detect and disrupt acts of terrorism before they occur," said Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, who co-sponsored the controversial bill with Rep. Heather Wilson, a New Mexico Republican.

Supporters said the bill's provisions would aid terrorist investigations by relaxing the requirements for warrants to conduct electronic surveillance and addressing modern communications in a "technology neutral" way not foreseen by the 28-year-old Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA).

The Bush administration has acknowledged that its controversial National Security Agency terrorist surveillance program was not approved by the FISA court--but argue the president's constitutional powers as commander-in-chief, among other things, provide ample legal authority.

Meanwhile, civil liberties advocates have accused the administration of intruding into phone calls and e-mails of millions of innocent Americans, and even Attorney General Alberto Gonzales conceded earlier this year that some "ordinary" citizens could be swept up in the quest for rogue targets.

During about two hours of debate leading up to Wednesday's vote, Rep. John Conyers, the top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, ticked off a number of flaws he perceived in the Republican-backed approach. Those gripes included a lack of limits on presidential power to conduct warrantless surveillance, extending FISA snooping to new categories of individuals and corporations who have no connection to foreign governments or terrorists, and allowing the government to maintain records and "massive databases" on surveilled individuals "in perpetuity."

"We all want to fight terrorism, but we need to fight it in the right way, consistent with our Constitution, and in a manner that serves as a model for the rest of the world," Conyers said in prepared testimony. "This bill does not meet that test."

Joining ongoing protests from advocacy groups like the American Civil Liberties Union and the Electronic Frontier Foundation, which have led many of the efforts to sue government agencies and telecommunications companies accused of illegal spying, a Washington-based technology trade association also served up its opposition to the surveillance bill this week.

"The mere possibility of widespread, secret, and unchecked surveillance of the billions of messages that flow among our customers, especially U.S. citizens, will corrode the fundamental openness and freedom necessary for our communications networks," Ed Black, president of the Computer and Communications Industry Association, wrote in a letter (click for PDF) to the committee on Tuesday. CCIA's members include Google, Yahoo, Microsoft and Red Hat.

"Even if this power is not deliberately misused," Black went on, "the loss of a sense of privacy in personal and confidential business communications will inflict great and long-lasting damage on the dynamic and innovative growth intrinsic to the high technology sector."

Some Judiciary Committee members offered amendments on Wednesday designed to quell constitutional concerns raised by opponents. In a move supported by both parties, Sensenbrenner proposed an amendment that stripped two portions of the underlying bill that would have allowed warrantless surveillance to continue for up to 60 days after an "armed attack" on the United States and up to 45 days after a "terrorist attack." He said the provisions' language was too vague and needed additional work.

Rep. Dan Lungren, a California Republican, also described a 25-page amendment that he claimed would add additional clarifications and constitutional protections. The proposed changes ultimately were approved, but not before Democrats raised questions about whether they could trust the measure without having studied it in advance and even called for halting the meeting until it could be more thoroughly examined. Efforts by CNET News.com to obtain a copy of the Lungren amendments met with no response.

Those actions represent "a lot of smoke and not a lot of fire," Lisa Graves, the ACLU's senior counsel for legislative strategy. "There's a lot of optics going on, but behind the scenes...I'm sure they've already worked out a deal to make sure the White House gets what it wants at the end of the day."

The same bill was also slated for a vote on Wednesday afternoon at a closed meeting of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, of which Wilson is a member. Committee representatives were not immediately available to comment on the outcome of those proceedings. But according to the ACLU, a different version of the Republican proposal, which still lacked adequate safeguards by its estimation, was approved by the intelligence panel.

In a move sure to ruffle feathers among civil libertarians, the Judiciary committee also approved along party lines an amendment designed to shield from legal liability any individual or company that complies with surveillance requests from any intelligence program.

The move would effectively "eliminate the 60 or more lawsuits filed because companies complied with government orders," such as the one lodged by the Electronic Frontier Foundation against AT&T, said Rep. Chris Cannon, the amendment's sponsor. Without such protection in place, he said, "an individual or company will be reluctant to cooperate with any government authorized surveillance program, which will severely undercut government's efforts (to prevent terrorist attacks)."

Republicans shot down a number of amendments offered primarily by Democrats, including more than one proposal designed to establish FISA as the exclusive means by which the president can sign off on electronic surveillance programs.

The House Judiciary Committee vote arrived one week after its counterpart in the Senate narrowly approved three bills relating to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, cuing them up for a vote soon on the Senate floor.

The most controversial measure of the trio, offered by Committee Chairman Arlen Specter with the White House's blessing, has drawn attacks from Democrats and civil liberties groups who claim it would erode the 1978 spy law's checks on executive power and violate Fourth Amendment privacy protections for Americans by authorizing unchecked intrusions on Internet and telephone communications.

The bill's supporters, for their part, say it signals that the president does not have a "blank check" to do warrantless surveillance and that he has volunteered to submit the National Security Agency's terrorist surveillance program for constitutional review if the bill passes, even though it doesn't explicitly require such a move.

Sensenbrenner said he expected the House version to go to a floor vote as soon as next week. It was not immediately clear when the Senate would take up its proposals.

Gitmo Says Orientation For 14 Under Way (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns

AP, September 21, 2006

The 14 terrorism suspects transferred to the Guantanamo Bay detention center from overseas CIA prisons two weeks ago are undergoing "orientation" and not being interrogated, the Army said Wednesday.

"It seems to be working fine," Gen. Bantz J. Craddock said in an interview with a group of reporters at the Pentagon. Craddock oversees U.S. military operations in Latin America and the Caribbean.

He said the 14 men are in a 30-day "orientation, acclimatization period" that is standard for new arrivals at Guantanamo.

Until that is finished, he said, it would be premature to say whether or how they would be interrogated.

Craddock said representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross would be granted access to the new arrivals, who include the mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks and architects of the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole on Yemen's coast and the U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. They are the first additions to the detainee population at Guantanamo Bay since September 2004. It opened in January 2002.

But first, he said, the 14 would have to complete their orientation, which he did not describe in detail. He estimated they would be made available to the Red Cross around Oct. 1. In Geneva on Wednesday, the chief spokesman for the ICRC, Antonella Notari, said officials plan to arrive Sept. 25 for a scheduled two-week visit to Guantanamo. The ICRC is the only neutral agency with full access to Guantanamo detainees.

"The priority of the upcoming mission is to talk in private and to register the newly transferred detainees and to provide them the means to communicate with their family members through Red Cross messages," Notari said.

Notari said it was still unclear when the first meetings with the new detainees would occur.

Craddock said U.S. officials welcome the Red Cross's presence at Guantanamo Bay.

"They will have the same opportunity as we do pretty much with all the other detainees," Craddock said, referring to the approximately 440 other detainees at the facility on the southeastern tip of Cuba. Asked whether they would include private meetings with each of the 14 new arrivals, Craddock said, "I think so."

U.S. officials have said little about the conditions of confinement for the 14 since they arrived Sept. 4. Craddock said their overseers at the prison have been monitoring them and acclimating them to the food and other conditions.

"We have to get through this orientation, acclimatization period," he said. "We've got to understand their response because they're in a new environment. We've got to get a feel for how they respond. It's different."

U.S. officials have refused to say where the 14 were held previously or under what conditions.

Under the terms of a new U.S. military doctrine on appropriate interrogation methods for prisoners of war and detainees, an interrogation technique called "separation" may be used only with the explicit approval of a commander at Craddock's level. It refers to removing a detainee from the rest of the detainee population "and their environment," while still complying with basic standards of humane treatment.

"I have not granted the separation authority," Craddock said. "And I have not been asked to do so."

He said the 14 have not been interrogated at Guantanamo and have not been "segregated," which in military parlance means isolating a detainee from the rest of the population for security or other reasons unrelated to interrogation.

Craddock, who has been commander of U.S. Southern Command since November 2004, is awaiting Senate confirmation to become the next commander of U.S. European Command and the top NATO commander in Europe. His confirmation hearing was held Tuesday, in tandem with the hearing for his expected replacement at Southern Command, Navy Vice Adm. James Stavridis.

Judge Orders More Gitmo Papers Unsealed (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0066809

By Larry Neumeister

AP, September 21, 2006

A federal judge on Wednesday ordered the Department of Defense to release documents detailing mistreatment or disciplinary action taken against detainees at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and other information sought by The Associated Press.

U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff gave the government a week to provide the news organization with the information despite government claims that doing so would violate detainees' privacy.

"The public interest in disclosing government malfeasance is well-established," the judge wrote in saying that the AP had demonstrated the need.

David A. Schulz, who argued the case for the AP, called the judge's decision "a resounding victory for the public's right to know."

He said the identities of between 50 and 100 detainees who were ordered to be transferred or released from Guantanamo Bay after Jan. 1, 2005, will allow reporters to attempt to verify whether the government's account of events is accurate.

"The Department of Defense has made it virtually impossible for anyone to check the accuracy or thoroughness of what is going on in Guantanamo," Schulz said. "The public is supposed to be able to determine these things for itself."

A spokeswoman for federal prosecutors, Lauren McDonough, said the government had no immediate comment.

The judge noted that some detainees have initiated hunger strikes to protest what they consider abuse, while other detainees, since released, have gone public with allegations of abuse.

"In all such instances, the detainees have not hesitated to reveal their identities," the judge said.

Besides the claims by detainees, the judge said some military officers and FBI agents who have worked at Guantanamo have questioned the treatment of detainees.

Schulz said the judge also ordered the government to turn over the identities in eight files reporting investigations of allegations of abuse of detainees by military personnel and fewer than a dozen probes of abuse of detainees by other detainees.

Earlier this year, the judge ordered the Department of Defense to turn over to the AP unredacted copies of transcripts and documents related to 558 military hearings in which detainees were permitted to challenge their incarcerations.

The government's treatment of the hundreds of prisoners at the eastern Cuba prison camp has troubled human rights groups. Most have been held without being charged or publicly identified since investigations were begun into the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The AP filed Freedom of Information Act lawsuits seeking the documents last year. The government turned over the transcripts of the 558 tribunals but redacted facts about each detainee's identity before the judge ordered it to release versions that included such information.

The detainees are from Afghanistan, Russia, Persian Gulf countries and elsewhere. Many were captured in Afghanistan.

House Panel Supports Tribunal Plan, 20 To 19 (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

President Bush's supporters in the House narrowly defeated yesterday efforts to sidetrack his proposal for questioning and prosecuting terrorism suspects, but the issue continues to divide Congress in its final workdays before the November elections.

In an afternoon animated by switched votes, parliamentary gymnastics and protest cries from Democrats, the House Judiciary Committee barely managed to reject a rival proposal and endorse the administration's version of the legislation. Even if the chamber takes up the bill next week -- its last scheduled period of action before the elections -- the matter remains mired in the Senate, where a majority opposes the White House approach.

Bush wants legislation that would declare the United States to be in compliance with the Geneva Conventions if it abides by a federal law's guidelines regarding the treatment of non-uniformed suspects captured in wartime.

Most House Democrats and a few Republicans oppose the plan, saying it could invite hostile nations to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions and harm U.S. troops someday. Yesterday they came within a whisker of sending a rival plan to the House floor.

Republicans control the Judiciary Committee, 23 to 17. But early yesterday, three GOP members were absent and two others backed the rival legislation written by GOP Sens. John W. Warner (Va.), John McCain (Ariz.) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.). Had a couple of Democrats not also been absent at the time, the Warner bill might have won the panel's endorsement. It fell just short, but so did the Bush version, which was temporarily voted out of the committee with an "unfavorable report."

Democrats tried to end matters there and turn out the lights. But they narrowly failed to adjourn the meeting and deny the committee a quorum.

That gave Republican leaders time to round up two of their missing colleagues, Reps. Henry J. Hyde (Ill.) and Elton Gallegly (Calif.). Over strenuous Democratic protests and shouts of "point of order," the Republicans used a series of 20-to-19 votes to overturn the previous decision and to favorably report Bush's bill to the House floor. Republican Reps. Jeff Flake (Ariz.) and Bob Inglis (S.C.) joined all 17 Democrats in opposing the efforts.

Even if the full House passes the measure next week, it may prove difficult or impossible to reconcile matters with the Senate. Warner and his allies pushed their bill through the Senate Armed Services Committee last week, and they are backed by a majority of senators. But they apparently lack the votes to fend off a threatened filibuster by pro-Bush forces, including Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

White House spokesman Tony Snow said negotiations continued yesterday with the Warner camp. "Both sides are acting in good faith, and they both share the same goals," Snow said. "It's unusual because compromise in this case doesn't mean you're scaling back on your ends; it's another means you use to achieve your ends."

Matters were further complicated yesterday when the Republican and Democratic leaders of the Senate Judiciary Committee asked Frist to allow their panel to review the Warner bill. Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and ranking Democrat Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.) object to a provision in the bill that would bar detainees -- including those held in U.S.-controlled sites such as Guantanamo Bay, Cuba -- from filing habeas corpus writs with federal courts. Such a complaint requires captors to tell the court why a detainee should not be released. Some Guantanamo Bay detainees have used the writs to challenge the legitimacy and conditions of their detention.

In a Senate speech, Specter said Congress "cannot act to delete the remedy of habeas corpus" and called the Warner bill "unconstitutional." Frist's staff said Specter can try to amend the bill when it reaches the Senate floor.

Graham and other senators also oppose Bush's bid to allow detainees to be convicted on classified information that the defendants would not be allowed to see.

Bush's Allies Struggle To Keep War Bills (AP-Y)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, September 21, 2006

White House loyalists struggled on Wednesday to save President Bush's wartime legislative plans from collapsing under Republican squabbles. In cliffhanger votes, a House committee rejected, then endorsed Bush's proposal to continue tough interrogations of suspected terrorists.

The tug-of-war on the House Judiciary Committee was evidence of the difficulty Bush is having in lining up support for his terrorism-fighting proposals weeks before the November elections.

Democrats sat on the sidelines "watching the catfights" among Republicans on surveillance and detainee legislation, said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

He noted that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., was forced to postpone consideration of those bills this week and that senators are debating border security "because they have nothing else to do."

To win a largely symbolic endorsement of the White House's detainee proposal, committee Republicans performed a series of procedural gymnastics. After an initial vote resulted in a 20-17 count against the measure, GOP aides wrangled two absent members — Rep. Henry Hyde of Illinois and Elton Gallegly of California — for four more votes to turn the rejection into an endorsement.

The proceedings became muddled as Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., asked members to repeat their votes.

"I voted no, yes," Rep. Louie Gohmert, R-Texas, said at one point.

The "favorable rating," while not required to send the bill to a full House vote, was worth the fight for White House loyalists struggling to keep the bill alive in the waning days of the congressional session.

Prospects were not much clearer in the Senate, where the White House and a group of dissenting Republicans were in negotiations over the detainee bill.

One leading Republican predicted the House would accept any deal worked out between the White House and the opposition senators.

"If the Senate and the White House have reached an agreement, that is probably what would end up becoming law and making its way to the president's desk," said House Intelligence Committee Chairman Pete Hoekstra, R-Mich.

Intricate negotiations on both interrogation techniques for detainee issue and legalizing the president's warrantless wiretapping program left their prospects for passage uncertain — even after a White House meeting Wednesday between Bush and Republican congressional leaders.

For the White House, there was some good news.

The House Intelligence Committee approved by voice vote a bill that would put into law the administration's warrentless wiretapping program. The sponsor, Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., had rewritten the measure to make it more Bush's liking. The Judiciary Committee later endorsed a similar version, 20-16.

But Wilson's revision, likely to draw Bush's support, is the bill that probably will make it to the full House.

The concession on imminent attacks would come at a price for the president.

Under Wilson's revised bill, the president may only conduct the secret surveillance under specific conditions. For example, the president must notify Congress within five days of authorizing the surveillance, name the entity that poses the threat and state the reason for believing the attack is imminent.

Even if the House and Senate pass versions of the wiretapping legislation in the next week, the differences would not be resolved until a lame-duck congressional session after the Nov. 7 elections, Wilson said.

Meanwhile on detainees, talks continued between the White House and Republican Sens. John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who are opposed to the president's proposal on detainees.

The House's endorsement of Bush's detainee policy did not mean Republicans on the Judiciary Committee were in lockstep with Bush. Two Republicans — Reps. Bob Inglis, R-S.C., and Jeff Flake, R-Ariz. — voted against the Bush bill.

Neither side in the Senate had the 60 votes required to overcome a filibuster and move a detainee bill forward. Negotiators said a deal still was possible.

"Progress has been made," said Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Frist, who supports Bush's position, said he was "hopeful that very soon agreement can be reached."

Panel OKs Bill On Terror Suspects (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

A House panel yesterday approved a bill backing the Bush administration's approach to the treatment of terrorism suspects, although the number of Republican lawmakers breaking with the White House on the issue is growing.

The House Judiciary Committee approved on a 20-19 vote a bill that would closely follow Bush administration requests on guidelines for interrogations and trials of detainees in the war on terrorism, with Democrats picking up two Republicans to oppose it.

Earlier in the day the Republican-controlled committee hadn't mustered enough votes to approve it because a few Republicans were absent, and the bill was killed, 20-17. After rounding up their troops, Republicans held a series of procedural votes and eventually approved the measure.

The embarrassing struggle hinted of a tough road ahead for the House bill. Opponents yesterday argued that the administration and its congressional allies are trying to redefine U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions in order to give terrorism detainees fewer rights and the government more leeway in how to treat them.

"If we dilute ... the Geneva Conventions, other countries will feel inclined to do the same," said Rep. Jeff Flake, an Arizona Republican who voted against the bill, along with Rep. Bob Inglis, South Carolina Republican. Mr. Flake predicted Congress will ultimately endorse a bill like the Senate version, which affords more civil rights to the detainees and rejects Mr. Bush's definition of detainee treatment.

"I think this is where we're going to end up," he said.

The administration has said the Senate bill -- written by Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican -- would limit intelligence gathering and expose classified information to terrorists. Mr. Warner and a group of Senate Republicans continued their talks yesterday with White House officials as they strive to reach a deal.

Many House Republicans defended Mr. Bush yesterday -- arguing that although terrorism suspects should be treated and tried fairly, military officials must be given enough freedom to interrogate and gather information needed to protect the country.

"What we're trying to do is strike a balance," said Rep. J. Randy Forbes, Virginia Republican. "I'd rather err on the side of protecting our citizens."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner said the House bill is expected to come to a House vote next week and "provides the president with crucial tools for waging and winning the global war on terror." In a political jab, he attacked Judiciary Committee Democrats for opposing it, but didn't mention the Republicans who did or the initial committee vote.

"Today's vote by Democrats to unanimously oppose this bill is just one more in a long line of troubling actions that weaken our ability to wage and win the global war on terror, and it underscores why Americans don't trust Democrats on important national security issues," said the Ohio Republican.

Democrats had harsh words for the administration and Republicans.

Rep. Jerrold Nadler, New York Democrat, said the "lawless" administration has tortured detainees and now wants Congress to approve more of the same. "That's what this debate is all about," he said.

He and other Democrats tried unsuccessfully yesterday to kill a provision in the bill that would bar the detainees from suing the government for their detention, treatment or conditions where they were held.

Meanwhile, the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence gave voice-vote approval to a bill that would make lawful the administration's program of warrantless wiretapping of terrorism suspects. Rep. Heather A. Wilson, New Mexico Republican, rewrote the bill to make it more acceptable to Mr. Bush.

The House Judiciary Committee also approved a similar bill yesterday 20-16, but only after the panel stripped out the sections that approved Mr. Bush's surveillance program. An aide said panel Democrats were "going nuts" about that, so it was easier to take it out and leave it up to the intelligence panel.

U.S. House Panel Reverses Itself, Passes Tribunals Measure (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 21, 2006

By Neil Roland

Sept. 20 (Bloomberg) -- A U.S. House committee, hours after rejecting Bush administration legislation to create military tribunals for terror suspects, reversed itself and approved the measure by a single vote.

The House Judiciary Committee voted 20-19 to send the measure to the full House with a favorable recommendation after Republicans leaders rounded up two members who missed the earlier roll call and one member switched. Earlier today, the panel voted 20-17 against the bill, which opponents said would weaken protections for prisoners of war.

Still, the closeness of the vote further clouds the future of the legislation and shows that Republican dissent from President George W. Bush's proposal extends to the House as well as the Senate.

A Senate committee has approved a different version of the measure sponsored by Senator John McCain of Arizona and two other Republicans. That version, unlike the House proposal, preserves the wording of the 1949 Geneva Conventions' ban on torture. Senate Republicans have been negotiating with the White House over a possible compromise.

``We're making progress," McCain said today without elaborating. He wouldn't say whether the differences can be ironed out before Congress recesses next week until after the Nov. 7 elections.

The version before the House Judiciary Committee today was approved 52-8 by the House Armed Services Committee last week. In addition to altering the Geneva Conventions' language on prohibiting mistreatment of prisoners, it also would deny defendants access to classified information that could be used to convict them.

Supreme Court Ruling

The legislation would restart tribunals set up by Bush at the U.S. Navy Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The Supreme Court invalidated the tribunals in June, ruling that they fail to incorporate the Geneva Conventions' treatment of war prisoners.

The House version would give terrorists ``the fairness and legal protections that none of their innocent victims ever enjoyed," said Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, a Wisconsin Republican.

Bush sent Congress earlier this week a revised set of proposals that haven't been publicly outlined. House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, a Missouri Republican, and Senator George Allen, a Virginia Republican, said today they expected the differences to be resolved before Congress recesses.

The Geneva Conventions, agreed to by most nations after World War II, prohibit ``outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment." The proposals backed by Bush and most House Republicans would drop this language while spelling out a variety of prohibited abuses.

Bush Makes Changes

Bush says these changes would clarify the international law while McCain says they would weaken it.

Before voting against the bill today, the House Judiciary Committee voted 18-17 to reject an amendment to leave the torture prohibitions of the Geneva Conventions unchanged. Supporters, including two Republicans, argued that these safeguards would protect Americans captured in war while also upholding U.S. values.

``The honor of our nation would be stained by this detestable legislation," said Representative Jerrold Nadler, a New York Democrat.

House Judiciary Panel Pulls Off Victory On Military Tribunal Bill (HILL)

By Elana Schor And Roxana Tiron

The Hill, September 21, 2006

On the verge of a major political defeat, House Judiciary Committee Republicans scrambled to find missing panel members in order to successfully send a White House-backed military-tribunals bill to the floor.

When two Republicans, Rep. Jeff Flake (Ariz.) and Bob Inglis (S.C.), cast their votes against the bill — siding with a Senate-crafted bill at odds with the Bush administration — Rep. Louie Gohmert (R-Texas) resorted to a procedural move.

Gohmert voted against the bill, allowing members time to track down House International Relations Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill.) and Rep. Elton Gallegly (R-Calif.), two panel members who weren't present for the vote.

By voting against the bill, Gohmert reserved the right to call it for a second vote, according to House rules.

With Hyde and Gallegly voting in favor of the bill, the committee was able to get the vote to 20-19 in favor of the legislation.

At press time, the markup was still ongoing, and further information was not available.

Underscoring the House leadership's commitment to backing the administration's position, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) issued a statement praising the Judiciary Committee vote.

"I'm pleased to see the Judiciary Committee take positive action on the Military Commissions Act today," the statement said. "By authorizing terrorist tribunals to fully and fairly prosecute terrorists, this bill provides the President with crucial tools for waging and winning the Global War on Terror."

DOJ_NMG_0066813

The bill is slated to come to the House floor next week. At that time, Flake could attempt to resubmit an amendment he offered during yesterday's markup that would bring the House measure in line with the proposal backed by four GOP senators.

Bush's Bill Suffers A Torturous Day In Committee (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), fighting to preserve the use of harsh interrogation techniques, speaks with some authority on the subject: He was subjected to seven hours of cruel and unusual punishment as he tried to get the legislation through his committee yesterday.

First came the cruel: As the point man for the Bush administration's military-trials bill -- which would permit questioning methods some regard as torture -- Sensenbrenner saw the legislation come within one vote of collapsing in favor of a Democratic version, despite a six-vote Republican majority on the committee.

Then came the inhuman: Sensenbrenner's bill, in a second vote, failed by three votes when several of his fellow Republicans failed to show up for the roll call or voted with the Democrats.

And finally, the degrading: Sensenbrenner endured a walkout by committee Democrats, then went through the awkward process of restaging a series of votes until the result was more to his liking. Even then, President Bush's plan survived by a single vote.

"A good day's work for a good day's pay," the chairman said wryly when he finally gaveled the session to a close.

It was, in all, a tough day for the jowly, red-faced chairman, who had insisted that the legislation go through his committee against House leaders' wishes. Nor was it one of the finest days for House Republicans, who proved that, on the subject of torture, they could tie themselves in knots just as easily as their colleagues in the Senate, where the Bush bill is in a stalemate with one backed by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and friends.

Confronted with one of the weightiest issues of the times -- whether to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions' torture prohibitions -- the committee members quickly retreated to the familiar terrain of extraneous and off-point arguments.

Rep. Jerry Nadler (N.Y.), leading the debate for the Democrats, asked to put into the record an article written by a former prisoner of the KGB about techniques such as sleep deprivation that the Bush plan could allow.

"Objection," the chairman growled, without explaining himself or looking up from his newspaper.

But the talk of sleep deprivation caused Rep. Steve Chabot (R-Ohio) to stir. "Detainees are entitled to a full eight hours of sleep and cannot be awakened for interrogation," he said. "The average inmate gained about 15 pounds, was receiving better medical care by far, dental care, you name it: being given a Koran, they pray five times a day, there's an arrow on the floor in each of the rooms . . . so they know which way Mecca is so they can pray accordingly."

Sensenbrenner responded with a deep cough. Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.) set about building a straw man. "We just heard that not guaranteeing eight hours of sleep in Guantanamo has been interpreted by some as inhumane," he said.

"Who?" demanded Rep. William Delahunt (D-Mass.), for nobody had said such a thing.

But Feeney was just warming up. "There is not an American mom that is guaranteed eight hours of sleep every night. There are very few people in the business world . . . who are guaranteed eight hours of sleep." Further, he added: "There are suggestions that playing loud music is inhumane treatment. . . . The bottom line is, that means virtually every teenager I know is torturing mom and dad."

Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.) appealed for reason: "Although I'm sure parents do feel tortured by their teenagers, I don't think that's in the Constitution."

Nadler raised the ante. "Sleep deprivation [for] eight hours? How about 40 hours?" he asked. "How about waterboarding? How about holding people and subjecting them to hypothermia?"

"Absurd! Absurd!" heckled Rep. Dan Lungren (R-Calif.), who accused the Democrats of "hyperbole."

Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa) seconded the "absurd" accusation. "We are facing sleep deprivation here in this Congress at the shutdown of every single session," he cracked.

Then again, the quality of the debate didn't really matter. The committee's votes yesterday were determined less by argument than by attrition.

With one Republican member out of town, two other Republicans siding with the Democrats and two more occupied at another hearing, the majority party was in the minority. Democrats had an early chance to replace the Bush legislation with McCain's anti-torture proposal -- but that plan lost when two Florida Democrats, Debbie Wasserman Schultz and Robert Wexler, missed the vote because they were at a news conference next door on Medicare.

An hour later, it was the GOP's turn to have truancy problems. Missing Reps. Henry Hyde (Ill.) and Elton Gallegly (Calif.), the Republicans watched the Bush legislation go down to defeat -- forcing Sensenbrenner to devote two hours of parliamentary maneuvering to reverse the outcome.

Democrats tried to cement their victory with a motion to adjourn. When that failed, they walked out of the room to deny Sensenbrenner a quorum, but the chairman fought off that challenge, too. Finally, after Sensenbrenner managed to herd enough Republicans into the room, he held a series of four votes to undo the Bush proposal's defeat, overruling all Democrats' objections.

"Point of order!"
"The point of order is not well taken," Sensenbrenner replied.
"I suggest the absence of a quorum!"
"The chair rules that to be dilatory," the chairman answered.
The same could have been said of much of the debate.

Measures Seek To Restrict Detainees' Access To Courts (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis And Kate Zernike
The New York Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — Although the effort has been partly obscured by the highly publicized wrangling over military commissions for war crimes trials, the Bush administration and its allies in Congress are trying to use the same legislation to strip federal courts of their authority to review the detentions of almost all terrorism suspects.

Both the legislation introduced on behalf of the administration and the competing bill sponsored by a group of largely Republican opponents in the Senate include a provision that would bar foreigners held abroad from using the federal trial courts for challenges to detention known as habeas corpus lawsuits. If the provision was enacted, it would mean that all of the lawsuits brought in federal court by about 430 detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, would be wiped from the books.

On Wednesday, the House Judiciary Committee rejected an effort by opponents to strike that provision from the House bill by a party-line vote, with all 15 Republicans present voting to leave it in and all 12 Democrats voting against it. Then, after some initial difficulty in getting approval for the bill, the committee passed it on to the full House.

Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, who has taken a leading role in trying to counter the administration's efforts, said that stripping the federal courts of the right to hear habeas corpus challenges "raised grave constitutional questions."

Mr. Meehan, a member of both the Judiciary Committee and the Armed Services Committee, which had earlier approved a bill with the provision ending habeas reviews, said he believed the final legislation would not withstand a court challenge.

"This would take away habeas not only in all the pending cases at Guantánamo but on any future cases involving any alien detained outside the United States," he said.

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina and a sponsor of one of the bills eliminating the habeas corpus filings, said Wednesday that the flood of such lawsuits had hampered the war effort and given judges too much leeway to second-guess field commanders.

Mr. Graham said his bill provided an alternative by allowing detainees to challenge their detentions in the federal appeals courts but barring them from raising the broad range of complaints that are allowable in habeas corpus lawsuits.

"These enemy prisoners should not have an unlimited right of access to our federal courts like a U.S. citizen," he said in an interview.

The administration's interest in eliminating the lawsuits for detainees held abroad intensified after the Supreme Court struck down the system of military commissions in June.

In addition to saying that the White House had overstepped its bounds in trying to put the commission system in place without Congressional approval, the court brushed aside the argument that the Detainee Treatment Act had retroactively eliminated habeas corpus jurisdiction.

The court said Congress had only eliminated habeas corpus jurisdiction in the future, impelling the administration to renew its effort to rid itself of the hundreds of challenges filed by Guantánamo detainees.

After the Supreme Court ruled in 2004 that the detainees had access to the federal courts, the administration found itself facing a flood of legal challenges it had not anticipated.

The nature of the detention regime at Guantánamo changed markedly as detainees who had been isolated suddenly had access to American lawyers who were able to provide public accounts of their treatment and defenses to the charges that they were terrorists. The military no longer had exclusive control of information about Guantánamo.

This month, the Senate Armed Services Committee approved a similar version of the bill sponsored by three Republicans, Mr. Graham, John McCain of Arizona and John W. Warner of Virginia, and a Democrat, Carl Levin of Michigan.

Unlike the administration's legislation on military commissions, the bill largely prohibits the use of secret evidence and hearsay in any war crimes trials before military commissions but includes the provision removing habeas corpus.

Joshua Colangelo-Bryan, a New York lawyer who has represented Guantánamo prisoners, said habeas corpus proceedings had demonstrated how many people have been detained on little evidence.

"There is also an irony in that people like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed who are said to be responsible for the deaths of thousands will get a trial while hundreds of others, who are not even charged with any crimes, may be kept at Guantánamo forever without any court hearing," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0066815

The Judiciary Committee votes on Wednesday demonstrated to some that the president's proposed legislation faced increasing opposition in the House. The Judiciary Committee first voted to reject it, with two Republicans joining the Democrats. Republicans then rounded up two absent members, voted to reconsider, and approved it, 20 to 19.

"I'm not sure it can pass on the floor," said Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, who with Representative Bob Inglis of South Carolina joined the Democrats on the committee in voting against the bill. "I think there are a lot of people with concerns."

Judge Orders Data Release

By The New York Times

A federal judge on Wednesday ordered the Defense Department to release documents containing the identities of some detainees at the American prison camp in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, who were released or who suffered mistreatment by their handlers or other detainees.

In ruling in a case brought by The Associated Press, the judge, Jed S. Rakoff of Federal District Court, said the government could not keep the names secret. He gave the government a week to provide the news organization with the information despite government claims that doing so would violate detainees' privacy.

Bush Vows To Hunt Down Bin Laden -- Even In Pakistan (AFP-Y)

AFP, September 21, 2006

US President George W. Bush said in an interview he would not hesitate to track down and kill Al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and other terror operatives even if it meant hunting them down on Pakistani soil.

"We would take the action necessary to bring them to justice," said Bush in an interview with CNN television.

Bush praised efforts by Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf to root out members of the Al-Qaeda terror network ahead of Musharraf's White House visit later this week.

"I view President Musharraf as somebody who would like to bring Al-Qaeda to justice. As a matter of fact, we'll be discussing that with him on that subject on Friday at the White House," said Bush.

Bin Laden is believed to be hiding in the northern reaches of the autonomous tribal region along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border.

US forces are deployed in Afghanistan but are not authorized to conduct operations in Pakistan.

His remarks received a cool reception however from Musharraf, who said Pakistan would not welcome having its sovereign territory breached by the United States -- even in the pursuit of terrorists.

"We will like to do that on our own," Musharraf told reporters in New York, on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly meetings."

"We will do it ourselves. We will like to do it ourselves," he said.

"We are able to do everything. Whenever we locate anybody -- and there have been many such occasions where we have located Al-Qaeda or Taliban activity -- we have struck and we have struck with full force very successfully," he told reporters.

"We will carry that out on our side on the border."

Bush dismissed criticism that Musharraf has not done enough to track down bin Laden.

"Osama bin Laden is in hiding and we're still spending a lot of time trying to find him," he said.

He also rejected the view voiced by some critics who accuse him of hyping the threat of terrorism to boost his sagging poll numbers.

"They don't sit where I sit. They don't see the intelligence I see," Bush said.

"Frankly, if anybody thinks there's not an enemy coming to attack us, they just don't see the world the way it is," the US leader said, adding "this is a dangerous world."

Bush welcomes Musharraf to the White House for bilateral talks on September 22, and again on September 27 for three-way talks with Afghanistan's President Hamid Karzai.

Bush Says He'd Send Troops Into Pakistan (AP-Y)

AP, September 21, 2006

President Bush said Wednesday he would order military action inside Pakistan if intelligence indicated that Osama bin Laden or other top terror leaders were hiding there. "Absolutely," Bush said in an interview with CNN's Wolf Blitzer.

With bin Laden still at large five years after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and believed to be hiding somewhere along the mountainous border between Afghanistan and Pakistan, Bush disputed any suggestion that Pakistan has not done enough to hunt down terrorist leaders.

Bush meets Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf at the White House on Friday and again next week.

"I view President Musharraf as somebody who would like to bring al-Qaida to justice," Bush said. "There's no question there is a kind of a hostile territory in the remote regions of Pakistan that makes it easier for somebody to hide."

In a news conference last week, Bush said he could not send thousands of troops into Pakistan to search for bin Laden without an invitation from the government. "Pakistan's a sovereign nation," Bush said then.

In the television interview, Bush was asked whether he would give the order for American troops to kill or capture bin Laden or other terror leaders if good intelligence pointed to their whereabouts, even if it was inside Pakistan's borders.

"We would take the action necessary to bring them to justice," the president said.

On the standoff over Iran's suspected nuclear weapons ambitions, Bush said he takes Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad seriously when he says Israel shouldn't exist. Ahmadinejad has called the Nazis' slaughter of 6 million Jews a myth and said Israel should be wiped off the map or moved to Germany or the United States.

"You can't just hope for the best," Bush said. "You've got to assume that the leader, when he says that he would like to destroy Israel, means what he says. If you take — if you say, well, gosh, maybe he doesn't mean it, and you turn out to be wrong, you have not done your duty as a world leader. ... Absolutely I take him seriously."

Bush would not address Israeli estimates that it could take Iran only a few more months to get to the point where it could start building a nuclear bomb.

"I'm not going to discuss with you our intelligence on the subject," the president said. "But time is of the essence."

Earlier Wednesday, White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush did not watch Ahmadinejad's speech Tuesday evening at the U.N. General Assembly.

In those remarks, which took place only hours after Bush stood at the same podium in New York, the hard-line leader denounced U.S. policies in Iraq and Lebanon and accused Washington of abusing its power in the Security Council to punish others while protecting its own interests and allies.

Ahmadinejad insisted that his nation's nuclear activities are "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

Musharraf, Bush To Discuss Taliban (WT)

By Anwar Iqbal

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf will be hard-pressed at a White House meeting tomorrow to explain a peace deal with tribal leaders that Afghans fear will turn the border region into a safe haven for al Qaeda and the Taliban.

White House and State Department officials have told reporters that the meeting would focus on the resurgence of violence in Afghanistan and on a recent deal Pakistan signed with pro-Taliban elements in the region bordering Afghanistan.

The deal would allow the militants to live peacefully if they give up arms and denounce violence.

But the Afghans complain that the arrangement will lift the pressure on the Taliban and al Qaeda supporters living on the Pakistan side of the border and free them for waging attacks inside Afghanistan.

The Pakistanis reject the suggestion.

"This deal would not only bring peace to our side of the border but can also be replicated in Afghanistan if it succeeds," says Pakistani Foreign Minister Khurshid Kasuri.

President Bush says he understands what Gen. Musharraf is attempting to do but that the United States will be watching developments "very carefully."

"What [Gen. Musharraf] is doing is entering agreements with governors in the regions of the country, in the hopes that there would be an economic vitality, there will be alternatives to violence and terror," Mr. Bush told ABC News in a recent interview.

"We have made it clear that he should not provide an environment that enables people to go from his country into Afghanistan," Mr. Bush said.

In a conversation with CNN's Wolf Blitzer yesterday, Mr. Bush insisted that he would send forces into Pakistan to capture or kill al Qaeda leaders if solid intelligence information pinpointed them in that country, according to Cox News Service.

"Absolutely," Mr. Bush said when asked whether he would give the order under those circumstances.

Mr. Blitzer asked whether he would send troops in despite Pakistan's claims of sovereignty.

"We would take the action necessary to bring them to justice," the president replied.

Army Gen. John Abizaid, who as head of Central Command oversees U.S. military operations in Afghanistan, told reporters in Washington on Tuesday that the amount of Taliban military activity organized and supported from the Pakistan side of the border has increased in the past year.

"While we get a lot of great cooperation from the Pakistanis in many different ways, it's clear that we've got to do more against the Taliban on both sides of the border for Afghanistan and Pakistan to be able to move in a better direction," Gen. Abizaid said.

The Bush-Musharraf meeting is to be followed by a separate session with Mr. Bush and Afghan President Hamid Karzai on Tuesday.

The following day, the three leaders are to meet at the White House.

Gen. Musharraf and Mr. Karzai are in the United States to attend the opening session of the U.N. General Assembly in New York.

Mr. Karzai told world leaders at the United Nations yesterday that "terrorism does not emanate from within Afghanistan."

He said there is a need to destroy terrorist sanctuaries beyond Afghanistan, and to dismantle all terror networks in the region.

Though he did not mention Pakistan by name, the reference was clear.

Earlier this month, Pakistan signed a truce with pro-Taliban militants in the North Waziristan region.

Padilla's Alleged Recruiter Wants Wiretap Intercepts Tossed (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP LEGAL AFFAIRS WRITER

AP, September 21, 2006

MIAMI -- The man who allegedly recruited Jose Padilla to join al-Qaida is challenging warrants obtained from a secret intelligence court by the FBI for wiretaps, which form the backbone of prosecutors' case against him.

Adham Amin Hassoun, a former computer programmer from Sunrise, contends that the FBI intercepted some of his telephone calls between 1993 and 2002 without sufficient legal reason under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The FISA law requires U.S. agents to show probable cause that a wiretap target is a suspected foreign agent before surveillance can begin. Hassoun's lawyers Kenneth Swartz and Jeanne Baker contend that warrants were issued without that legal basis and argue that many phone intercepts should not be permitted as evidence the upcoming trial of Hassoun, Padilla and codefendant Kifah Wael Jayyousi.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in papers filed in Miami federal court that disclosure of the top secret documents challenged by Hassoun could "cause exceptionally grave damage" to U.S. national security because they contain sensitive intelligence-gathering methods and sources as well as details about the way terrorism investigations are carried out.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Stephen Brown held a brief hearing Wednesday on the issue but issued no ruling. Prosecutors have submitted sealed documents to Brown so he can evaluate the legality of the FISA warrants and applications in private.

Hassoun, Padilla and Jayyousi are charged with being part of a North American terror support cell that provided money, supplies and recruits to violent Islamic extremists worldwide. Prosecutors say Hassoun recruited Padilla for al-Qaida shortly after Padilla, a former Chicago gang member, converted to Islam.

Hassoun and Jayyousi were already indicted in the case when Padilla was added late last year, after President Bush dropped the "enemy combatant" designation that kept Padilla in military custody without charge for 3 1/2 years. Padilla was arrested in 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport, with authorities initially claiming he was plotting to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" inside the U.S.

In court papers, Hassoun's lawyers seek disclosure of secret FISA applications and warrants to determine whether they hold up under legal scrutiny.

Among other things, they say Hassoun first came to FBI attention in 1993 telephone calls with Sheikh Omar Abdel-Rahman, a blind Muslim cleric convicted in 1995 of plotting to blow up New York landmarks and assassinate Egypt's president.

Because the Abdel-Rahman case involved a criminal FBI probe instead of an intelligence investigation, U.S. agents should have been required to seek criminal wiretap warrants from a regular court rather than the secret Washington-based FISA court, Hassoun's attorneys said.

The FISA documents also might disclose whether any false statements were made in order to get wiretap warrants for Hassoun or whether calls were monitored that are protected by the First Amendment's free speech guarantees, such as discussion of raising money or expressing support for political causes.

In a partially classified response, federal prosecutors say there was probable cause showing each wiretap target, including Hassoun, was a foreign agent and that surveillance was not based on any activities protected by the First Amendment.

"Hassoun's claims should be rejected," said prosecutors Julia Paylor and Mark Maldonado. "The FISA-authorized collection at issue was lawfully authorized and lawfully conducted."

Hassoun has also challenged the legality of an FBI search of his home in 2002. Trial in the case is scheduled to begin in January but could be delayed because of pretrial legal wrangling.

Judge Orders More Gitmo Papers Unsealed (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-A federal judge on Wednesday ordered the Department of Defense to release documents detailing mistreatment or disciplinary action taken against detainees at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and other information sought by The Associated Press.

U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff said the government must provide the news organization with the information despite government claims that doing so would violate detainees' privacy.

"The public interest in disclosing government malfeasance is well-established," the judge wrote in saying that the AP had demonstrated the need.

A spokeswoman for federal prosecutors, Lauren McDonough, said the government had no immediate comment.

Earlier this year, the judge ordered the Department of Defense to turn over to the AP unredacted copies of transcripts and documents related to 558 military hearings in which detainees were permitted to challenge their incarcerations.

The government's treatment of the hundreds of prisoners at the eastern Cuba prison camp has troubled human rights groups. Most have been held without being charged or publicly identified since investigations were begun into the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The AP filed Freedom of Information Act lawsuits seeking the documents last year. The government turned over the transcripts of the 558 tribunals but redacted facts about each detainee's identity before the judge ordered it to release versions that included such information.

The detainees are from Afghanistan, Russia, Persian Gulf countries and elsewhere. Many were captured in Afghanistan.

Bush Administration Appeals OK Of Citizenship To Palestinian Man (AP)

AP, September 21, 2006

LOS ANGELES - The Bush administration has appealed a federal judge's ruling granting a petition for citizenship to a Palestinian man who the government has claimed has terrorist ties.

The appeal comes two months after U.S. District Judge Stephen V. Wilson ruled Aiad Barakat, 45, of Arcadia, should become a citizen. The judge said Barakat didn't lack good moral character and his application should never have been denied.

The Justice Department filed its notice of appeal on Sept. 14 without giving a reason for the action. Authorities had refused citizenship to Barakat because of his alleged terrorist links, saying Barakat lied about ties to the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a radical offshoot of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Barakat was detained in 1987, along with six other Palestinians and a Kenyan in a case that became known as the "L.A. Eight," but charges were never filed. Immigrant rights groups said the case was politically motivated.

Barakat's lawyer Marc Van Der Hout said he believes Wilson's June 28 ruling will stand.

"We don't think there is a strong appeal on the government's part," Van Der Hout said. "Judge Wilson heard the evidence and made some credibility findings. It is exceedingly unlikely a Court of Appeals will disturb that ruling."

The Justice Department declined comment.

The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine has opposed peace negotiations between the PLO and Israel, and the U.S. government considers it a terrorist organization. All of the so-called "L.A. Eight" have denied being members.

The group won a victory in 1989 when a judge struck down as unconstitutional portions of a federal law that allowed deportation to be based on political affiliation and advocacy.

In 1997, Barakat and another Palestinian in the group were granted legal residency after the government had initially tried to deport all eight.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokeswoman Virginia Kice said two of the Palestinians were currently in deportation hearings. The immigration status of the others was not known.

Jurors Hear Aref Speeches During Trial (CAPN9)

Capital News 9, September 21, 2006

A number of FBI agents took the stand in federal court in Albany Wednesday in the trial of Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain. They gave details about the raid on a Central Avenue mosque in 2004 and the evidence they may have found there.

The jury also heard lengthy transcripts and audio of Aref preaching from 1994 when he was living in the northern province of Kurdistan in Iraq.

A translator read each word of the translation the government may be using to show an inclination toward radical Islamic thought -- including statements like, "We should sacrifice our lives for the sake of the religion."

A number of FBI agents took the stand in federal court in Albany Wednesday in the trial of Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain. They gave details about the raid on a Central Avenue mosque in 2004 and the evidence they may have found there. The jury also heard lengthy transcripts and audio of Aref preaching from 1994.

But the speeches, in their long sermon-like ways, when put in context are more about Aref's preaching against Kurds leaving their homeland for places like Europe and America, which he does call "the house of infidels."

Aref himself later left Iraq for the United States. One main point the government may try to latch onto is that in one speech, Aref said if people leave Iraq, the field will be open for other political parties to do what they want. That is significant because other political parties implies Aref was part of a party at one time. That's something he failed to mention on an immigration document, which authorities say he lied about.

American Accused Of Trying To Sell Bombs To Al-Qaida Discussing Plea (MCT)

By Matt Birkbeck, The Morning Call (Allentown, Pa.)

McClatchy, September 21, 2006

BETHLEHEM, Pa. - A Pennsylvania man scheduled to stand trial next week on a charge he plotted to sell bombs to al-Qaida is expected to agree to a plea deal as early as Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0066819

Ronald Grecula, 69, of Upper Mount Bethel, was charged with attempting to provide material support and resources to terrorist organizations after his arrest in Houston in May 2005.

Federal prosecutors say Grecula, angry with the government over a bitter custody battle with his estranged wife, told FBI agents disguised as al-Qaida operatives he could build a hydrogen chlorine bomb that could destroy buildings, level city blocks and kill "a bunch of Americans."

Grecula was also charged in August with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute heroin. If convicted on both charges, he would face 35 years in prison.

His trial was scheduled to begin Monday in Houston. But according to documents filed last week with the federal court in Houston, U.S. District Judge Keith Ellison postponed a pretrial conference at the behest of Grecula's attorney, Edward Mallet, who said he and prosecutors were engaged in plea discussions.

According to a source familiar with the case, those discussions have led to a tentative plea deal, which Grecula must sign in front of Ellison. A hearing is scheduled for Thursday afternoon.

Mallet did not return calls for comment. John Yenbrick, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney in Houston, declined to comment.

Grecula was arrested after flying to Houston to meet with what he believed were al-Qaida members interested in buying explosive devices, according to court papers. In return, Grecula sought help in putting his estranged wife, Monique, in prison or killing her so he could regain custody of his two children.

In 2002, Grecula was arrested at JFK International Airport in New York City for kidnapping his children and taking them to Malta during his dispute with Monique, who lives near Houston. In prison, he met a confidential informant who later told federal authorities of Grecula's alleged plans.

Charity Puzzled By FBI Raid (COLTRIB)

By Jacob Luecke

Columbia (MO) Tribune, September 21, 2006

Group allowed in Iraq, it says.

A spokesman for a Michigan-based Islamic charity under FBI scrutiny says the organization did nothing wrong when it sent aid to Iraq during U.S. sanctions on the country.

Almost 100 community members showed up at the rally this morning at the First Christian Church.

On Monday, the FBI raided the Southfield, Mich., office of Life for Relief and Development and simultaneously searched the Columbia home of Iraqi-American Shakir Hamoodi, 54, on Woodberry Court. Hamoodi, who owns an international grocery in Columbia, is a paid speaker who helps the charity's fundraising efforts.

Relief for Life provides humanitarian, health and other services in war- and disaster-torn countries around the world.

The charity's attorney, Ihsan Alkhatib, has said federal investigators were interested in whether its aid to Iraq violated U.S. sanctions in place before the war.

Mohammed Alomari, Life for Relief spokesman, said the group did send food and medicine into the country during the sanctions period under a special license from the U.S. Department of the Treasury. During that time, Alomari said, Life for Relief sent funds to Jordan to purchase food and then shipped the food and medicine into Iraq.

"We did everything," he said, "Whatever the legal guidelines were established for this kind of work, we strictly followed those guidelines."

The treasury department did issue licenses allowing groups to deliver food, medicine and services to Iraq during sanctions, said Molly Millerwise, director of public affairs for the treasury department. She said, however, that the federal Trade Secrets Act barred her from saying which organizations had those licenses.

Wayne Anderson, a University of Missouri-Columbia professor emeritus who has done disaster relief work around the world, said he once met a director for Life for Relief while helping India recover from a devastating earthquake in 2001. He said the group appeared completely legitimate.

"They were working as a true relief organization, taking care of people, feeding people and trying to find shelter," Anderson said. "There was no hint that this group was politically involved."

The FBI has continually declined to elaborate on the reasoning behind the search of Hamoodi's home and the Life for Relief headquarters, citing a sealed search warrant.

The warrant was issued by U.S. Magistrate William Knox in Jefferson City.

Typically, the FBI would go through U.S. Attorney Bradley Schlozman to get the search warrant. Don Ledford, spokesman for Schlozman, said he could not confirm that his office obtained the warrant for the FBI.

Speaking in general terms, Ledford said to get a warrant, Schlozman needs to convince the judge a search is needed to confirm the existence of evidence of suspected criminal action.

"The court doesn't give us a blank check," Ledford said. "We present the judge with the information that we have to explain why we need to conduct the search, and if that satisfies the judge, then the judge signs off on it."

Also speaking in general terms, he said the court sometimes issues sealed warrants because there might be concern that suspects could flee if they learn about the warrant.

He would not give a time frame for public disclosure of more information about what prompted officials to search Hamoodi's house.

Alomari said Life for Relief would have opened its documents without a search warrant if asked.

Hamoodi, who owns Columbia's World Harvest International and Gourmet Foods, is one of about 60 paid employees at Life for Relief. He is one of only four members of the organization to have their homes searched. The others are CEO Khalil Jassemm and two members of the charity's board of directors.

Alomari said the FBI attention on Hamoodi was puzzling because he is not a prominent member of the charity. "It's very surprising," he said. "I don't know why they would search his house."

This morning religious leaders and peace activists gathered at First Christian Church on Tenth Street to condemn the FBI for the investigation and show support for Hamoodi, his wife, Lamya Najem, 40, and their five children. Several people said they believed the raid was intended to intimidate Hamoodi and other Muslims in Mid-Missouri.

"Although the FBI may have been legally warranted in their actions, they were morally unwarranted in my opinion," said Larry Brown, chairman of the Interfaith Peace Alliance.

FBI Raid On Missouri Muslim Leader Linked To Michigan Case (AP)

By Alan Scher Zagier

AP, September 21, 2006

COLUMBIA, Mo. (AP) — A Muslim leader and Iraq war opponent whose home was raided by the FBI says the agents told him they were interested in his links to a Michigan charity that also was searched.

Shakir Abdul-Kaf Hamoodi, a former University of Missouri-Columbia engineering professor who now owns a grocery store here, said Tuesday that agents were interested in his connection to the Southfield, Mich., Muslim organization Life for Relief and Development.

An FBI spokesman declined to reveal the reasons for the search. Hamoodi, who was provided a copy of the sealed search warrant, declined a request by The Associated Press to review the document.

A dozen agents arrived Monday at the Columbia home of Hamoodi and his wife, Lamya Mukhlef Najem, and removed boxes and computer equipment throughout the day.

Hamoodi said he was in Detroit on Monday but not working for the relief agency. When he asked agents if the search could wait until he returned to Missouri, they said no, citing the simultaneous search in Michigan, he said.

Hamoodi said he cooperated with federal investigators.

"They came in, asked questions, I told them the answers and they left," he told the Columbia Missourian. Hamoodi declined to specify what questions he was asked.

Hamoodi said he has worked as a paid organizer and fundraiser for the organization for several years. Though he travels throughout the country on its behalf, Hamoodi said he has not gone abroad with the organization.

The charity's head of legal services told the Detroit Free Press that the FBI wanted to find out whether the charity broke U.S. sanctions by doing business in Iraq before the war.

Hamoodi, 54, grew up in Anah, a town in central Iraq, and lived in Scotland and France before moving to Columbia 21 years ago. He earned a doctorate in nuclear engineering from the University of Missouri-Columbia before working as an assistant research professor for the school's College of Engineering.

Hamoodi now owns the World Harvest market, and his wife teaches at an Islamic school in Columbia. He has made several appearances in opposition to the war in Iraq, and the couple's home was recently defaced with graffiti.

Hamoodi said he plans to continue speaking out against the war. The father of five children — ages 9 to 19 and all born in Columbia — also offered a heartfelt plea to his friends, customers and neighbors.

"I want to assure them that at no time, under any circumstances, do they need to expect any harm from me and my family members to this country," he said. "I have done nothing wrong."

On Tuesday afternoon, a steady stream of customers appeared at Hamoodi's store to offer their support. Many more called and showed up unannounced at his home Monday night, he said.

The search of Hamoodi's home came three days after a community meeting at which local Muslims raised concerns about racial profiling and an October 2004 FBI raid of the Islamic American Relief Agency's U.S. headquarters in Columbia.

Hamoodi, who attended the meeting, said the search warrant was dated Sept. 12 — meaning FBI agents knew about the impending raid even as they vowed to work with the Muslim community.

"What they did (Monday) has really nullified everything they did Friday," he said.

The U.S. Treasury Department has linked the Islamic American Relief Agency to the Sudan-based Islamic African Relief Agency, which they say has ties to Osama Bin Laden, al-Qaida and Hamas. No one has been charged in that case.

Hoekstra Calls For Broader Terror Plan (AP-Y)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, September 21, 2006

The House Intelligence Committee chairman said Wednesday that the United States must attack Islamic extremism with more than military might by focusing on social and economic work in countries cooperating in counterterrorism efforts.

"We need to recognize that this war cannot be won solely by being on offense in a military sense," said Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich. "We need a comprehensive strategy, as well, to engage them on a number of different fronts."

A spokesman for Hoekstra said he was not distancing himself from the Bush administration, but was laying out additional steps that should be taken against al-Qaida and other extremist groups. The White House contended that it has long said a comprehensive strategy is needed.

Speaking at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, a think tank, Hoekstra cited his trip this year to Algeria, a relatively new U.S. partner in the counterterrorism fight. He said leaders there told him that they wanted to work with the United States on economic, medical, energy and other development issues beyond military and intelligence.

The comments accompanied release of a committee report examining how al-Qaida has changed since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the continuing threat posed by its affiliates and by homegrown terrorists.

"Unfortunately, there are still gaps in our understanding of Islamist extremist groups, which leaves America vulnerable to future attacks," the 28-page document concludes.

Democrats on the intelligence committee did not support the report, either voting against it or abstaining. They have expressed concern that Republicans are using it to fan voter fear for political gain and say the threat assessment adds no new information to the nation's understanding of challenges facing the government.

"It is clear that al-Qaida and Islamic extremists pose a serious threat to U.S. national security. The American people do not need the House Intelligence Committee to remind them of this fact," the committee's nine Democrats wrote in an addendum.

But Hoekstra said the report and others released by the committee are appropriate and educational, no matter the political timing. "People don't recognize that this is a different kind of conflict and a different kind of enemy than we have fought before," he said.

The report devotes significant attention to extremists' electronic messaging, saying the U.S. government must do more to counter terrorists' "unchallenged use of the Internet."

It also praises the CIA's decision in September 2004 to create an office that looks at the politics of Islam. "Still, this is not enough," the report says. "This one program at the CIA can only reach a finite number of people."

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said the program examines the issue globally, analyzing long-term issues. "It's a relatively small office, but it's doing extraordinarily important work," he said.

The House committee has been preparing a series of public reports on issues including intelligence overhaul, Iran and an upcoming assessment on North Korea.

When the Iran report was released last month, the International Atomic Energy Agency said the document was "outrageous and dishonest" in trying to make a case that Tehran's nuclear program is geared toward making weapons.

Hoekstra conceded there was a problem with one photo caption, which overstated Iran's uranium production capabilities. But he stood by the report's assertion that an IAEA inspector was fired for raising concerns about Iranian deception on its nuclear program. "That is a pretty lousy management style," Hoekstra said.

U.S. intelligence agencies have been asked to review the House reports for accuracy and declassification; the review is not meant to be a signal that the agencies concur with the findings.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Debate Over Chemical Plant Security Focuses On Strictness Of Rules (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — After nearly five years of debate over whether the chemical industry should be required to protect plants better against a terrorist attack, a fierce struggle is going on behind the scenes in Congress to deal with what is considered one of the nation's most serious vulnerabilities.

The clash, which could be resolved as soon as Thursday, is testing the balance of power not just between Republicans and Democrats, but also between rival Republicans in the House and the Senate and between environmentalists and the chemical industry, all of whom have dug in to defend their views.

But the Bush administration, the chemical industry, Democrats, Republicans and environmentalists do agree on one important point: voluntary measures put into place by the industry after the 2001 terrorist attacks are not enough.

An analysis by the Department of Homeland Security found 272 chemical plants nationwide at which an attack or accident could affect at least 50,000 people and an additional 3,400 plants at which more than 1,000 people were at risk.

In too many cases, everyone agreed, plants have not complied with the voluntary standards requiring them to evaluate vulnerabilities to a terror attack and to take steps to eliminate them, like installing fences, cameras or other security measures.

As recently as Tuesday, it looked as if the chemical industry, with the assistance of Senator George V. Voinovich, Republican of Ohio, was on its way to winning approval for regulations that echoed almost word for word what the industry had been seeking.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff would have been authorized to establish regulations requiring security measures, but the regulations would have applied only to a sliver of facilities that manufacture, use or store toxic chemicals and that are deemed to have the "highest levels of security risk." Mr. Chertoff would not have had the power to shut down plants not in compliance.

The proposal would also have left decisions about security plans entirely up to these high-risk plants.

"Nothing in this section authorizes the secretary directly or indirectly to require any particular security measure," the proposed language said. That wording had been endorsed by 34 senators, all but one Republicans, in a letter that Mr. Voinovich circulated Monday.

But Democrats, and some Republicans, said the proposed regulation was far too friendly to the industry.

"This closed-door deal is industry-written and incomplete," Senator Frank R. Lautenberg, Democrat of New Jersey, said in a statement Wednesday. "Americans shouldn't be fooled that this will protect them from a terrorist attack on a chemical plant. We need stronger measures that will force the industry to take this issue seriously."

Industry officials acknowledge that they were pleased with the proposal by Mr. Voinovich, and they have been lobbying intensely to get it passed.

"It is short, simple and effective," said Margaret Hunt, a lobbyist for the Edison Electric Institute, which is helping a broad range of companies that would be affected by the regulations monitor the negotiations. "We kind of like it."

Approval of the industry-backed measure is now in question because of objections raised by Senator Susan Collins of Maine, Representative Peter T. King of New York, and Senator Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, all Republicans who hold powerful positions.

Ms. Collins and Mr. King are the leaders of the Senate and House committees that oversee the Homeland Security Department's operations, and Mr. Gregg is chairman of the Senate panel that oversees its budget, and thus controls the bill into which Republicans want to include some form of regulations.

Mr. Gregg said in an interview Wednesday that the Republicans organized by Mr. Voinovich must come to an agreement with Mr. King, Ms. Collins and others with oversight authority before any language would go into the budget bill. He said he hoped to have a final agreement on the Department of Homeland Security budget bill in time for it to win final passage by Congress before it goes on recess this month until after the midterm elections.

Mr. King and Ms. Collins want the proposed regulation changed so it applies to all chemical plants that are at "high" risk, instead of just the "highest," spokesmen for the two said. They want the Homeland Security Department to inspect plants to ensure compliance and shut any that do not honor the rules. They also want any regulations inserted into the budget to expire after three years, so Congress will have a chance to pass more comprehensive rules.

"I do want a chemical plants bill, but one that is meaningful," Mr. King said Wednesday evening.

Many Democrats, meanwhile, are struggling to add even stronger provisions to the regulations that would allow states like New Jersey, which already has its own plant rules, to have stronger requirements and to allow the Homeland Security Department to mandate that plants consider switching to less toxic chemicals, if the conversion would not be excessively expensive or complicated.

"Five years after 9/11, security at our chemical plants is still voluntary and our cities and critical infrastructure are still too vulnerable," said a letter signed Wednesday by 22 Democrats and one independent, all senators. "Too many legislators have worked too long on comprehensive legislation to see that effort undermined by backroom deals."

As it monitors the negotiations, the chemical industry is seeking most importantly to prevent regulations that would order plants to consider switching the chemicals they use. Industry representatives argue, as they have since the debate began, that Democrats and environmentalists are trying to hijack what had been an antiterrorism matter and use it to advance their own agenda.

"They were trying to pursue their agenda to ban certain chemicals under the guise of security," said Scott Jensen, a spokesman for the American Chemistry Council. "This is not the appropriate place to have that debate."

Environmentalists say that a fence or security camera is not enough to prevent a dangerous chemical release in an urban area — that only replacing the highly toxic chemical will accomplish that goal.

Ms. Collins, who has a track record in important negotiations including the reconfiguration of the government intelligence agencies and the restructuring of the Federal Emergency Management Agency now pending before Congress, said in an interview Wednesday evening that she remained hopeful that an agreement would be reached in time to insert regulations in the budget bill.

"This vulnerability has been raised time and again by terrorism experts," she said. "It is a glaring one that invites attack."

Bioterrorism Drugs Join Congress's Agenda (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

WASHINGTON -- As military tribunals and wiretapping dominate Congress's pre-election agenda, biotech companies are pushing lawmakers to enact a less divisive -- and more lucrative -- homeland-security measure: a $1 billion fund for vaccines and treatments for anthrax, smallpox and pandemic flu.

Since the anthrax attacks in October 2001, the biotech and venture-capital industries have seen new potential in developing products against bioterrorism. Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, a Menlo Park, Calif., venture-capital firm that has been lobbying for the measure, earlier this year formed a $200 million fund focused on development of vaccines and drugs for flu and bioterrorism threats. Small biotech firms, often with grants from the National Institutes of Health, or NIH, are scrambling to advance their research on products that the government might be interested in buying. Big drug makers are expressing interest in pairing with smaller players. But without greater support from the government, industry leaders say it is difficult, if not impossible, to bring their products to market.

The industry's campaign has drawn bipartisan backing. Senate legislation, sponsored by Sen. Richard Burr (R., N.C.) and several other Republicans, has the backing of Democrats such as Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, home to a burgeoning biotechnology industry. In the House, similar legislation is sponsored by a handful each of Republicans and Democrats. The House Energy and Commerce Committee passed the legislation yesterday and the full House is expected to take up the bill soon.

But for all the momentum, the bill could stall amid a tight schedule on Capitol Hill and a climate in which Republicans and Democrats already are squabbling over counterterrorism measures. Yesterday, Republican leaders made bumpy progress on their national security agenda. President Bush's push for broader authority to conduct warrantless wiretapping was approved by the House committee that oversees intelligence. Meanwhile, the House Judiciary Committee initially rejected Mr. Bush's plan for interrogating and prosecuting suspected terrorists, as all Democrats and two Republicans opposed it. Then the committee voted again, after summoning absent Republicans, and passed the measure, 20 to 19.

Republican leaders in the Senate had planned to bring the bioterrorism measure to the floor this week, provided it could be done quickly without Democratic objections or amendments. But, while Democrats say they want to pass the measure, they also want the chance to improve it, said Jim Manley, spokesman for Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. He said Democrats aren't stalling to deprive Republicans of an antiterror legislative victory before the elections. "People on both sides of the aisle want to try to pass it as quickly as possible," Mr. Manley said.

Among the issues Democrats want to bring up: revisiting liability protections for vaccine makers that were provided in a spending bill late last year and beefing up the focus in the bill on emergency planning for at-risk populations, such as the elderly.

Mr. Burr, for his part, thought the bill had been vetted sufficiently. "This has two years of work put into it. Most objections of any significance have been addressed," he said.

The $1 billion fund is supposed to alleviate some of the problems with Project BioShield, a $5.6 billion program enacted in 2004 that is criticized by both industry and lawmakers for being slow to disburse development funds for new vaccines and other drugs to combat dangerous pathogens. Under the Senate proposal, a new agency would dole out the $1 billion in much the way venture capitalists do: in a series of increments as the recipients show progress, rather than in lump sums as practiced by BioShield's administrators at the Department of Health and Human Services. In addition, BioShield's mission would be expanded to include infectious diseases that could cause a public-health emergency, such as pandemic flu.

In recent years, as the biotechnology industry has grown, it has increased its visibility on Capitol Hill, both in terms of lobbying presence and campaign contributions. The Biotechnology Industry Organization, the industry's trade group, has as its president former Pennsylvania Republican Rep. James Greenwood. While individual companies such as Amgen Inc. are substantial political donors, it is mostly smaller, lesser known companies that have shown interest in entering the uncertain bioterrorism sector.

The $1 billion in grants that would be made available in the bioterrorism legislation is meant to address the "Valley of Death" that such smaller players say they face when trying to develop bioterrorism products. While the government has programs to fund early-stage research and late-stage procurement, companies say they need more support in the middle phase, when they conduct clinical trials and gear up manufacturing capabilities.

Current NIH funding, while crucial, "only takes us up to a certain point," says Peter Young, president and chief executive of AlphaVax Inc., a Research Triangle Park, N.C., company working on technology to deliver into the body vaccines for flu and illnesses caused by bioterrorism. Project BioShield is "insufficient" and "fragmented," Mr. Young adds.

Passage of the bill also would show that the government is committed to funding bioterrorism research and development -- a move companies said would give the private sector greater confidence. "It sends a signal and maybe allows us to raise more money" from the private sector, says Francesca Cook, vice president for policy and government affairs at PharmAthene Inc., an Annapolis, Md., company developing treatments for anthrax and smallpox.

The Senate bill also would address some concerns raised about the government's response to the health emergencies experienced after Hurricane Katrina. It designates the.

Air Marshals' Injuries Raise Lawmaker's Concern (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066824

A key House member yesterday said that Congress should review the large number of federal air marshals sidelined by injuries sustained while protecting passengers from another September 11-style terrorist attack.

More than 2,100, or nearly half the Federal Air Marshals Service's peak force, have been awarded workers' compensation claims in the past three years, according to the Labor Department.

Rep. John L. Mica, Florida Republican and chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure subcommittee on aviation, said he was "surprised" by the high volume of injuries.

"These are supposed to be our healthiest and most physically fit people to undertake that kind of responsibility, and the number does seem to be inordinately high," Mr. Mica said.

Mr. Mica's subcommittee has responsibility over the federal flight deck officers program, which arms pilots to protect airplanes from hijackings, and said he has "grandfather oversight responsibility" for the marshals.

"We will look at it, whether Homeland Security [committee] or whoever has legislative authority over the air marshals. We need to look at it, so we will check it out so that we can make sure to have those people ready and fit to do the job," Mr. Mica said.

"I deal with pilots and flight attendants on aircraft all the time, and we don't have that kind of record," Mr. Mica said.

Any depletion in airline security from the marshals service would be augmented by the thousands of pilots who now carry guns, Mr. Mica said.

The Washington Times reported yesterday that 2,450 claims have been filed in the past three years for workers' compensation, with 2,136 having been accepted, according to statistics provided by the Labor Department.

The marshals are reporting various injuries, including barotrauma and decompression sickness, which can rupture eardrums and require sinus, even brain surgery.

"They're killing their people," one air marshal told The Times on the condition of anonymity. "Congress needs to get involved and take a look because our health and well being is being jeopardized on a daily basis. If you have air marshals flying sick, they are not properly protecting the public."

Calls yesterday to the House Homeland Security Committee and to the office of Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and panel chairman, were not returned. A Republican staffer for the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee, which has jurisdiction over TSA, said it is "unclear" whether there will be any oversight.

In a written rebuttal provided last night, the Transportation Security Administration disputed The Times' report as "inaccurate" and "misleading."

"The health of the workforce has been and continues to be a major focus of the Federal Air Marshals Service," the statement said.

"Only 48 claimants remain off work and are in receipt of benefits due to wage loss from workers' compensation claims," the statement said.

But marshals say the reason for the small number of off-work claimants is that the typical injuries make marshals unable to fly frequently. Such a marshal cannot fulfill the mission for which he was hired, and he thus can be fired.

Shawn McCullers, who was fired after developing deep-vein thrombosis, said many marshals are afraid to make medical claims for fear of dismissal.

"Orthopedic and barotrauma injuries, are the most common reported by the workforce," the TSA said. "Deep vein thrombosis is an extremely rare condition and less than a handful of cases have been reported."

The TSA also disputes how much flight time air marshals are assigned -- officially, five hours a day with 12 hours downtime between each flight and only 15 days a month.

"That's a lie," the air marshal said. "I would love to fly only 15 days a month."

Don Strange, former special agent in charge of the Atlanta field office until last year, was puzzled by TSA's statement that marshals only cover two flights a day.

"When I was there, the guys flew three legs a day, now they are flying four a day," Mr. Strange said.

Analysis: Hopes For Iraqi Leader Fading (AP)

By Robert H. Reid, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

Four months after Iraq's unity government took office, hope is turning to disappointment. Key U.S. leaders are hinting that Iraq's leaders must make hard decisions — and soon — if they expect American support to continue.

So far, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government has failed to stop sectarian militias responsible for much of the bloodshed, or to make headway in luring Sunni Arabs away from the insurgency.

Al-Maliki also has run into persistent trouble from U.S. critics in Congress angry at his recent meeting with Iran's president and his refusal to condemn the Hezbollah militia, which fought Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0066825

Publicly, the Bush administration continues to offer strong support for al-Maliki, with President Bush saying Wednesday he is optimistic the government will succeed. But Bush also offered a not-too-subtle hint that the American commitment to Iraq and its current government is not open-ended.

The president said Iraqis could count on U.S. support "so long as the government continues to make the tough choices necessary for peace to prevail."

His words are a clear signal that Washington expects al-Maliki's government to make those tough choices, including cracking down on Shiite militias — some of them led by politicians who are among the prime minister's key supporters.

But rather than intimidating Shiite militias, the security crackdown in Baghdad appears to be emboldening them as sweeps by U.S. troops move closer to Sadr City, stronghold of the Mahdi Army of Shiite radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

U.S. soldiers say they have noted militias becoming more aggressive as American and Iraqi forces seek to pacify Shiite neighborhoods on the fringes of Sadr City, which is part of Baghdad.

Even al-Maliki's supporters acknowledge the unity government has failed to gain traction but insist the prime minister is not entirely to blame.

"(He) needs a better team than the current one," Shiite lawmaker Hassan al-Suneid said Wednesday. "Some blocs want him to make some changes or replacements in the Cabinet."

Sunni lawmaker Adnan al-Dulaimi said the problem is that the government has failed to galvanize support among tribal leaders, clerics and politicians.

That certainly is a long way from the rosy forecasts U.S. officials made six months ago as Iraqi politicians put together their government of national unity after December elections.

At that point, U.S. officials predicted a coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds would give all of Iraq's communities a stake in government. Over time, they hoped that unity government would calm the tensions which threaten to plunge the country into full-scale civil war.

Instead, the first months of al-Maliki's government have been marked by sharp increases in bloodshed, forcing U.S. commanders to send thousands more American soldiers into the Iraqi capital.

U.S. officers say privately that Iraqi commanders are themselves frustrated by the lack of direction from al-Maliki's government on how to deal with the militias, especially the Mahdi Army and others affiliated with Shiite political movements.

Al-Maliki, a Shiite, appears reluctant to crack down on the militias for fear of losing support from their patrons. But without a move against Shiite gunmen, it is unlikely his government can persuade Sunni Arab insurgents to lay down their arms either.

"We're pushing this (al-Maliki) government to get a policy" on how to deal with the militias, Maj. Gen. James Thurman, the commander of coalition forces in Baghdad, told The Associated Press on Wednesday.

Right now, the militias "are holding the rule of law in contempt," Thurman complained.

The message is also likely to be delivered by a bipartisan commission due to make recommendations to Bush after the November congressional elections.

Former congressman Lee Hamilton, co-chairman of the group, said Tuesday that the Iraqi government "needs to show its own citizens soon — and the citizens of the United States — that it is deserving of continued support."

U.S. Must End Occupation (USAT)

By Jim Mcgovern

USA Today, September 21, 2006

The war in Iraq was a mistake, and the U.S. military occupation there must end.

From the deceitful and shifting rationales for war, to Bush officials forbidding our generals from making meaningful post-invasion plans, the policies pursued in Iraq have failed and have forced our brave troops to carry out a dangerous and often untenable mission.

The war in Iraq is distinct from the global war against terrorism. Because of Iraq, U.S. standing is at its lowest point ever, making us more isolated and vulnerable in an increasingly dangerous world.

Nearly 2,700 of our uniformed men and women have sacrificed their lives. More than 20,000 have been wounded, and tens of thousands of Iraqi civilians have been killed in a vicious and escalating cycle of sectarian violence. Billions of taxpayer dollars have been wasted. Every day the civil war gets worse, not better.

So what's next?

Those who argue for more of the same, or for a military escalation requiring substantially more troops, must answer several questions: What is the definition of success? How many more troops should we send? Where do you expect them to come from? Should we withdraw more troops from the worsening situation in Afghanistan to send to Iraq? What difference do you believe they can make?

Most of our troops in Iraq have already been forced to serve three or more deployments. U.S. military readiness is at historic lows. The time when more troops might have made a difference is long past.

I believe we should take a different approach, one that could galvanize Iraq's government, people, neighbors and the international community to take a greater role to promote a stable Iraq — the safe and orderly removal of U.S. troops. Whether through an immediate withdrawal, as I favor, or phased over a specific period of time, ending the U.S. military occupation could provide Iraq and the global community a fresh opportunity to carry out new ideas in a new context.

The United States must continue funding economic, social and democracy-building programs. We must continue funding and equipping Iraqi security forces or a new multilateral force.

It might be too late to save Iraq, but removing the U.S. military from the quagmire there is the only way to force the Iraqis — and the international community — to finally begin to forge a better future for that country.

Rep. Jim McGovern, D-Mass., has proposed legislation to end funding for the Iraq war.

U.S. Warns Of Increased Violence In Iraq (AP)

By Patrick Quinn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

Top U.S. generals warned Wednesday that violence will increase in Baghdad during the Islamic holy month of Ramadan and said al-Qaida in Iraq already has intensified its assaults against American troops.

The warnings came as violence killed some 65 people and wounded more than 100 in two days. At least 23 people died in bombings and shootings around the country Wednesday, and 10 bodies were found. The day's deadliest attack took place in Samarra, where a suicide car bombing outside a Sunni tribal leader's house killed 10 and wounded 38.

The military said a U.S. soldier was killed Wednesday by small-arms fire in northeastern Baghdad, and reported the death of another American in a roadside blast in the same area the day before. A third U.S. soldier died in the capital in "a non-combat incident," the military said, without giving details.

"If you historically look at this time period just before and going into Ramadan, there has unfortunately been an increase in violence. That, in fact, is occurring within the city," said U.S. Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the senior military spokesman in Iraq.

He said Iraqi and U.S. forces were carrying out operations against insurgents and terrorists to "disrupt their ability to coordinate violence prior to Ramadan."

Thousands of Iraqi and U.S. soldiers launched a security sweep around Baghdad on Aug. 7. The operation managed to lower violence in targeted areas of Baghdad, but attacks spiked in the rest of the city.

"Al-Qaida in Iraq, insurgents and death squads have recently increased their attacks" in the Baghdad area, Caldwell said.

"This past week, there was a spike in execution-style murders in Baghdad. Many bodies found had clear signs of being bound, tortured and executed. We believe death squads and other illegal armed groups are responsible."

Caldwell said it was believed that the increase in al-Qaida attacks against American forces came after a threat issued Sept. 7 by Abu Ayyoub al-Masri, also known as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq. The U.S. military, which killed the group's previous leader, has put a $5 million bounty on al-Masri's head.

The commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad told The Associated Press that he has been ordered to try to control the violence ahead of Ramadan, which is expected to begin around Sept. 24.

"The thing that I was told to do, prior to the month of Ramadan, is dramatically reduce the number of mortars, kidnappings, assassinations and (car bombs) inside of Baghdad and predominantly try to reduce the sectarian violence," Maj. Gen. James Thurman said.

He said he was pushing Iraqi leaders to do more about sectarian militias responsible for killing thousands of people — most of them in the capital — and would also need more Iraqi troops.

"Militias are holding the rule of law in contempt. We're pushing this government to get a policy as to how they're going to deal with it so their own people know how to deal with the militias," Thurman said. "I would like to see more Iraqi forces. We are pushing that very hard."

Sunni Arabs have linked Shiite-dominated government ministries, including the Interior Ministry, to death squads. Both Sunni Arab and Shiite death squads roam the streets of Baghdad.

However, the U.S. general helping train Iraqi police said that so far none of the death squad members detained had ties to the Interior Ministry or other government agencies.

"From a general allegation that the Ministry of Interior is sponsoring death squads, it has not been borne out by those we have captured and detained to date," Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson said.

When asked which militias the death squad members seemed to have been recruited from, Peterson did not elaborate, except to say that "Jaish al-Mahdi is certainly one of them."

He referred to the Mahdi Army, which is loyal to radical anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. There have been reports, however, that the militia has splintered recently — with some groups breaking away from al-Sadr.

Since Threat, Attacks On U.S. Troops Have Risen (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 20 -- Attacks against U.S. troops have increased in the two weeks since al-Qaeda in Iraq's new leader urged insurgents to target American forces, a U.S. military spokesman said Wednesday.

Since the threat posted on the Internet on Sept. 7 by Abu Ayyub al-Masri, also known as Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, at least 23 servicemen have been killed, mostly by suicide car bombers or roadside bombs, according to U.S. military news releases.

The latest casualty came Wednesday when a U.S. soldier was killed by gunfire in northeastern Baghdad, according to the military, which also reported the death of a soldier in a roadside explosion Tuesday northeast of Baghdad.

"Al-Qaeda in Iraq, insurgents and death squads have recently increased their attacks, with the primary area being focused in the Baghdad area," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the U.S. military's top spokesman in Iraq.

Caldwell added that in the past week there had been "a spike in execution-style murders" of Iraqi civilians in Baghdad and that "many bodies found had clear signs of being bound, tortured and executed." The violence, he said, is expected to increase during the Islamic fasting month of Ramadan, which is scheduled to start next week.

Across the country, suicide bombings killed several dozen people and wounded scores over a 24-hour period, and a U.N. report released Wednesday found that the Iraqi death toll from violence in July and August rose by several hundred over the count for the previous two months.

Citing figures from morgues and the Iraqi Health Ministry, the report said the July total of 3,590 violent deaths was "unprecedented," while the August figure of 3,009 was still among the highest monthly totals ever. In comparison, there were 2,669 violent deaths in May and 3,149 in June, the report said.

"Terrorist attacks, the growth of militias, the emergence of organized crime reflects a lack of centralized and authorized control over the use of force in the country, which results in indiscriminate killings of civilians," the United Nations said in a statement. "In this context, hundreds of bodies have continued to appear throughout the country bearing signs of severe torture and execution-style killing."

The report said corpses of people detained by factional militias or by Iraqi security forces in prisons run by the Interior and Defense ministries showed signs of beatings with electrical cables, broken bones and cigarette burns. Bodies at the morgue often "bear signs of severe torture including acid-induced injuries and burns caused by chemical substances, missing skin, broken bones, missing eyes, missing teeth and wounds caused by power drills or nails," it said.

The U.S. military reported recently that murders halved in August from July but has not provided an explanation for this conclusion, stating only that the figures do not include deaths caused by bombings or other large-scale attacks.

In Shirgat, northeast of Mosul, dual blasts Tuesday night targeted a youth center near an Iraqi army base, killing 22 people, including 11 Iraqi soldiers, said Capt. Hasan al-Jubury of the Shirgat police.

"A large fireball rose up, and I could see human parts flying up in all directions," said Raad Hussein Hamdani, who was wounded in the legs and abdomen by shrapnel. "I and my friends rushed to the rescue. . . . Within a few seconds, the second explosion occurred and more people died or were wounded."

A car bomb detonated Wednesday in the town of Samarra, 65 miles north of Baghdad, in front of a house of tribesmen who opposed al-Qaeda in Iraq, killing 10 and wounding 38, police said.

In the southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora, a roadside bomb exploded at an intersection near the entrance of the Dora Refinery, targeting a bus transporting oil refinery employees. As police and bystanders rushed to help the wounded, a suicide bomber rammed his car into a nearby police checkpoint, killing nine people and injuring 18.

Meanwhile, Iraqi police patrols found 34 corpses, most of them of people who had been shot to death and dumped in various neighborhoods across Baghdad, said Brig. Abdullah Salem of the Interior Ministry. In the past week, more than 200 corpses, most of them showing signs of torture and execution, have turned up across Baghdad.

Special correspondents K.I. Ibrahim in Baghdad and Saad Sarhan in Najaf and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

U.N. Issues Grim Report On Iraq (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

BAGHDAD — The United Nations issued a somber human rights report Wednesday that focused on recent civilian deaths in Iraq, as at least 75 Iraqis were killed or found slain around the country.

Meanwhile, a top U.S. military spokesman said attacks against American troops had increased recently, as had killings by sectarian death squads that target civilians. He also said that American commanders expected violence to escalate even further during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which begins this weekend.

The report says 3,009 people were killed in Iraq during August, down from 3,590 in July. It warns that although the rate had declined at the beginning of the month, it had escalated again by month's end, especially in Baghdad.

The current level of violence, the report says, "is challenging the very fabric of the country."

The report also touches on other human rights issues. It notes that torture in official detention centers remains widespread; 300,000 people are displaced in Iraq; women are increasingly targets of violence in cases of "honor crimes"; and freedom of expression continues to suffer as a result of killings and intimidation of journalists.

The trend in the national civilian toll echoes recent statements by the Baghdad morgue, whose reports on deaths are often cited in tracking civilian casualties from sectarian fighting and the insurgency against the Iraqi government and the U.S.-led military.

These last few weeks have been even bloodier than usual in the capital, with a torrent of execution-style killings coming despite an American-led crackdown. But as U.S. commanders have focused on Baghdad, attackers have struck in northern and western parts of the country in what appears to be a coordinated campaign.

On Wednesday in Samarra, north of the capital, a suicide car bomber crashed into the home of a tribal leader who had recently denounced the Al Qaeda terrorist network. The blast killed 11 relatives but not the leader. Forty others were injured, authorities said.

In the oil-rich city of Kirkuk, also in the north, gunmen killed a government employee on his way to work, authorities said.

Eleven people were killed in attacks in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad, and two civilians were killed in separate bombings in the south.

Attackers also inflicted heavy casualties in the capital.

A suicide bomber driving a truck detonated his explosives near a checkpoint in the Dora neighborhood in south Baghdad, killing three people and injuring 11. A roadside explosion targeting an American patrol in east Baghdad killed one civilian. Separate mortar attacks on a checkpoint and a house injured eight people, according to police.

Two U.S. soldiers died in the capital in separate accidents Tuesday and Wednesday, and a third was shot and killed in northeast Baghdad on Wednesday, U.S. military statements said.

Police recovered 46 bodies in and around the capital. Some of the victims bore signs of torture. Many were blindfolded, handcuffed and had been shot, authorities said.

Iraqi security forces, especially police and special forces affiliated with the Interior Ministry, are widely believed to have been infiltrated by Shiite Muslim militias and have been accused of being behind many of the execution-style killings. But American commanders on Wednesday said they had scant evidence that ministry personnel were behind the death squads.

"Initially, there were a lot of allegations that death squads were not only coming out of Ministry of Interior forces but also organized by the Ministry of Interior," Army Maj. Gen. Joseph Peterson, who is in charge of training Iraqi police, told reporters during a news briefing.

The U.S. military has "not identified any Ministry of Interior personnel as a part of the death squad members and leaders that we have picked up," Peterson said, adding that "this seems to counter the initial allegations discrediting them."

At the same briefing, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the top military spokesman in Iraq, said the number of bombing attacks against American troops had increased since a Sept. 7 statement by the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Ayyub Masri.

Caldwell said the military expected an increased flow of foreign fighters into Iraq during Ramadan, which has been a period of increased violence.

Deployment Math Tests The Military (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — As prospects fade for U.S. force reductions in Iraq, Army and Marine commanders have been stepping up their warnings that the pace of troop deployments is increasingly straining the military and threatening to cause long-term damage.

According to Pentagon officials, senior officers in the Army and Marine Corps in recent weeks have begun warning that without a reduction in Iraq, the present schedule of combat tours would be difficult to sustain without an increase in the number of forces.

Army officials had been counting on a gradual drawdown in Iraq starting later this year and accelerating over the following 12 months.

But the rising violence in Baghdad forced the Pentagon to shelve those plans at the end of July, and Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, acknowledged publicly Tuesday that force levels would remain around the current 145,000 through spring.

One senior Pentagon official involved in long-term planning said the concerns had reached such a level that top Army leaders broached the issue of changing deployment rules to allow for more frequent call-ups of National Guard and Reserve units to relieve pressure on the active duty Army.

Because the Army relied heavily on the Guard and Reserve early in the war, many units have hit legal deployment limits, which allow for two years overseas out of every five. But without a change in those rules to allow more frequent Guard deployments, the Army would be forced to consider a push for an expansion of its active duty force, which stands at 504,000, the official said.

"You can start seeing the [effect of deployments] on the leadership of the active force," the official said, referring to limits on the use of Guard and Reserve troops. "That's the stress that we're having right now on this force."

Although most of the concerns regarding strains on the Marines and Army have been aired privately in the Pentagon, Abizaid told a group of military reporters this week that it would be difficult to find additional troops to send to Iraq to deal with insurgent violence in western Anbar province.

The Marine Corps has expressed less alarm about the high rate of deployments. Still, Defense officials said that in internal meetings, Gen. Michael W. Hagee, the Corps' commandant, had begun discussing his need to focus on force levels out of concern that "significant personnel issues" could develop.

"The margins are very thin," said one Defense official who has discussed the issue with senior Marine officers. "We haven't seen it occur yet; it's just something that causes the commandant and the senior leadership of the Marine Corps to be very, very wary and to constantly monitor the manpower situation to ensure we're not using up the force in ways that we can't do other missions, if required."

Hagee has said publicly that he believes the Marine Corps should remain at 181,000 troops; Pentagon planning documents call for it to shrink to 175,000.

"You have personnel who are training right now primarily to do the mission in Iraq, but are not receiving their training for other mission areas or other contingencies," the official said. "If those contingencies erupt, they won't be ready, or as ready."

Under Army models, two active duty brigades are supposed to be at their home bases for equipment repairs or retraining for every brigade deployed to a war zone. However, over the course of the Iraq war, that ratio has fallen to one brigade stateside for every one overseas — meaning most combat units are returning to Iraq after barely a year at home. An Army brigade is made up of about 3,500 soldiers.

The Marines also face a 1-to-1 deployment ratio, officials said. There are 23,000 Marines in Iraq, along with about 120,000 Army soldiers. The remaining 2,000 are from the Air Force and Navy.

Some former senior military officials said that without a substantial draw-down, the military will face personnel issues. The Army, for instance, has been maintaining its overall force levels in part because of higher-than-expected reenlistment numbers. Army officials say those rates show soldiers have been pleased with their experience and are eager to continue to serve.

But military experts say if the operational pace continues, the reenlistments are likely to fall sharply.

"My gut keeps telling me we have 18 to 36 months until we see dramatic shifts in recruiting, retention and discipline of the ground forces," says retired Army Maj. Gen. William L. Nash, a former commander in Bosnia and a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. "I just think that the stress over time on the same people is building and building. I don't know when the valve on the pressure cooker goes off."

Jack L. Tilley, who from 2000 to 2004 served as sergeant major of the Army — the service's top enlisted officer — said family members had begun pressuring soldiers not to reenlist, arguing they had been away from home too long and worrying that chances of serious injury or death increased with each return to Iraq.

"It's like anything else," Tilley said. "You play a game — first time you win, the second time you win. Well, you know chances are getting slimmer and slimmer about getting hurt, and there is a lot of concern about that."

As force levels remain high, the number of soldiers and Marines sent on multiple combat missions has also continued to climb. About 30% of the nearly 400,000 active-duty Army soldiers and 36% of the 143,000 active-duty Marines who have been deployed to either Iraq or Afghanistan have seen multiple tours.

In addition, about 280,000 Army and Marine Corps reservists have done one or more deployments to Iraq or Afghanistan.

Under Army force models developed under Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, the Guard and Reserve were supposed to contribute four to five brigades to the pool of soldiers available for overseas service. But because of their heavy use early in the war, many have already hit their two-year limit, and only one Guard unit is deployed to Iraq.

The issue of revising the two-year limit is fraught with political risk. The Guard has strong support among key members of Congress, and a proposal last year to revise the regulations was dropped after concerns were raised by lawmakers.

But some Army officials have argued in recent weeks that unless the rule is revised, it will be difficult to sustain the current pace of deployment for the active force.

"If we're going to have an active duty force that's only going to be so big, you have to have access to the Reserve," the senior official said. "If you want to stay in this and never have to accelerate [Guard deployment], you'd better grow the [active] force."

Although discussions about changing the Guard rules have been underway for weeks, the official said it remained unclear when a decision would be made. Given the political sensitivity, however, it remains unlikely the Pentagon would propose any shift before the November election.

The military has been trying to ease the pressure on the Army and Marine Corps by using more Navy and Air Force service members in Iraq, but those efforts have not significantly eased the burden.

If the American force in Iraq cannot be shrunk, lawmakers will face some difficult decisions, military experts said.

"It is just a tough situation," Tilley said. "The question our Congress has to ask itself is at what point do we activate our country a little bit more. Nobody wants to talk about a draft. But how long are you going to go until enough is enough? Those are tough questions."

Pentagon Weighs Troop Demands In Iraq (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0066830

By Robert Burns

AP, September 20, 2006

The dimming outlook for significant U.S. troop cuts in Iraq means the Pentagon may soon face a difficult and politically sensitive decision: either make more frequent call-ups of some National Guard and Reserve troops or expand still further the size of the active-duty Army, defense officials say.

That choice, already under discussion but with no timetable for decision, is looming in light of the fact that the simultaneous wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have put the Army under enormous strain. In particular, active-duty soldiers are not getting the desired minimum of two years at home between combat deployments.

Army officials had hoped for some troop relief in Iraq in this election year, but the surge in sectarian violence, the persistence of the insurgency and the slow pace of political progress in Baghdad have snuffed out those hopes.

Gen. John Abizaid, the commander of U.S. forces throughout the Middle East, told reporters in Washington on Tuesday that the military will likely maintain — or possibly even increase — force levels of more than 140,000 troops in Iraq through next spring. The current total is 145,000, up about 20,000 since June.

In an Associated Press interview from Baghdad on Wednesday, Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said it is important to "get people's expectations calibrated" about what can be accomplished in the months ahead.

"Until we see the new government get its legs under it, until we see how the security situation in Baghdad comes out, we need to be thinking along the lines of maintaining about what we have" in terms of troop levels, he said.

Late last year, military leaders had indicated they hoped to reduce troop levels to about 100,000 by the end of this year for an Iraq war that has become widely unpopular at home. But Abizaid said Tuesday that rising sectarian violence and slow political progress made that impossible.

"I think that this level probably will have to be sustained through the spring," he said. "I think that we'll do whatever we have to do to stabilize Iraq and Afghanistan and use the military power of the U.S. to do that."

The U.S. military has about 21,000 troops in Afghanistan, an increase of several thousand over the past year.

Abizaid, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace are expected to meet with members of Congress later this week.

President Bush, in New York for U.N. General Assembly meetings on Tuesday, told Iraqi President Jalal Talabani that the U.S. will keep soldiers in Iraq as long as necessary. "I've told the president of Iraq that America has given her word to help you and we will keep our word. The people of Iraq must know that," Bush said.

Meanwhile, the White House denied reports that American officials are beginning to question whether Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can hold Iraq together and take the steps necessary to end its sectarian troubles.

"It's absolutely false," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "The man has been in power for barely more than 100 days, and frankly there has been significant progress."

The Army has been aiming to reorganize its combat forces in such a way as to increase the number of brigades available for deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan, but thus far it is six brigades short of its goal of 42. That is one reason why the Army was forced in 2004-05 to use more National Guard combat units in Iraq than normal; at one point there were seven Guard combat brigades there, compared with just one now.

But even now, active-duty Army brigades are cycling in and out of Iraq and Afghanistan at a faster pace than the goal of one year deployed for every two years at home. That puts a great deal of stress on the soldiers and their families.

"I don't know how long" that can go on, a senior defense official said in an interview this week. He spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the problem, which is being discussed behind closed doors.

The official likened the earlier troop-reduction plan for Iraq to the situation facing a soldier traveling down a road with a map that does not match the terrain he's seeing: The soldier has to deal with the terrain as it actually exists.

For the U.S. military, the road in Iraq has gotten rockier rather suddenly. An indication of that was the decision to extend the yearlong tour of duty for the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade; some of the unit's soldiers had already left Iraq — and families had already hung welcome home banners around the 172nd's main base in Alaska — when the decision to extend their tour by four months was announced in late July.

The Army has committed itself to not mobilizing National Guard and Reserve soldiers for war duty more than one year out of five. But in light of the possibility that troop requirements for Iraq and Afghanistan will remain high into 2007 and beyond, officials are already discussing whether in some cases Guard or Reserve soldiers may have to be recalled more frequently.

If it is decided to stick to the once-in-five-years formula for the Guard and Reserve, then it may be necessary to increase the size of the active-duty Army, the official said. The Army already is on a path to grow by 30,000 soldiers, to 512,000. It expects to end this fiscal year Sept. 30 at about 504,000 soldiers.

Michael O'Hanlon, a defense analyst at the Brookings Institution who closely follows developments in Iraq, said Tuesday the Army should have put itself on a course to grow beyond the 512,000 mark at the outset of the war rather than wait until now. Many in Congress pushed for a bigger increase in the Army, but Rumsfeld argued against it, in part because of the enormous long-term costs.

"We are in a dilemma," O'Hanlon said. "A radical new policy may be needed, such as offering citizenship to foreigners abroad if they'll serve first" in the U.S. military.

New Judge Tosses Saddam From Courtroom (AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub And Jamal Halaby, Associated Press Writers

AP, September 21, 2006

The new chief judge in the Saddam Hussein genocide trial threw the former Iraqi president out of court Wednesday, and his lawyers stormed out in protest. A leading human rights group charged that the government's decision to replace the former chief judge, Abdullah al-Amiri, threatens the independence of the troubled tribunal.

Mohammed Oreibi al-Khalifa presided Wednesday after the government removed al-Amiri, who angered Kurds by declaring last week that Saddam was "not a dictator."

The ousted president and seven others are on trial for the Operation Anfal crackdown on Kurdish rebels in the late 1980s. The prosecution says about 180,000 people, mostly civilians, were killed.

Defense lawyers immediately questioned the decision to replace al-Amiri.

"We don't expect this court established under the occupation authorities to be fair so we have decided to withdraw from this trial," defense lawyer Wadoud Fawzi told the court.

"The decision to sack the judge on the orders of the government shows that this trial lacks the standards of a fair trial," Fawzi said.

Al-Khalifa replied that replacing the chief judge was an "administrative matter" and if the lawyers walked out, the court would appoint new ones.

That prompted an outburst from Saddam, who pointed his finger at the judge, pounded his fist on the podium and thundered: "You must deal with us as the law dictates."

Al-Khalifa ordered Saddam to stop talking and when he refused, he ordered him escorted from the courtroom.

"Your father was in the security and he went on working as a sergeant in the security (forces) until the fall of Baghdad" in 2003, Saddam shouted.

Al-Khalifa shot back: "I challenge you in front of the public if this is the case."

Saddam's cousin "Chemical" Ali al-Majid told the judge that he too rejected court-appointed lawyers.

"I'll stay (in court), but I'll decline to say anything or defend myself and I'll gladly accept any verdict, even if it's the death penalty," he said.

In New York, Human Rights Watch said it was concerned about al-Amiri's removal.

"This appears to be improper interference in the independence of the tribunal, and may greatly damage the court," the group said in a statement signed by Richard Dicker, director of its International Justice Program.

Similar criticism was raised in Saddam's other trial for the deaths of Shiite Muslims in the town of Dujail following an assassination attempt against him in 1982.

The first chief judge in that trial resigned after Shiite politicians accused him of allowing Saddam to turn the trial into a forum for political statements.

A verdict in the Dujail case is due next month, and Saddam could face the death penalty if convicted.

With Saddam gone from the courtroom, the judges heard from five Kurdish witnesses Wednesday before recessing until next week.

Ismat Abdel-Qadir, 74, recalled a March 1987 attack on her northern village, Sowsinan, which she said was "burned down" by Iraqi warplanes.

"We knew it was a chemical attack because after the warplanes bombarded the village, something smelled like rotten apples," she said, wearing an embroidered black dress and a white headscarf.

Another witness, shepherd Ahmed Qadir, 39, testified that his village, Goushti, was hit with chemicals in March 1988.

"I saw heavy smoke coming," he said, recalling that he was near the village when the chemicals struck. On reaching the village, he also detected a rotten apple smell.

Qadir said he lost 12 relatives, including two sisters, their husbands and children. He said the attack turned their bodies and faces "black from burns."

Gharib Qadir, 29, said he spent six months at a detention center in 1988 — as an 11-year-old boy. He said he recalled an average of 10 people dying every day from disease and torture.

"One day, guards took my father," he said somberly. "After 15 minutes, they brought his dead body back to us and asked us to bury him. There was a red (bruise) on his forehead."

A New Judge But Same Old Drama In Hussein Trial (LAT)

By Louise Roug

DOJ_NMG_0066832

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

BAGHDAD — On his first day in charge, the judge watched the entire defense team walk out in protest. He then argued loudly with the main defendant before throwing him out.

In most other courtrooms, such goings-on would have raised eyebrows. But in the genocide trial of Saddam Hussein and six codefendants, theatrics and shenanigans are par for the course.

On Wednesday, Judge Mohammed Orabi Khalefa replaced Judge Abdullah Amiri, who had been accused by the prosecution of favoring the defense. The Iraqi government removed Amiri as head judge late Tuesday, a step Human Rights Watch and other groups fear could jeopardize the fairness of the tribunal.

The proceedings were barely underway Wednesday when Khalefa faced his first confrontation. Badie Aref, a defense lawyer, stood up.

"I want to withdraw from this court," he said.

He was followed by Wadud Fawsi, another defense lawyer, who read a statement on behalf of the defense team.

"The government is interfering in this trial and impacting its credibility," Fawsi said. "Since we doubt the credibility of this court, we decided to withdraw."

Khalefa told them, "You can go ahead," and the entire defense team walked out.

The judge then called in five court-appointed lawyers to represent the defendants, but Hussein stood up and complained about the change.

"You do not have the right to speak," the judge said sternly. Hussein shouted back, "You should listen to my opinion!" as he banged on the rail in front of him.

"I am the presiding judge, and I will decide who to listen to," Khalefa said.

Guards escorted Hussein out of the courtroom as the judge yelled, "Take him out, take him out!"

The other defendants, including Hussein's cousin, Ali Hassan Majid, said they wanted to follow the former president, but the judge refused to let them.

Afterward, Kurdish villagers testified about chemical attacks. The defendants are accused of orchestrating a brutal military offensive known as the Anfal campaign that killed as many as 100,000 Kurds in northern Iraq in 1987 and 1988.

The case has been as dramatic as a previous trial in which Hussein and seven codefendants were charged with killing 148 Shiites from the town of Dujayl after a 1982 assassination attempt against him. A verdict in that case is expected next month.

Judges were reshuffled in those proceedings as well after the head jurist resigned, citing "pressure."

Amiri, a Shiite Muslim, angered Kurdish and Shiite politicians last week when, during an exchange with Hussein, he said the former leader was "not a dictator."

Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's Cabinet transferred Amiri to a post with Iraq's Supreme Judiciary Council.

The move was necessary to preserve the neutrality of the tribunal hearing Hussein's case, government spokesman Ali Dabbagh said in a statement.

Khalefa is also a Shiite, born in southern Iraq. He was a judge during Hussein's rule.

A U.S. official familiar with the proceedings said the judicial switch was not final. The official, who requested anonymity, said the change still had to be approved by Iraq's presidential council, despite earlier reports that President Jalal Talabani had given it his blessing.

Khalefa is the ranking member of a five-judge panel. If the council approves the switch, the panel will vote to decide who will occupy the top bench, the official said.

"It's clear that this is a very high-profile, high-pressure, difficult job to do," the official said.

Firing Of Judge Sows Disorder In Baghdad Courtroom (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 20 -- Saddam Hussein's lawyers stormed out of his genocide trial on Wednesday to protest a government attempt to sack the tribunal's chief judge, a move against the theoretically independent judiciary that has pitched the troubled trial into chaos.

The bedlam in the courtroom -- including Hussein's expulsion -- followed a vote by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's cabinet on Tuesday to fire the chief judge, Abdullah al-Amiri, after he declared last week that Hussein was "not a dictator." The judge's comments infuriated many Iraqis and spurred calls for his removal.

Human rights groups and international legal observers condemned the government's intervention and said it would undermine Iraq's nascent judicial system by sending a message to judges that they must toe a politically correct line or risk being fired.

"This is Judicial Ethics 101: You don't remove a judge just because you don't like what he says," said Nehal Bhuta, a lawyer with the international justice program at Human Rights Watch, an observer of the tribunal. "This suggests to me that the government of Nouri al-Maliki doesn't have a basic grasp of the independence of the judiciary."

Iraqi and U.S. officials said the move to oust Amiri did not erode the independence of the judiciary. "There is no interference with the decisions and the daily work of the court," said Ali al-Dabbagh, a government spokesman.

The legal fracas represents more than just a historic clash between the executive and judicial branches -- it also reveals how some of the institutions that are held out as evidence of Iraq's progress toward democracy are less democratic than they at first seem. The judiciary is independent, except when it is not. Policemen and soldiers pledge fealty to the government, except when they report to factional militias. And the economy is moving toward a free-market system, except for the existence of subsidies and vestiges of government control.

"To say Iraq is a nascent democracy is an insult to democracy," said Joost Hiltermann, Middle East project director at the International Crisis Group. "Iraq is descending into total chaos; it is not in the process of building institutions."

Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish member of parliament, said: "There is more freedom, yes, but not democracy. It doesn't look democratic to anyone, really, except maybe to some people in the Iraqi government or the American administration. But not to most people."

In the courtroom Wednesday, an alternate judge was added to the five-member panel, which made no mention of the judicial shuffle at the start of the court session. Amiri, who will technically remain chief judge for several days until Iraq's presidency council confirms his reassignment, voluntarily chose not to come to court, U.S. and Iraqi officials said.

Wadood Fawozi, an attorney for Hussein, quickly jumped up at the start of the session and presented a request, signed by all the defense lawyers, for permission to withdraw from the case. The acting chief judge, Mohammed al-Uraibiy, who was described by U.S. officials as a Shiite Muslim from southern Iraq, granted the motion.

"The government is interfering in this trial and impacting its credibility," Fawozi said. "We cannot continue with our work fairly."

When Hussein objected to the new attorneys that Uraibiy appointed to represent him, the former president jumped up and began pointing at the judge. The judge asked Hussein to sit down at least 10 times before finally throwing him out of the courtroom.

"Take him out! Take him out!" Uraibiy shouted. Hussein pointed at the judge and said, "Your father was a deputy in my security agency!"

Uraibiy grew even angrier and began gesticulating with both hands. "I challenge you in front of the public -- " he said, then stopped in mid-sentence.

"Take him out! Take him out!" he quickly shouted again, as security guards escorted Hussein from the courtroom.

U.S. officials close to the court suggested they were aware of the plan to remove Amiri before it was announced and played down concerns that the move would undermine the tribunal's credibility. "It does not impact the fundamental fairness of this trial," said one of the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk publicly about the issue.

Iraq's Trials (NYT)

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

There are a lot of lessons that Iraqis, and the world, could learn from watching Saddam Hussein face trial for the 1988 campaign to exterminate the Kurds: That once-all-powerful dictators can be brought to justice. That the suffering of the weak is not forgotten. And that all Iraqis have a stake in ensuring that such horrors never happen again.

Instead, the trial is likely to spawn more cynicism and division after the Iraqi government fired the court's chief judge this week for allegedly being too sympathetic to Mr. Hussein.

Sunni politicians immediately accused the Shiite and Kurdish dominated government of violating the independence of the judiciary. Legal experts raised similar fears.

It would have been far better if Judge Abdullah al-Amiri had not told Mr. Hussein that he was "not a dictator," in the midst of heated testimony last week.

Judges sometimes say stupid things. And Mr. Hussein is not on trial for being a dictator. He is on trial for genocide, a crime so horrific that the government should be bending over backward to protect the court's reputation for independence.

The credibility of the process was already in serious doubt after Mr. Hussein's first circuslike trial. One chief judge quit after Iraqi officials publicly criticized him for not doing more to restrain Mr. Hussein's outbursts. Three members of the defense team were murdered.

A top aide to the Iraqi prime minister justified this week's firing, saying that the judge's words had "hurt the feelings of the Iraqi people." Another insisted that while the court is "independent," the government "does pay the salaries of these judges" and has the right to "hire, fire and transfer judges."

For any other judges who follow, the implicit threat is clear.

General: Up To 1,500 Taliban Fighters Killed (USAT)

USA Today, September 21, 2006

NATO's offensive against insurgents in southern Afghanistan killed up to 1,500 Taliban fighters, a large chunk of the militants' force, NATO's supreme allied commander for Europe said Wednesday. The casualty toll given by U.S. Marine Gen. James Jones is higher than the 510 that Western alliance spokespersons gave during the two-week operation. Five Canadians and 14 Britons died in the offensive, and 20,000 villagers were displaced, Jones said. He said the Taliban "suffered a tactical defeat," but "I don't think they've been totally defeated." The Taliban has 3,000 to 4,000 "hard-core" fighters in Afghanistan, not including others paid as "weekend warriors," Jones said. There are 20,000 NATO troops and 21,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan.

Japan's ruling party elects new leader

Shinzo Abe, who advocates a more muscular foreign policy, was elected leader of Japan's ruling Liberal Democratic Party, putting him on track to be chosen prime minister next week. Abe, who turns 52 today, would be Japan's first prime minister born after World War II. He has pledged to rewrite Japan's pacifist constitution, teach more about patriotism in classrooms, forge tighter security ties with the United States and seek a thaw in ties with China and South Korea, which were chilled by Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi's visits to Tokyo's Yasukuni Shrine. The Shinto shrine honors Japan's war dead, including some convicted of war crimes. Abe also has visited the shrine but has not said whether he would do so as prime minister.

Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon delayed

Israel's pullout from Lebanon is unlikely to be completed before the weekend, the Army chief of staff said. Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz told lawmakers Tuesday that he hoped to bring the last soldiers home before the Jewish New Year starts at sundown Friday. On Wednesday, he said issues remain in talks with United Nations peacekeepers and Lebanon's army. Israel agreed to pull its 30,000 troops out as part of a cease-fire that ended a 34-day war with Hezbollah guerrillas. The war began after Lebanon-based Hezbollah kidnapped two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid July 12.

Peacekeepers to stay rest of year in Darfur

The African Union will keep international peacekeeping forces in the war-torn Sudanese province of Darfur through the end of the year. Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir said he would not allow United Nations control of the AU force, which has been underfunded. The U.N. will provide material and logistic support, said Blaise Compaore, president of Burkina Faso and head of the AU Peace and Security Council. More than 200,000 people have been killed and more than 2 million have fled since 2003, when ethnic tribes revolted against the government. A U.N. commission accused the government and its militia allies last year of human rights violations in suppressing the uprising.

Taliban Retreats After Losses, NATO Reports (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

NATO'S top commander said yesterday that Taliban insurgents have retreated in southern Afghanistan after taking heavy losses from a British-led force of U.S. allies and that a reconstruction phase has begun.

"The Taliban decided to make a test case of this region," Marine Gen. James Jones, supreme allied commander in Europe, said at the Pentagon. "The outcome of it was that they retreated and we are now in the consolidation phrase and we are going to start to bring aid and reconstruction to the region."

Gen. Jones recapped months of fighting in Operation Medusa in southern Afghanistan around Kandahar, the Taliban's birthplace and the city from which the hard-line Islamic movement sprung to wrest control of most of the country in the 1990s.

He said the south was generally absent of allied military forces until NATO took command earlier this year and introduced 6,000 troops, disrupting a Taliban resurgence.

"We have disturbed the hornets' nest and the hornets are swarming," he said. "We need to make them understand that nest is not going to be there for them anymore."

He added, "I've said that we were surprised by the level of violence and that's true. But what was really most surprising is the change in tactics because they decided to stand and fight in a fairly conventional linear sense, and they paid a very heavy price for it."

The military estimates that Medusa killed 1,000 to 1,500 Taliban from a hard-core force of up to 4,000 fighters. The Taliban is augmented by civilians who are recruited with about $200 each to fight for several days.

At the United Nations, Afghan President Hamid Karzai said in a speech to world leaders that his country needs continued support. He made an indirect reference to neighboring Pakistan, whose tribal areas host reorganizing Taliban forces.

"Terrorism does not emanate from within Afghanistan," Mr. Karzai said. "Afghanistan is its worst victim. Military action in Afghanistan alone, therefore, will not deliver our shared goal of eliminating terrorism.

"We must look beyond Afghanistan to the sources of terrorism. We must destroy terrorist sanctuaries beyond Afghanistan, dismantle the elaborate networks in the region that recruit, indoctrinate, train, finance, arm and deploy terrorists."

Gen. Jones stopped short of saying the Taliban is defeated. He predicted the movement will revert to terror attacks on innocent civilians.

He acknowledged the power of drug lords who oversee record production of a poppy crop that produces opium and heroin for the world market.

"They are also a force to be reckoned with, and they have good reasons to want the Taliban to stay in business and good reasons to support them financially," he said. "So that's another big problem."

He said the southern allied force, made up of Canadian, Danish, Dutch, British and American troops, sent a signal that "NATO forces would not back down from exercising robust and overwhelming combat power when necessary."

"It also was designed to demoralize the Taliban and their supporters and deter them from believing that they could achieve a military victory." Troops from Romania, Portugal and Estonia played support roles.

He described southern Afghanistan before NATO's arrival as "beset by criminal and lawlessness, ineffective governmental structures and no permanent troop strength of any consequences" since the Taliban was ousted in December 2001.

The general also said that NATO nations that originally balked at supplying 2,000 additional troops have agreed to contribute to a quick-reaction force, although it was not needed expressly for Operation Medusa. The total allied force stands at about 20,000.

NATO To Provide More Afghanistan Troops (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, September 21, 2006

After weeks of prodding, European nations have agreed to provide more troops for the alliance in Afghanistan, where violence has surged and efforts to eradicate the opium crops are floundering, NATO's top commander said Wednesday.

U.S. Gen. James L. Jones said that requests for additional military aircraft have not yet been nailed down, but he is optimistic he will get the aircraft he needs. Jones said he is still looking for a commitment to send some helicopters.

Earlier this month Jones met with other military leaders, asking for about 2,500 troops to augment NATO forces in Afghanistan. On Wednesday, he said that Romania has agreed to send a battalion in October, and the United Kingdom and Canada are adding to their forces. Poland had previously said it would send a battalion and some special operations forces in January.

Those agreements, Jones said, would nearly meet the full troop requirements. There are currently about 20,000 NATO troops there, and another 21,000 U.S. troops.

Jones offered a mixed view of progress in Afghanistan. He said officials are not making headway on the opium problem, but recent military operations in the southern part of the country killed 1,000-1,500 Taliban, and forced others to retreat.

Violence has increased in the south because it is the center of the drug trade and the home of the Taliban, he said.

"We have disturbed a hornet's nest, and the hornets are swarming," he said. "We need to make them understand that that nest is not going to be there for them anymore in that particular region."

At any one time, he said, there are 3,000-4,000 Taliban in the country, but it is difficult to tell how quickly they can recruit more to replace those that were lost. And he said that some of the Taliban who retreated went to the western section of the country, where there may now be an increase in violence.

His assessment of the drug problems was bleaker.

"Narcotics is at the core of everything that can go wrong in Afghanistan if it's not properly tackled," said Jones, adding that, "we're not making progress; we're losing ground."

Officials have said opium production jumped 59 percent this year in Afghanistan, to a record 6,100 tons of opium — a full 92 percent of the world's supply. The crop is used to fund terrorist groups. Jones said Wednesday that the Afghan government needs to commit more resources to the drug war and "start putting some big fish in jail."

NATO troops' role in the drug fight, he said, is limited to a supporting role of providing intelligence, making assessments and protecting those involved in counternarcotics operations.

"I'm in accord with those who say that it's not a military mission," said Jones. "Having NATO troops out there burning crops, for example, is not going to significantly contribute to the war on drugs. It's much more sophisticated and complex than that."

But the U.N.'s top counternarcorics official told Congress Wednesday that NATO forces in Afghanistan must help the Afghan Army to fight the opium trade there by destroying heroin labs, disbanding opium bazaars and attacking opium convoys.

Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of the U.N.'s office on drugs and crime, warned that Afghanistan is "in danger of becoming a narco-state, where drugs determine power, rot society and fund terrorism."

Hearing that, members of the House International Relations Committee expressed alarm over the resurgence of the Taliban and the skyrocketing opium poppy production.

Afghanistan has been suffering its heaviest insurgent attacks since the Taliban regime was toppled in late 2001. Clashes and bombings left up to 34 Taliban fighters and one policeman dead in five separate incidents Tuesday in central and southern Afghanistan. On Monday three bombings killed 19 people, including four Canadian soldiers.

NATO To Send Additional Troops To Afghanistan (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

NATO countries are sending thousands more troops to Afghanistan to help battle a surprisingly violent Taliban resurgence in the south -- the alliance's first test in ground combat for "a long, long time," NATO's top commander said yesterday.

Gen. James L. Jones said NATO members Romania, Poland, Canada, the United Kingdom and other countries would begin deploying from 2,000 to 2,500 additional troops to Afghanistan beginning next month to bolster the 20,000-strong NATO contingent. But NATO countries have not yet pledged more helicopters and transport aircraft that are also needed, Jones said.

The NATO buildup comes in addition to the approximately 20,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan -- the highest number of U.S. forces in the country since the Taliban government was toppled in 2001. An escalation of violence has driven casualties for foreign troops and Afghan civilians this year to their highest level since the war began.

NATO called for the fresh forces as it engaged in a major offensive this month that Jones said has killed about 1,000 Taliban fighters who massed against NATO troops near Kandahar in southern Afghanistan, the Taliban's traditional stronghold.

"The Taliban decided to make a test case of this region," which had only a thin presence of U.S. troops until a NATO force of 6,000 took charge July 1, Jones said. "We have disturbed a hornet's nest, and the hornets are swarming," he told reporters at the Pentagon. He called the situation a "moment of truth" for security in lawless southern Afghanistan, where crime and narcotics are also rampant.

Indeed, southern Afghanistan is the "epicenter" of the nation's burgeoning narcotics trade, a worsening problem that Jones said is "at the core of everything that can go wrong" there. "We're not making progress; we're losing ground" in cracking down on narcotics cartels that help fund Taliban insurgents as well as al-Qaeda, he said.

The Taliban announced a "tactical retreat" last week as its forces dispersed from the Kandahar region to seek refuge farther west, but they are expected to regroup and continue attacking civilians, Jones said.

The fighting caused an exodus of about 20,000 people in the Pashmul area about 30 miles west of Kandahar, and NATO is focusing on providing food, clothing, and shelter for the war refugees.

"Many of the people of Afghanistan are on a fence right now, and they will be for whichever side wins," he said. Despite the deteriorating security, Jones pointed to progress in Afghanistan, citing the fact that 6 million children are attending school, and hundreds of development projects have been undertaken -- including the construction of about 1,800 miles of roads -- in the past four years.

In Afghanistan, A New Bridge And A Blockade (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

KANDAGAL, Afghanistan -- The stout new wood-plank bridge over the Pech River, paid for by the U.S. Army, was a strategic gift to the people of this remote area of eastern Afghanistan, where insurgents are active. The aim: to open the river's valley to markets and health care and thereby strengthen local support for the central government.

But even as U.S. and Afghan officials landed by helicopter in a cornfield Monday and snipped a ceremonial pink ribbon across the bridge, U.S. and Afghan soldiers were blockading the only road into the nearby Korengal Valley. Officials said some local tribes there had helped Taliban forces regroup after they were driven out of the area by the U.S.-led Operation Mountain Lion in April.

"There are serious sanctuaries in the Korengal Valley," said Lt. Col. Christopher Cavoli, commander of U.S. military forces in Konar province, who called the bridge and blockade combination a textbook application of counterinsurgency theory. Some Korengal elders are supporting the government, he said, and others are "colluding actively with the enemy. The goal . . . is to produce a fracture between two groups."

With this approach, Cavoli is attempting to negotiate the complexities of Afghan traditions and politics. Some local tribes have long-standing political relationships with both the Taliban and the government, feel both gratitude and resentment toward foreign troops and have constantly shifting alliances and conflicts with neighboring groups.

There is constant, low-level fighting in this area. Frequent Taliban attacks draw responding U.S. artillery fire. Several tribal leaders who attended the bridge ceremony Monday complained angrily that U.S. gunfire had killed their livestock and injured their children and that when they sent sick women to seek medical help, U.S. forces detained their male escorts.

"The American forces have created a lot of problems for us," said Zawahar Khan Mangal, a Korengali elder. "It is good that they have built the bridge, but the blockade has hurt us a lot." He said that Taliban fighters came and went in small groups but that "the people of Korengal do not support them. I don't know why they have ordered this blockade."

U.S. military officials said their troops had been extremely careful to avoid causing civilian casualties. Cavoli said that one U.S. artillery attack had killed some goats and that the owner would be compensated. He also said wounded Taliban fighters came to the U.S. military clinic posing as civilians.

Even in official speeches at Monday's outdoor ceremony, which was attended by senior U.S. and Afghan military officials as well as the Afghan deputy transportation minister, expressions of appreciation for the new bridge were mixed with bitter complaints about the road closure.

The man in the hot seat was Mohammed "Deedar" Shazeeli, the recently appointed governor of Konar and a prominent example of Afghan political complexity.

Shazeeli, a former anti-Soviet militia commander widely known by his nom de guerre, Deedar, was banned from running for parliament in 2004 because of past links to the Taliban. But since President Hamid Karzai sent him to Konar several months ago, U.S. officials said, he has been an engaging and forceful leader, reaching out to all the tribes with constant meetings but also ordering the controversial blockade.

"I came here to do my best and help bring construction and development," Shazeeli said in a long, energetic speech at the outdoor ceremony marking the bridge's opening. "I respect all the elders, I respect all the jihadi commanders. I will always listen to your problems."

He promised that residents would soon see new mosques built as well as bridges, adding, "I only ask you to help your government bring security and stability to the area."

The bridge inauguration came one day after a similar ceremony in central Ghazni province. U.S. and Afghan military officials traveled by helicopter Sunday to Andar, one of the most conflict-ridden districts in Ghazni, to open a new district administration building as a symbol of efforts to restore authority and security.

But there, too, they discovered that residents had other pressing concerns. According to U.S. officials who took part in a meeting with several hundred Ghazni elders, many complained that local police officers who were supposed to provide protection against the insurgents instead abused residents constantly, even extorting money from women and children as they walked along the roads.

U.S. officials said they had forwarded those complaints to the Karzai government. Sources said senior officials in Ghazni, possibly including the governor, would probably lose their jobs.

In Konar, the fight against the Taliban is complicated by the area's economic mainstay, lumber. The rugged hills are full of ancient hardwood trees, and timber smuggling across the nearby Pakistan border is a major problem. U.S. military officials said that one local timber baron was a Taliban member and that Taliban forces helped smugglers avoid paying taxes.

Another complicating factor is religion. Although Konar is not known as a hotbed of Islamic radicalism, officials said, it has some villages that were settled years ago by Pakistani clerics of the strict Wahhabi sect. The Taliban movement, which grew out of the same Muslim sect, finds some sympathy here.

Still, U.S. military officials assert that they are winning the battle in Konar and that most of the province's residents support the Karzai government. They said the strength of the Taliban in both the Korengal and Pech valleys, and its support among the local people, are much less than they were in June last year, when a U.S. Army helicopter was shot down in Konar, killing eight Navy SEALs and eight other men on board.

"I am very optimistic about the situation," said Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, senior commander of U.S. forces in Afghanistan, who was at Monday's bridge ceremony. "A year ago, we couldn't even fly over this valley. This time, the local people brought tea and bread to our workers while we were building this bridge."

DOJ:

Fisher Confirmed, But Justice Vacancy Remains (RC)

By Paul Kane, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, September 21, 2006

The Justice Department's top criminal prosecutor won Senate confirmation Tuesday, just days after announcing the first felony plea agreement from a Member of Congress directly connected to the long-running probe of ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

But the confirmation of Alice Fisher to be assistant attorney general — she had been serving in an acting capacity as head of the criminal division — comes as the department is still searching for a permanent chief of the Public Integrity Section, which has gone without a full-time boss since mid-January.

Fisher's confirmation had been delayed for more than a year because Democrats questioned what role, if any, she might have played in Justice's formulation of legal briefs in support of controversial interrogation techniques on alleged terrorists being held at U.S. military facilities at Guantanamo Bay.

Republicans countered that Democrats were holding her nomination hostage in an effort to force the White House to turn over documents that might be embarrassing, trying to score political points with a critical nomination.

In addition to overseeing the prosecutions of terrorist trials, Fisher will continue to manage the growing Congressional corruption scandals. Justice got its highest-profile target to date last week when Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) signed a plea agreement for three felony counts of accepting illegal gifts from Abramoff and a Syrian-born arms dealer and lying about them on federal forms.

While Fisher announced the deal outside Justice's headquarters, the investigation has been led by a team of career prosecutors in the Public Integrity Section.

A Justice spokesman said those prosecutors are continuing to build cases despite the ongoing vacancy of a permanent chief of their division.

"They're moving ahead full steam," said Bryan Sierra.

Public Integrity lost its top prosecutor, Noel Hillman, in mid-January when he was nominated for a federal judgeship in New Jersey, to which he was confirmed in the spring. At the time Hillman temporarily was replaced by Andrew Lourie, an assistant U.S. attorney in the West Palm Beach, Fla., office who previously had worked with Hillman at Public Integrity.

Lourie has since returned to Florida and on Aug. 8 Edward Nucci was selected as the acting chief of Public Integrity. Nucci most recently had been working with Justice's counter-terror prosecutors but previously had worked in the U.S. attorney's office in Miami, where he was chief of that criminal division and also served as a deputy chief of public corruption.

Nucci is familiar with the Abramoff probe, as he helped with the Florida thread of that investigation involving Abramoff's attempted SunCruz casino purchase, a fraud that already has brought a nearly six-year prison sentence. One of the elements of Ney's plea last week was his acknowledgement of inserting statements favorable to Abramoff and his SunCruz partner into the Congressional Record in 2000 in exchange for gifts from the lobbyist.

But Nucci is only temporarily in charge of Public Integrity, and Sierra declined to comment on how much longer the search would go on for a permanent chief. "For now, Ed is the guy in charge," he said.

In addition, Brenda Morris, a veteran of Public Integrity, has been promoted to permanent principal deputy of the section, the No. 2 post.

That position has in the past served as a launching spot to the top job in Public Integrity, as Hillman served as the top deputy there in 2001 and most of 2002.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

HP CEO Allowed 'Sting' Of Reporter (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

Hewlett-Packard Co. chief executive Mark V. Hurd approved an elaborate "sting" operation on a reporter in February in an attempt to plug leaks to the media, according to an e-mail message sent by HP Chairman Patricia C. Dunn.

The document, one of more than two dozen e-mails obtained by The Washington Post, for the first time links Hurd to an internal investigation of media leaks that has led to criminal probes and will be the subject of a congressional hearing next week.

Internal e-mails show senior HP employees who were given the task of identifying anonymous news sources concocted a fictitious, high-level HP tipster who sent bogus information to a San Francisco reporter in an attempt to trick her into revealing her sources.

The e-mail sting operation, which was part of a wide-ranging two-part HP investigation that began in March 2005 and ended in May 2006, is the latest in a series of deceptive and possibly illegal tactics that reveal the lengths to which HP went to spy on people inside and outside the company to protect its image and secrets.

HP's leak investigation involved planting false documents, following HP board members and journalists, watching their homes, and obtaining calling records for hundreds of phone numbers belonging to HP directors, journalists and their spouses, according to a consultant's report and the e-mails.

The e-mail operation demonstrated an intense degree of attention by Dunn, who often sent messages via a BlackBerry device, and by senior HP executives attempting to cultivate and trick a news reporter to find the identity of her source. A Hewlett-Packard spokesman declined to comment on the revelations or make Hurd or Dunn available for an interview.

None of the e-mails reviewed by The Post were to or from Hurd, nor do they detail what information Hurd had when he approved the sting operation.

A corporate spying effort this broad and orchestrated has never before been exposed, experts said.

"If you'd laid this out as a science fiction story, it'd be hard to believe it's true," said Ari Schwartz, deputy director of the Center for Democracy & Technology, a District-based privacy watchdog group.

It was unclear whether the e-mail sting operation involved illegal tactics, experts said, but federal and state authorities have launched probes into the legality of HP's methods.

On Sept. 28, Dunn and several other HP executives are scheduled to testify before the House Energy and Commerce investigative subcommittee about their roles in the spy probe. The hearing is part of an inquiry led by committee Chairman Joe Barton (R-Tex.) into the techniques Hewlett-Packard used.

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer said last week that he had enough evidence to issue indictments against people inside and outside HP. The spying scandal erupted into public view this month after it was revealed that board member Thomas J. Perkins had resigned in protest months ago after learning that his personal phone records had been obtained under false pretenses.

The Hewlett-Packard board of directors is scheduled to meet today, and Hurd is to brief board members about developments in the internal review. Hurd is expected to hold a press conference Friday.

After an emergency board meeting last week, Dunn agreed to resign as the board's chairman in January but she is to remain on the board, handing the top job to Hurd. George "Jay" Keyworth, a board member who said he talked to a reporter, resigned last week.

Though nine journalists were apparently targeted in HP's leak investigation, one in particular drew the scrutiny of Dunn and Hurd, according to a series of internal e-mails. Dawn Kawamoto, a reporter for Cnet.com, wrote a fairly straightforward article on Jan. 23 outlining the firm's long-term strategy after a board retreat.

Determined to ferret out the source's identity, HP senior counsel Kevin Hunsaker, who led the HP investigation ordered by Dunn, and an HP colleague in Boston created a fictitious persona, "Jacob," who would pose as a disgruntled HP "senior level executive" and cultivate Kawamoto by saying he was "an avid reader of your columns."

The idea, evidently, was to induce Kawamoto to open an e-mail attachment with a "tracer" in it that would allow them to see who she forwarded it to. They hoped it would pinpoint board member Keyworth as her source, according to the documents.

On Feb. 2, Hunsaker made a PowerPoint presentation to Dunn, called Project Kona II, in which she was shown the "covert" e-mail sent to Kawamoto on Jan. 26. In it, "Jacob" wrote that "tired of broken promises, misguided initiatives and generally bad treatment," he had information to pass on to her.

The computer-generated presentation included a proposed " 'next step' covert e-mail" in which "Jacob" would establish his insider bona fides with Kawamoto by telling her that, contrary to an article she wrote, a potential HP deal with "CSC," or Computer Sciences Corp. was "definitely on HP's radar . . . I know because I was involved in preparing the briefing documents."

After the presentation, Hunsaker sent Dunn an e-mail thanking her for "taking such a big chunk of time" to meet with his team. Dunn replied with an e-mail to Hunsaker, saying that she was "encouraged that this effort is on the right track."

As the project evolved, Hunsaker and Anthony Gentilucci, an HP global investigations manager in Boston, began to refine Jacob's character. "I think we have to figure out who Jacob is, weak, strong, vindictive, a Bill and Dave fan, possibly lower level employee . . . will dictate the tone of the e-mail," Gentilucci wrote on Jan. 28.

Over the next week, HP investigators designed a plan to give Kawamoto a "[small] accurate piece of advance information" about a new handheld product, before they would "spring the false one," referring to a fabricated news tip about HP opening a computer data farm. That first tip, about the handheld device, would be sent in an e-mail that would include the tracking software.

On Feb. 5, Dunn sent an e-mail to Hunsaker: "This sounds promising. I will be in contact with Mark and come back to you with an indication of joint approval as soon as we connect."

Sending someone an e-mail file, even under false pretenses, and then tracking whether it was forwarded may violate confidentiality policies, but is probably not illegal, said Robert Seiden, chief executive of Fortress Global Investigations Corp. If the company used its program to try to access other information from Kawamoto's computer, however, that would be a violation of federal law, he said.

A Feb. 8 e-mail from Ronald DeLia, a Boston security contractor hired to work on the HP leak investigation as part of Hunsaker's team, suggested "a more elaborate sting" involving "electronic bugs" that would allow the tracking of calls between Keyworth and Kawamoto.

If the team wiretapped the calls of Keyworth and Kawamoto, that too would be illegal, Seiden said.

On Feb. 9, in an e-mail to Hunsaker and general counsel Ann O. Baskins, Dunn wrote: "I spoke with Mark and he is on board with the plan" and that "he also agrees that we should consider doing something with" the data-farm tip.

On Feb. 16, Kawamoto sent an e-mail to "Jacob" that she would be on vacation the next week. DeLia forwarded her e-mail to his colleagues, saying: "Team, We're alive and kicking." He also noted that, based on her cellphone call records, she was going to Disneyland. "She has made numerous calls to a hotel in Disneyland," he wrote.

On Feb. 22, Hunsaker e-mailed Dunn and Baskins with a copy of a slide showing the bogus handheld product to be launched. "I made up everything in the slide, trying to make it at least somewhat feasible," Hunsaker wrote to Dunn and Baskins. "I won't quit my day job, but hopefully neither will the name nor the information on the slide are terribly off-base."

Dunn replied: "Kevin, I think this is very clever. As a matter of course anything that is going to potentially be seen outside HP should have Mark's approval as well."

On Feb. 23, Hunsaker sent an e-mail to Dunn. "FYI, I spoke to Mark a few minutes ago and he is fine with both the concept and the content."

HP Scandal Takes On High Weirdness Level (FINDLAW/AP)

By Brian Bergstein, Ap Technology Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

(AP) - Hewlett-Packard Co. may be the world's largest technology company, but the superlative that better suits it these days is Provider of the World's Strangest Corporate Drama.

For two weeks, almost every day has brought revelations of questionable tactics that HP investigators used this year and last to root out who had been describing boardroom deliberations to the media. Corporate intelligence is an old and frequently practiced art, but HP's efforts feel more Watergate than Wall Street.

Not only did investigators impersonate board members, employees and journalists to obtain their phone records, but according to multiple reports, they also surveilled an HP director and a reporter for CNet Networks Inc. They sent monitoring spyware in an e-mail to that reporter by concocting a phony story tip.

They even snooped on the phone records of former CEO and Chairwoman Carly Fiorina, who had launched the quest to identify media sources in the first place.

And in a twist that might seem preposterous if it happened in a movie, The New York Times reported that HP consultants considered hiring spies to pose as clerical or custodial workers at CNet and The Wall Street Journal.

"It betrays a type of corporate culture that is so self-obsessed, (that) really considers itself not only above the law, but above I think ethical decency, that you have to ask yourself, where did the shame come in?" said Charles King, an analyst with Pund-IT Research.

Jeffrey Sonnenfeld, senior associate dean at the Yale School of Management, said the HP affair stands out even against similar episodes from the past, such as the 1991 incident in which Procter & Gamble Co. persuaded authorities to mine 803,000 phone bills to track leaks to a Wall Street Journal reporter.

"This sort of investigators-gone-wild behavior is in a novel realm," Sonnenfeld said.

Investors have shrugged off the scandal, with HP stock up slightly since the story broke. But there will be repercussions. The almost-certain illegality of posing as someone to obtain phone records has sparked state and federal probes into the computer and printer maker.

HP Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and the company's general counsel are testifying to a congressional committee next week about why they approved the investigations. Attorney Larry Sonsini, a Silicon Valley power broker who advised HP's board, is also being called onto the carpet.

Dunn has agreed to cede the chairmanship to HP's chief executive in January, but she plans to remain on the board. Fortunately for her - but perhaps disappointing for those entranced by this drama - her two biggest enemies are gone: Director Thomas Perkins quit in protest of the investigation tactics, while director George Keyworth resigned after being outed as a leaker.

Ironically, this was supposed to be a time in which HP had moved on from a period of extreme board dysfunction.

In 2001, Fiorina convinced skeptics on the board that HP should acquire rival Compaq Computer Corp., a deal that ended up costing $19 billion. She persuaded all of them except for one: Walter Hewlett, son of one of the engineers who founded HP in a garage in Palo Alto, Calif., in 1938.

Even while Hewlett remained on the board, he launched a dramatic and ultimately nasty fight to scuttle the deal. When shareholders narrowly approved the deal, Hewlett sued the company and alleged that Fiorina had improperly cajoled an investment bank to switch its vote.

Back then, talking to the press was actually a duty for some HP directors, who revealed details of board meetings in an effort to refute points made against the deal by Hewlett. Dunn, Keyworth and even Sonsini all spoke on the record to challenge Hewlett's descriptions of board deliberations.

Acrimony at HP didn't end even after the Compaq deal was sealed and Hewlett left the board in 2002. By 2005, the board's unhappiness with HP's uneven financial results under Fiorina emerged in news stories that began one of the leak hunts.

"There were conflicts on the board trying to make a go of the (Compaq) marriage, strong differences of opinions, strong personalities," said Bruce Oliver, director of the Center for Business Ethics at the Rochester Institute of Technology. "You've had a divided board for quite some time now. That somewhat set up the opportunity for this to happen at that company."

After the board fired Fiorina and turned to Mark Hurd, a lower-key, cost-cutting maven who had spent 25 years at NCR Corp, HP finally seemed to enter a quiet, successful phase.

Hurd's no-nonsense operational style thrilled investors; HP stock has nearly doubled during his tenure. Now that IBM Corp. has sold its personal-computer division, HP is surpassing Big Blue as the world's largest tech company by revenue. HP's other main rival, Dell Inc., has stumbled badly, further boosting HP's image in comparison.

Until all this.

HP spokesman Ryan Donovan would not comment about how the company expects to keep this scandal from leaving a long-term tarnish.

King, the analyst, said it could take a while to tell if HP's brand is diminished.

"If I'm a consumer, do I want to buy products from a company that has committed what looks to be felonious behavior? I don't know the answer to that," King said.

If nothing else, Hewlett-Packard will have aired in dramatic fashion the kind of corporate dirty work - often aimed at rivals rather than insiders - that "probably goes on more than we know of," said Eric Abrahamson, a professor of management at Columbia University.

"This is a particularly egregious example of it."

Committee Wants More HP Executives To Testify (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins

USA Today, September 21, 2006

Raising pressure on Hewlett-Packard, a congressional panel investigating HP's boardroom spying scandal is seeking testimony from two more company executives at a high-profile hearing next week.

The House Energy and Commerce Committee on Wednesday said it had added to its witness list Kevin Hunsaker, an HP attorney, and Fred Adler, an HP computer security investigator.

They would join a growing parade of witnesses: Chairman Patricia Dunn; top in-house attorney Ann Baskins; and a prominent Silicon Valley attorney, Larry Sonsini, whose firm represents HP.

The Sept. 28 hearing focuses on an HP internal investigation of news leaks from its board of directors. That investigation — and the revelations of the controversial tactics the company's investigators used — has plunged HP into a crisis and prompted a raft of law-enforcement investigations in the past month. The panel gave Hunsaker and Adler until today to reply.

HP declined to comment beyond saying that Hunsaker and Adler are company employees. It has said that it is cooperating with the committee's investigation and others by federal and state government agencies.

The committee also is seeking testimony from Anthony Gentilucci, which it says is HP's global security manager, and two private investigators tied to the matter: Ron DeLia, operator of Security Outsourcing Solutions in Boston; and Joe Depante, owner of Action Research Group in Melbourne, Fla.

The committee is focusing on a company that has given contributions to several of its members' political campaigns, Federal Election Commission records show.

HP executives and its political action committee gave $75,650 to 18 panel members' campaigns and their political action committees since the 1999-2000 federal election cycle, says the Center for Responsive Politics, a non-partisan campaign finance watchdog group.

The recipients included Rep. Joe Barton, R-Texas, who got $8,000 over the period, the center's data show. Barton is chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Sonsini's firm, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati in Palo Alto, Calif., gave $6,500 to committee members' campaigns since 1999, the data show. The firm did not return a call seeking comment.

The committee's 10 a.m. hearing is part of its Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee's seven-month inquiry into data brokers and a shady investigative practice called "pretexting."

Consultants hired by HP used pretexting to pose as board members, HP employees, journalists and others to get telephone calling records so the company could find the source of news leaks.

HP made that news-leak investigation public on Sept. 6. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, the FBI, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission also are investigating the HP case. Lockyer has said he expects to bring charges against HP executives and others, although he has not given a timetable.

HP investors continue to show little concern about the case. HP shares closed Wednesday at $36.78, up 43 cents, and a bit higher than the closing price when news of the scandal first broke.

Hewlett-Packard CEO Will Discuss Leak Probe Sept. 22 (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, September 21, 2006

Sept. 20 (Bloomberg) -- Hewlett-Packard Co. Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd will discuss the company's investigation into the source of news leaks at a press conference on Sept. 22.

Timing and the location of the event, to be held in the California Bay Area, haven't yet been determined, spokesman Ryan Donovan said today in an interview.

Hurd, whose comments so far have been limited to prepared statements and a videotaped presentation to employees, may seek to defuse the widening scandal over the methods used to identify the source of boardroom leaks. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, General Counsel Ann Baskins and Hewlett-Packard's outside attorney, Larry Sonsini, have agreed to appear before a U.S. House committee on Sept. 28 to discuss the probe.

Hewlett-Packard said on Sept. 6 that investigators used fake identities to obtain the private phone records of directors, employees, reporters and others as part of the probe, a tactic it said may be illegal.

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, the U.S. Justice Department and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are reviewing the company's tactics to determine if crimes were committed.

The Energy and Commerce Committee also called Hewlett- Packard senior counsel Kevin Hunsaker, two company investigators, and two outside private investigators to testify.

The committee today approved a resolution that confers expedited subpoena power on its chairman, Texas Republican Joe Barton. The vote allows Barton to issue subpoenas on Hewlett- Packard related matters after conferring with the committee's top Democrat, John Dingell of Michigan.

Investor Lawsuit

Shares of Hewlett-Packard, the world's second-largest personal computer maker behind Dell Inc., rose 43 cents to $36.78 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. They've gained 28 percent this year.

Separately, Hewlett-Packard agreed to give investors' lawyers access to documents related to the February firing of former CEO Carly Fiorina.

The Monroe County Public Employees Retirement System in Michigan sued Hewlett-Packard in May to get records so it could determine whether the company violated its own policies by paying Fiorina $22.3 million for her last few months in office.

J.P. Morgan, Citadel Acquire Amaranth's Energy Portfolio (WSJ)

By Ann Davis, Henny Sender And Gregory Zuckerman

DOJ_NMG_0066842

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

Two big firms deepened their exposure to a tricky market by acquiring the energy portfolio of Amaranth Advisors, the hedge fund that now says it lost roughly $6 billion since the beginning of September, mostly on bad natural-gas bets.

To forestall a shutdown of the increasingly shaky hedge fund, J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. and hedge fund Citadel Investment Group LLC took over the investments. The new owners will share profits and losses.

WSJ editor Phil Kuntz and Rich Blake, senior editor at Trader Monthly, discuss2 the missteps at Amaranth and the possibility of hedge fund regulation.

WSJ's Greg Zuckerman comments3 on the ailing hedge fund Amaranth and the riskiness in betting on natural gas and the overall energy markets.

Amaranth also has sold nonenergy investments to meet demands from investors for withdrawals and from brokers for more collateral, people familiar with its portfolio say. Some investments were in loans and other investments that aren't easy to unload without discounts.

In a letter to investors last night, Amaranth said transferring its investments prevented further losses, kept it out of default with brokers and decreased its loans and other leverage. But it did so "at a price that resulted in additional significant losses." It estimates its holdings dropped 65% in September alone and that year-to-date losses were 55%. That revised estimate means its assets fell from about $9 billion Sept. 1 to just over $3 billion. Previously, it said year-to-date losses were 35%, putting assets at about $4.5 billion. The firm also confirmed that brokers' demands last week for more collateral to back its losing trades "created serious" cash-flow problems and default risks. It said it would brief investors tomorrow and was "determined to earn back its investors' trust."

It didn't identify J.P. Morgan and Citadel, and declined to comment further. A call to Brian Hunter, the Amaranth trader responsible for the bad bets, was answered Tuesday by a colleague who said Mr. Hunter had been working "23 hours a day" on the crisis; Mr. Hunter didn't return the call. The fund began negotiating with firms to take its energy investments this past weekend, approaching Citigroup Inc. and Goldman Sachs Group Inc. without reaching a deal, people familiar with the matter said. Then, on Monday, it disclosed an estimated year-to-date loss of 35% and continued looking for a buyer.

Rather than pay Amaranth, J.P. Morgan Chase and Citadel could receive $2 billion that Amaranth had posted as collateral to back its trades, say people briefed on the deal. It is unclear if Amaranth will get back additional collateral, or margin.

J.P. Morgan was Amaranth's futures-clearing firm, fulfilling its obligations if it couldn't meet them. People familiar with the matter say Amaranth had met all J.P. Morgan's margin calls, and the bank isn't taking the portfolio to stem clearing-operation losses. The investments remain risky because their value could fall more. Amaranth's bets on far-forward natural-gas contracts worsened yesterday. J.P. Morgan already has sold some of the investments this week, say people familiar with the activity.

J.P. Morgan's energy trading is headed by George "Beau" Taylor, 35 years old, who departed Morgan Stanley in 2005. James Dimon, J.P. Morgan's chief executive, has supported the move to smooth out earnings from stock and bond trading, though the group's performance dragged down fixed-income returns earlier this year.

Citadel, a $12 billion Chicago hedge fund run by Ken Griffin, took a big loss in energy trades after last year's hurricanes, but finished up for 2005. The fund is up about 12% this year. Charles Winkler, the Amaranth executive who negotiated the deal, is a former Citadel executive and is friendly with Mr. Griffin.

An indication of how much pressure Amaranth is under came during a conference call for clients of Union Bancaire Privee yesterday. The Geneva private bank has $29 billion in client money invested in hedge funds, including Amaranth. UBP officials told clients the firm wanted to liquidate its Amaranth holdings quickly, and speculated that Amaranth may decide to liquidate the entire fund.

UBP officials said 80% of Amaranth's performance last year and most of its performance this year was driven by energy investments -- suggesting there mightn't be much else. When Amaranth reported being up about 12% in April, it told investors all but 2% of that came from energy, investors say. Like most hedge funds, Amaranth limits withdrawals to avoid forced asset sales that devalue holdings. Some Amaranth investors say they agreed to withdraw no more than about 8% of their stakes a month. In past hedge-fund blowups, managers have found it difficult to enforce such rules and opted for an orderly wind down, especially when faced with restless staffers.

Conn. Hedge Fund Loses Billions (PROJO/BLOOM)

By Katherine Burton And Matthew Leising, Bloomberg News

The Providence Journal, September 21, 2006

The $4.6-billion loss by Amaranth Advisors may spark activity by Congress or regulators.

Amaranth Advisors LLC, the Greenwich, Conn.-based hedge fund whose wrong-way bets lost about $4.6 billion this month, reached an agreement yesterday to transfer all of its energy trades to an unidentified third party, according to a letter sent to investors.

Nicholas Maounis, Amaranth's founder, said in his letter, a copy of which was obtained by Bloomberg News, that more details will follow "shortly." The firm was in negotiations with Citadel Investment Group LLC as of late yesterday, two people with knowledge of those talks said.

Amaranth was forced to unload the trades after swings in natural-gas prices last week turned it into the biggest hedge fund meltdown since Long-Term Capital Management LP's 1998 collapse. By transferring the bets, Amaranth would stem its losses and the new investor would be at risk of any further declines in the gas market.

Also yesterday, 3M Co., Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and San Diego County's retirement fund say the meltdown of Amaranth may cost them millions.

The $9.2-billion pension fund of 3M, maker of Post-it Notes and electronics and cleaning products, gave less than $92 million to Amaranth, according to Jacqueline Berry, a spokeswoman for the St. Paul, Minn.-based company. Goldman Sachs Hedge Fund Partners LLC has about $13 million with the firm, according to a regulatory filing.

"This will spark activity by Congress, or by regulators, for some oversight of an area that has not been watched," said Dan McAllister, a board member of the $7.2-billion San Diego County Employees Retirement Association. The fund invested $175 million with Amaranth last year.

The San Diego County pension board invested in Amaranth on the recommendation of consultants Rocaton Investment Advisors in Norwalk, Conn., McAllister said. The San Diego County fund is unconnected to the San Diego City Employees' Retirement System, which has a deficit of more than $1 billion.

"We are aware of the Amaranth situation, and we are in dialogue with our clients," Rocaton spokesman Todd Miller said, declining further comment.

It will take weeks to find out how much pension money melted away with Amaranth's bad trades, Damon Silvers, associate general counsel of the Washington-based AFL-CIO, said.

The largest U.S. labor association, whose member unions hold more than $400 billion in pension assets, has criticized provisions of the pension-reform law signed by President Bush last month that loosened restrictions on pension-money flows into hedge funds.

"This shows what an appalling decision that was," Silvers said.

Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said he's examining Amaranth's losses.

"We are taking some initial steps to investigate what went so terribly wrong, whether there was a truthful and accurate disclosure to investors," he said.

Tom Carson, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor in Connecticut, declined to comment, as did Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the Justice Department in Washington and SEC spokesman John Nester.

Amaranth, named for an imaginary flower that never fades, had gained more than 25 percent earlier this year on bets that natural-gas prices would rise. Prices tumbled this month, triggering losses that grew as it scrambled to unwind trades.

"Potentially, [the new investors] bought at a very good price," said Mark Williams, a finance professor at Boston University and former risk manager of electricity trader Citizens Power. "If they have a longer time horizon and they can withstand the volatility and the short-term fluctuations, they then have a good chance of making some serious cash."

Amaranth spokesman Shawn Pattison declined to comment. A call to Scott Rafferty, managing director at Citadel, wasn't immediately returned.

Some of Amaranth's energy investments consist of positions in gas futures, options and over-the-counter contracts that would gain in value as prices rise, according to one person with knowledge of the situation.

Amaranth, which made so-called spread trades that aim to profit from price discrepancies among different contracts, was at least the second hedge fund to be rocked by bad investments in natural gas. MotherRock LP, a $400-million fund run by former New York Mercantile Exchange President Robert "Bo" Collins, closed last month.

"It's certainly a reminder that investing in certain hedge funds is a risky business," Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said yesterday. "It's not for mom and pop."

So-called funds of funds that invested with Amaranth may bear much of its losses. Goldman Sachs Dynamic Opportunities Ltd., a London-based fund, reported that it sustained losses on an investment whose description fits Amaranth.

Morgan Stanley, Credit Suisse Group, Bank of New York Co., Deutsche Bank AG and Man Group PLC all run funds of funds that had investments in Amaranth as of June 30.

Amaranth was founded by Maounis, a University of Connecticut finance graduate. After working at Greenwich-based Paloma Partners for 10 years, Maounis, 43, left to found Amaranth with 27 employees and $450 million in 2000.

The firm occupies a beige, four-story office next to a pond and manicured lawn with a fountain in Greenwich, home to more than 100 hedge funds, private pools of capital that allow managers to participate substantially in the gains on clients' investments. The building houses a gym and a game room, with pool tables for employees.

After starting in convertible-bond trades and betting on stocks of merging companies, Maounis expanded into energy, hiring former Deutsche Bank trader Brian Hunter. As of June 30, energy trades accounted for about half of the capital in Amaranth's funds and generated about 75 percent of its profit.

Earlier this month, Amaranth bought a portfolio of gas trades from Amsterdam-based ABN Amro Holding NV, which itself had taken them over from MotherRock. It was Hunter, 32, who orchestrated the bets that triggered Amaranth's losses.

"If one is speculating in that kind of market, there's going to be some downside risk," said Shannon Burchett, who traded oil for JPMorgan Chase & Co. and Citigroup Inc. in the 1990s and now runs an energy consulting firm in Dallas. "They should have the controls and risk management strategies in place to mitigate those kind of outcomes."

'A Changed' Fastow Requests Leniency For His Role At Enron (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

Lawyers for former Enron Corp. finance chief Andrew S. Fastow are asking a judge for leniency in advance of his sentencing on conspiracy charges next week, according to court papers filed in Houston.

Fastow's defense lawyers cited letters from unnamed teachers, friends and relatives who say that Fastow has "stepped up to take responsibility" and has expressed "full remorse" for his role in disguising financial problems at the Houston energy company. Enron's December 2001 collapse cost investors and employees billions of dollars.

Over the past two years, Fastow, 44, has helped victims of Hurricane Katrina and volunteered with Meals on Wheels and at his synagogue, where he has taught classes, built a playground and picnic table, and mowed the lawn. "He is a changed man," the court filing said.

Fastow pleaded guilty to two conspiracy charges in January 2004, agreeing to a 10-year maximum prison sentence in exchange for testifying against onetime chief executives Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay. During the trial, in which defense lawyers challenged his veracity, Fastow told the jury he "destroyed" his life and was "ashamed to the core."

A jury convicted both men in May. Skilling, who is to be sentenced next month, has vowed to appeal. Lay died of heart disease in July.

As the man at the center of the long-running fraud, Fastow ultimately emerged as the public face of the Enron scandal and endured "unprecedented public humiliation" in books, movies and congressional hearings, his lawyers John Keker and David Gerger wrote.

Already, they say, Fastow has suffered emotionally, as his wife served almost a year in a high-security Houston prison after pleading guilty to failing to report income taxes from his partnerships. During that stretch, Fastow cared for the couple's two sons, now 8 and 11. One unnamed letter-writer called him "the Dad I would like to be."

Fastow's plea helped crack open another fraud case, his defense lawyers contend. They cited evidence that Fastow's deal inspired former WorldCom Inc. finance chief Scott D. Sullivan to plead guilty two months later and to testify successfully against his former boss, Bernard J. Ebbers. Sullivan is serving a five-year term, half what Fastow could receive.

Under the terms of the Fastow deal, U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Hoyt has the option of sentencing Fastow to serve fewer than 10 years in prison but no more than that. "Ten years is not 'necessary' for the message of deterrence to be heard," his lawyers wrote.

Victims of Enron's bankruptcy are invited to sign up at the courthouse on the day of the proceeding to express their own opinions about an apt punishment for Fastow, according to a prior ruling by the judge.

Skilling Arrested, Accused Of Public Intoxication (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Tom Fowler And Thomas Korosec

Houston Chronicle, September 21, 2006

DALLAS — Former Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling was arrested and accused of public intoxication in Dallas earlier this month, but he will not go to jail early for violating the terms of his $5 million bond.

According to a Dallas Police Department report, Skilling was arrested about 1:45 a.m. Sept. 9 in the 3600 block of McKinney Avenue in Dallas.

Skilling was not drinking when he was arrested and did not resist arrest, according to the report.

A jury convicted Skilling in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors in the government's foremost case to emerge from its Enron investigation following the company's 2001 crash. He plans to appeal.

He faces 20 to 30 years in prison, and currently is scheduled for sentencing on Oct. 23.

"Jeff is doing the very best he can to deal with a nearly impossible situation," his lead attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, said today.

Public intoxication is a Class C misdemeanor, subject to a fine of up to $500 but no prison time. He was assessed a $385 ticket and was held briefly in a city jail.

Skilling reported his arrest to pre-trial services the next day, Petrocelli said. The incident was investigated and the court required him to increase the frequency of his visits with mental health and alcohol treatment counselors.

Sean Berkowitz, director of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who cross-examined Skilling during the ex-CEO's lengthy trial testimony, declined comment today on the incident.

The 3600 block of McKinney is in the swanky Uptown neighborhood north of downtown Dallas. It includes the relatively new West Village development, a collection of restaurants, bars, boutiques and movie theaters.

Skilling was staying at a townhome he owns in the 1900 block of McKinney Avenue, a little more than a mile away from where he was arrested.

The townhome is among about $60 million in Skilling's cash and assets that have been frozen since he was indicted in February 2004 on charges stemming from the Enron scandal.

Skilling, 52, has had another alcohol-related run-in with the law since he was indicted.

In April 2004 he got into a scuffle with patrons of a cigar bar in New York City after a night of drinking. He wasn't arrested, but he and his wife, Rebecca, who was hurt during the scuffle, were transported to a hospital where a blood test showed Skilling's blood-alcohol level to be .019. Prosecutors pounced, asking a judge to increase his $5 million bond to $7 million, restrict his travel to Texas and impose a curfew. They argued that Skilling violated his bond's terms by drinking excessively and failing to report his contact with police to federal pretrial services authorities.

U.S. Magistrate Frances Stacy in May 2004 declined to hike the bond, but ordered Skilling to stop drinking, join an alcohol abuse treatment program, adhere to a curfew and perform community service since he wasn't working. Skilling did his community service for Habitat for Humanity in Houston.

Petrocelli said previously Skilling joined a treatment program two weeks before the post-scuffle bond hearing in 2004.

Prosecutors said in 2004, witnesses recalled that Skilling accused some of the cigar bar patrons of being FBI agents and tried to lift a woman's blouse to see if she was wearing audio recording equipment.

Skilling's lawyers countered that Skilling and his wife were harassed by two men, one of whom hit the ex-CEO.

This month's incident involved no such confrontations.

Skilling has 21 days from the date of the incident to pay his fine and enter a plea, according to Johnanna Greiner, chief prosecutor for the city of Dallas. Frequently people will pay the fine and ask for deferred adjudication, which means they are under probation for a set time and the charge will disappear if they do not break any other laws during that time.

Skilling or an attorney will have to appear in court to pay the fine and enter a plea.

"Because he's from out of town I wouldn't be surprised if he has his attorney come in and handle it," Grenier said.

Grenier said it's not unusual for well-known individuals to end up facing small charges in the city's municipal courts.

"But they're usually athletes or that ilk," she said.

Kristen Hays and Tom Fowler reported from Houston and Thomas Korosec from Dallas.

Outside Audit No More 'Stealth Restating' (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission has a message for public companies: Fess up to bad news.

At issue is guidance from the regulator that companies shouldn't try to sweep under the carpet errors in their financial results. In recent years, scores of companies have changed previously reported figures via what critics call "stealth restatements," commonly including the new, different figures in subsequent securities filings. The SEC's stand: Such changes constitute information that is material to investors and thus needs to be formally disclosed in a restatement filing clearly labeled as such.

As a result, some companies are announcing restatements to earnings reports they made months ago. For example, in a report earlier this month to the SEC, Sun Microsystems Inc. pointed out that some of the figures contained in its annual report released in September 2005 differed from previous filings. At the time of that report a year ago, Sun didn't file a separate restatement announcement with the SEC.

A Sun spokeswoman said the company made the recent restatement filing in order to provide investors with "maximum transparency." The spokeswoman said the move wasn't "something that was forced upon us" by the SEC, but rather followed conversations among the company's lawyers. "It was recommended that the company refile for maximum transparency," she said.

In another recent example of such a catch-up filing, voice- and data-communications technology company Inter-Tel Inc. in early September flagged in an SEC filing a restatement that it had disclosed in its annual report filed in March. In its latest SEC announcement, the company said the purpose of the most recent filing "is to disclose this previously disclosed restatement in the format required." Kurt Kneip, Inter-Tel's chief financial officer, said the new filing was prompted by comments from the SEC.

Inter-Tel had originally filed a notice earlier this year with the commission regarding the restatement, but hadn't included it in the form designated for a restatement, because the changes "were immaterial to any prior quarter or reporting period," he said. "We thought we were being more than forthright." But the SEC, Mr. Kneip said, believes "any misstatement is material" and should be highlighted in a specific filing.

In 2004, as part of changes brought about by the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-overhaul legislation, the SEC said companies should file a special form announcing a restatement with the agency. But some companies mistakenly believed that they wouldn't have to do so if they were submitting a new earnings filing in the days after concluding that a restatement of old results was necessary. Instead, they would just include the restated results in the new filing.

Investor advocates complain that most investors aren't going to spot such switches, putting plenty of individual investors at a disadvantage to professional company watchers who have the time and smarts to compare every financial filing with those that preceded.

The SEC's new push on stealth restatements follows on the heels of a report released this summer by the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, which found that about 17% of public companies restating results between August 2004 and September 2005 failed to "file the proper disclosure."

Speaking at a conference in New York last week, Stephanie Hunsaker, associate chief accountant in the SEC's division of corporate finance, said the regulator is sending comment letters to companies insisting that they disclose restatements in the special filing.

John White, director of the corporate-finance division, added that his staff has "focused" on restatement-related disclosures to make clear that companies can't avoid such announcements by simply including a restatement in a filing of current results. The loophole some companies may have tried to exploit didn't actually exist, he explained.

Restatements are admissions by companies that a prior financial filing can't be relied upon, which explains why many executives prefer not to draw attention to them. "It's embarrassing," said Eric Keller, chief executive of Movaris Inc., a company that develops financial-reporting systems. "It's akin to a product recall."

By failing to properly file disclosures related to restatements, companies hope investors "may dismiss a restatement as relatively minor," because it was tucked "away quietly in the current period's results," research firm Glass Lewis & Co. said in a report earlier this year. "Clearly, companies know this -- and many take advantage," that report noted.

For investors, a restatement is notice that they need to go back and adjust figures that may have been used as the basis for an investment decision. Although some restatements are highly technical and don't affect a company's share price, others could cause a stock to tumble.

The number of restatements has soared in recent years, as a result of a greater focus on auditing quality and risk controls. Glass Lewis reported there were 1,195 restatements by U.S. companies in 2005, compared with 270 just five years earlier.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Associates, Bush Aides Met Often (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

Former associates of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff had dozens of appointments with Bush administration staff members, according to Secret Service visitor logs the White House released yesterday to settle a lawsuit by the Democratic Party and an ethics watchdog group.

Republican activists Grover Norquist and Ralph Reed, political allies of President Bush and longtime Abramoff associates, totaled more than 100 visits to the Bush White House. Abramoff, a former GOP lobbyist, has pleaded guilty to fraud and is cooperating with prosecutors in an influence-peddling investigation. White House officials said they believe all their meetings that included Bush were group events, such as Christmas parties or policy briefings for GOP supporters.

Among others who visited White House staff members are two former Abramoff lobbying associates who have also pleaded guilty in the ongoing lobbying probe. Neil Volz, an aide to Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) before joining Abramoff's lobbying team, had 18 appointments with White House aides. Tony Rudy, an aide to then-Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), visited the Bush White House 13 times.

Former Abramoff lobbying associate Kevin Ring, a former aide to Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.), had 21, and lobbyist Shawn Vasell had 18 -- two this year.

White House officials said Norquist, who runs the nonprofit Americans for Tax Reform, was cleared for 97 visits to the White House complex from 2001 to this year, half a dozen including Bush. Reed, former executive director of the Christian Coalition and an unsuccessful candidate for lieutenant governor in Georgia this year, got 18 meetings, including two events with Bush.

Papers Show Bush Allies' Inside Access (AP-Y)

AP, September 21, 2006

Republican activists Grover Norquist and Ralph Reed landed more than 100 meetings inside the Bush White House, according to documents released Wednesday that provide the first official accounting of the access and influence the two presidential allies have enjoyed.

The White House released the Secret Service visit records to settle a lawsuit by the Democratic Party and an ethics watchdog group seeking visitors logs for the two GOP strategists and others who emerged as figures in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal.

Earlier this month, the White House suggested to the judge in that lawsuit that such records need not be disclosed because the information was privileged and might reveal how Bush and his staff get private advice, according to court documents obtained by The Associated Press.

White House officials said Norquist, who runs the nonprofit Americans for Tax Reform, was cleared for 97 visits to the White House complex between 2001 and 2006, including a half-dozen with the president.

Reed, former executive director of the Christian Coalition and an unsuccessful candidate for lieutenant governor in Georgia earlier this year, got 18 meetings, including two events with Bush.

Officials said they believe all appointments with Bush involved larger group settings, such as Christmas parties or policy briefings for GOP supporters.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said, however, it was possible some of Norquist's meetings might have been directly with Karl Rove, the president's longtime confidant and political strategist.

"He is one of a number of individuals who worked to advance fiscal responsibility, which is one of the key aspects of the president's agenda," Perino said.

Both Reed and Norquist became involved with Abramoff, the once high-power GOP lobbyist who has pleaded guilty to fraud and is now cooperating with prosecutors in an influence peddling investigation that has rocked Capitol Hill.

Norquist's group advocates lower taxes and less government and he built it into a major force in the Republican Party. Along the way he became friends with Abramoff and Rove.

E-mails obtained this summer by AP show Norquist facilitated several administration contacts for Abramoff's clients while the lobbyist simultaneously solicited those clients for large donations to Norquist's group. Americans for Tax Reform acknowledged Norquist helped Abramoff but said he did nothing improper.

Reed rose to prominence as an organizer of evangelical Christian groups, including the Christian Coalition, inside the Republican Party before moving into business ventures where he did work for Indian tribes at Abramoff's request.

Documents unearthed by congressional investigators showed Abramoff and business partner Michael Scanlon routed about $4 million from Indian tribes to Reed-controlled entities for grassroots work aimed at blocking rival casinos.

The White House also released records showing White House appointments landed by some of Abramoff's former lobbying associates. Among them:

_Neil Volz, a former aide to Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney, had 18 appointments, including one to attend a large event featuring Bush on Sept. 11, 2001, that was canceled because of the terrorist attacks. Volz has pleaded guilty to conspiring to corrupt Ney and others with trips and other largess.

_Lobbyist Shawn Vasell also had 18. Two were Bush events, likely a February bill signing and a Ford's Theatre gala, that occurred this year, when Vasell was no longer working with Abramoff.

_Abramoff business partner Scanlon, a former aide to then-Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, may have had one appointment; the White House couldn't say for certain whether the name in the Secret Service log was the same person. Scanlon has pleaded guilty to conspiring to bribe public officials while lobbying on behalf of Indian tribes.

_Former DeLay aide and Abramoff lobbying team member Tony Rudy had 13, none with Bush. Rudy has pleaded guilty to conspiring with Abramoff. Former Abramoff lobbying associate Kevin Ring, a former aide to California Republican Rep. John Doolittle, had 21, none with Bush.

_Two former Abramoff lobbying colleagues who joined Bush's administration, David Safavian and Patrick Pizzella, show up in the appointment logs countless times. Pizzella, an assistant secretary of labor, had 48, none with Bush. Among numerous meetings for Safavian, a former Bush administration procurement official who pleaded guilty to trying to hide his dealings with Abramoff, just one was with Bush, likely an employee holiday reception in 2004.

The release of the visitor records settles lawsuits by the Democratic Party and Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

In a court filing earlier this month while settlement discussions were ongoing, Justice Department lawyers representing the administration said information about the Norquist and Reed visits should be protected from public disclosure under the doctrine of "deliberative process privilege."

That privilege lets the president and executive branch officials seek advice and deliberate policy decisions in private without having to disclose such information under the Freedom of Information Act.

It is similar to executive privilege, a power made famous by President Nixon, that lets a president keep information secret even from Congress or the courts on the grounds that it would hurt his ability to get candid advice.

Executive privilege was the focal point of major legal battles in the Watergate and Clinton impeachment cases.

Bush administration lawyers wrote that Norquist and Reed were "prominent advocates of particular tax policies and other conservative policies" and that releasing information about their White House visits would "inherently reveal the structure and nature of deliberative processes."

"In making decisions on personnel and policy, and in formulating legislative proposals, the president must be free to seek confidential information from many sources, both inside the government and outside," the lawyers wrote in citing a favorable court ruling from 2005 involving Vice President Dick Cheney.

Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Karen Finney said she saw a pattern of the White House trying to avoid answering legitimate questions.

"By trying to extend a special privilege typically reserved for U.S. government employees, to protect their Abramoff cronies like Grover Norquist, and Ralph Reed, the Bush administration showed just how willing they are to manipulate the law to hide the truth and protect their political interests," Finney said.

The administration lawyers, meanwhile, also argued against releasing information about the White House visits of former federal procurement official David Safavian on the grounds that it would violate Safavian's privacy. Safavian was recently convicted of trying to cover up his dealings with Abramoff.

Administration officials said the Justice Department never invoked the privilege mentioned in the court filings because a settlement was reached.

Former White House lawyer Lanny Breuer, who handled many of President Clinton's privilege claims, said that administration routinely released White House entry records to the public and never "came close to making a claim like the one being suggested in this instance."

2 Strategists Had 100 White House Meetings (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 (AP) — Two Republican strategists, Grover Norquist and Ralph Reed, have attended more than 100 meetings at the Bush White House, according to documents released Wednesday that provide the first official accounting of their access and influence.

Earlier this month, the White House argued to the judge hearing the lawsuit that such information was privileged, according to court documents obtained by The Associated Press.

Administration Opposes Shield Law (AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — The No. 2 official at the Justice Department said Wednesday that a shield law for reporters would encourage leaks of classified information.

At a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty also said the proposal to protect reporters from having to identify their sources would "significantly weaken" the department's ability to obtain information it needs to protect national security.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., rejected McNulty's opposition, saying he wants to push forward with the bill, inspired in part by last year's jailing of journalist Judith Miller, then of The New York Times.

Miller had refused to cooperate with prosecutors in the Valerie Plame leak investigation. She subsequently disclosed that the source who told her of Plame's CIA identity had been Vice President Dick Cheney's now-indicted former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby.

The Senate proposal would allow reporters to protect their confidential sources only in some instances. There would be exemptions in cases involving guilt or innocence, death or bodily harm, eyewitness accounts of criminal activity, and unauthorized disclosure of properly classified information.

McNulty said an exemption for national security was inadequate because the government would have to prove in court that a news leak harmed security. The Senate legislation would inject the federal judiciary "to an extraordinary degree" into executive branch functions, said McNulty.

A former solicitor general in the Bush administration, Theodore Olson, supported a shield law, saying it would promote investigative journalism.

"Naturally, the Department of Justice does not want its judgments second-guessed by courts," Olson testified. But Congress should not recoil from ensuring judicial oversight on government decisions such as warrants for eavesdropping on phone conversations, Olson said.

Clarity also is needed given a split in the federal courts as to whether journalists are entitled to protections, Olson added.

In an interview, Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, said it was frustrating listening to testimony about "false, overwrought warnings about national security."

The 109th Congress is running out of time to act on the legislation. A House version of the bill would allow courts to compel reporters' testimony when necessary to prevent "imminent and actual harm" to national security. Differences between the two bills would have to be reconciled in a conference committee after the two chambers pass the bill.

Jailing The Messenger (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

A DRUG DEALER SELLS HIS WARES to professional baseball players, whose steroid-distorted performances subvert the game. Major League Baseball knows but does nothing. The feds find out and raid the drug lab. Two reporters look into the raid, discover rampant use of steroids in baseball and write a series of articles and a book that shock the public, launch a congressional probe, prompt the president to decry drug use in sports and finally move baseball to impose a tough steroid-testing policy.

The dealer goes to jail. Might anyone else do time in this web of corruption, deceit and ineptitude? Why, the reporters, of course. The suspected ballplayers got immunity, and baseball executives escaped scrutiny. But the journalists are facing time for their work.

San Francisco Chronicle reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams are scheduled to appear before a federal judge today to say why they do not deserve to go to jail for refusing to betray the source who gave them grand jury transcripts about the case. If they don't, the judge could put them behind bars until they change their minds.

Prosecutors say, correctly, that the reporters witnessed a crime when they received the sealed statements made during the grand jury probe of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid scandal. They also argue that such proceedings are sacrosanct and must remain so in order to get witnesses to come forward. But prosecutors have at their disposal the full investigative power of the U.S. government to subpoena witnesses, grant immunity and compel testimony. They should be able to keep their own house in order. If they can't, and someone on their team or elsewhere in the courthouse leaks the testimony, they should be able to plug the leak without compelling reporters to break their promises to their own sources.

There is no room here for objections about how allowing reporters to protect their sources might interfere with the government's ability to keep the nation secure from attack in a time of war. The two Chronicle reporters are not withholding information about a security risk in the White House or the CIA. Nor is this argument about whether reporters deserve some kind of consideration others don't. They are acting on the public's behalf, and any rights they gain — or lose — also belong to the public.

Californians recognized the importance of protecting reporters from compelled testimony about their sources by passing a shield law and making it part of the state Constitution. Federal judges have the discretion to let the state law guide them in their rulings on the reporter's privilege. Meanwhile, Congress should pass a federal version of the shield law, even one that falls far short of perfect, such as the bill from Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) to restore the balance between the government — with its power to probe and compel — and two reporters backed by their enterprise and the 1st Amendment.

Suspect Pleads GuiltyÂ To Rosenbaum Murder (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

One of the men charged with killing New York Times journalist David E. Rosenbaum pleaded guilty yesterday to murder and conspiracy charges.

The surprise plea by Michael Hamlin, just a month before the first trial in the case was to begin, indicates that he could testify against his accused accomplice -- a cousin, Percey Jordan.

Hamlin, 24, told a D.C. Superior Court judge that he and Jordan attacked Rosenbaum in January as the 63-year-old journalist was walking in his Northwest Washington neighborhood.

With Hamlin's family looking on from a few rows behind Rosenbaum's relatives, he pleaded guilty to second-degree murder, conspiracy and conspiracy to commit robbery -- offenses that collectively carry a maximum penalty of 60 years in prison.

But a long sentence is unlikely. As part of the plea agreement, prosecutors will not seek a sentence above the maximum calculated under Superior Court's voluntary sentencing guidelines, which probably would mean a term of 15 to 35 years.

After yesterday's hearing, Rosenbaum's brother, Marcus, said it was important that Hamlin had taken responsibility. "Of course, none of this is going to bring my brother back," he added.

A long prison sentence, Marcus Rosenbaum said, will give Hamlin time to consider what he did. "We hope he will think about it -- as much as we're going to be thinking about my brother the rest of our lives," said Marcus, who was joined in court by his brother's adult children, Daniel and Dorothy. Already ill when her husband was killed, Rosenbaum's wife, Virginia, died in June.

Yesterday's hearing provided the clearest public account yet of what prosecutors believe happened shortly after 9 p.m. Jan. 6 -- an account that Hamlin confirmed in entering his guilty plea.

Setting out in Hamlin's car, Hamlin and his cousin went looking for someone to rob, Assistant U.S. Attorney Amanda Haines said. Jordan had a lead pipe in a backpack and when they spotted Rosenbaum in the 3800 block of Gramercy Street NW, they came up from behind, and Jordan struck Rosenbaum in the head with the pipe, Haines said. With Rosenbaum on the ground, Hamlin took Rosenbaum's wallet from his pocket, she said.

The blow to the head would prove fatal for Rosenbaum, who died two days later.

Rosenbaum was semiconscious when firefighters and emergency medical personnel found him, and the succession of mistakes that followed in treating him -- at the scene, in the ambulance and at the hospital -- led to a public outcry and a withering critique by the D.C. inspector general's office.

As a result of the Rosenbaum case, one emergency medical services technician was fired and four firefighters are going through proceedings that could lead to termination, said Alan Etter, spokesman for the D.C. Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department. Two supervisors who were subject to demotion retired, and a third was put on administrative leave for 10 days, Etter said.

D.C. Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey also punished three police officers for shoddy work in the aftermath of Rosenbaum's death.

Widely respected among his colleagues and the people he wrote about, Rosenbaum recently had retired from the Times after more than 30 years at the paper. His memorial service at the Dirksen Senate Office Building on Capitol Hill drew a number of notable Washington figures.

Hamlin and Jordan were arrested after police released security videotapes from two stores where someone used or tried to use Rosenbaum's stolen credit cards.

On Jan. 12, about an hour after the footage was provided to the media, Hamlin showed up at a D.C. police station, wearing the same industrial uniform that he appeared to be wearing in the video. He asked officers why his face was on television, authorities said.

When he was arrested, Hamlin was a driver for waste hauler Browning-Ferris Industries Inc. and lived with his mother in an apartment on Alabama Avenue SE, not far from the 7th District police station. It was not his first run-in with the law. In 2002, he was convicted of robbery in Prince George's County and sentenced to a year in jail, although all but three days of the sentence were suspended.

One day after Hamlin's arrest, Jordan, 42, turned himself in at the same police station. Both have been jailed since.

The men were eventually indicted on charges of conspiracy and murder after investigators linked them to a robbery in Silver Spring the night Rosenbaum was attacked.

The same indictment charged Jordan with the November 2005 robbery of a 72-year-old retired police officer, James Rose. It was a robbery that Rose said could have been solved long before Rosenbaum was attacked. Rose said that his cellphone was used to call relatives of both Jordan and Hamlin but that police never followed up on that lead.

The detective who worked on Rose's case was notified yesterday that he was being demoted to the rank of officer, officials said.

Judge Erik P. Christian set Hamlin's sentencing for Dec. 19, but Hamlin could be back in court before then if his cousin goes to trial next month as scheduled. As part of his plea agreement, he must testify for the government if he is called to the witness stand.

Speaking to reporters after the plea was announced, Hamlin's attorneys, Stephen V. Mercer and Steven D. Kupferberg, said that from the outset, Hamlin had wanted to accept responsibility for what he did.

One Of 2 Suspects Pleads Guilty In Murder-Robbery Of A Reporter (NYT)

By John Files

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — One of the two men accused of killing a retired reporter for The New York Times pleaded guilty Wednesday to charges of murder and robbery.

As part of a plea agreement, the man, Michael C. Hamlin, 24, agreed to testify against his cousin Percey Jordan Jr., 42, who is scheduled to go on trial next month in the killing of the reporter, David E. Rosenbaum, last January. Prosecutors said they would not seek a prison term in excess of sentencing guidelines, which include a maximum of 60 years.

Mr. Hamlin pleaded guilty to charges of second-degree murder, conspiracy to commit robbery and robbery. He said that on the night of Jan. 6, he stole Mr. Rosenbaum's wallet and that Mr. Jordan struck Mr. Rosenbaum on the head with a metal pipe; they divided his money and credit cards and used the cards at stores including a pharmacy, gas station and grocery.

Mr. Rosenbaum, who was found lying semiconscious on a sidewalk near his home that night, died two days later. The authorities attributed the cause of death to blunt force trauma to his head, neck and body.

Judge Erik P. Christian of Superior Court ordered a sentencing hearing for Dec. 19. Lawyers for Mr. Hamlin said he had accepted responsibility for his role in attacking Mr. Rosenbaum, who was 63 and had worked for The Times for more than 37 years as a reporter and an editor and had planned to continue contributing articles in retirement.

One of Mr. Hamlin's lawyers, Stephen V. Mercer, said he was "essentially a young man who had been led astray," adding, "He had a good job, a strong family and was a high school graduate."

Mr. Hamlin graduated from Anacostia Senior High School here and was a truck driver. During court proceedings on Wednesday, his mother shouted, "Love you, Michael!"

Another of Mr. Hamlin's lawyers, Steven D. Kupferberg, said, "From the outset, this was a tragedy of cataclysmic dimensions."

Mr. Hamlin's lawyers said he began to cooperate with the police shortly after the attack, when he walked into a police station and asked why his picture was being shown on local television news reports. The surveillance photograph had been taken at a store where one of Mr. Rosenbaum's credit cards was used.

Marcus Rosenbaum, the victim's brother and a Washington resident, said it was important that Mr. Hamlin take responsibility for his role in the attack. "He did a horrible thing," Mr. Rosenbaum said. "He has taken responsibility for it. And he will be punished for it."

He added, "We think that he should spend a good long time in prison."

Guilty Plea In Slaying Entered (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

One of two men arrested in the January fatal beating of New York Times journalist David E. Rosenbaum pleaded guilty to second-degree murder, robbery and conspiracy charges yesterday.

The plea entered by Michael C. Hamlin, 24, came under an agreement that means that he likely will be subpoenaed to testify in the prosecution of co-defendant Percy Jordan Jr., who is Hamlin's cousin.

Hamlin will be sentenced Dec. 19. He would have faced up to 60 years in prison if he was convicted at trial. There is no parole for felony offenders convicted in D.C. Superior Court after 2000, though sentences can be reduced by up to 15 percent for good behavior.

Hamlin, appearing in D.C. Superior Court, admitted that he stole Mr. Rosenbaum's wallet after Jordan beat the journalist over the head with a metal pipe on Jan. 6.

Mr. Rosenbaum, 63, was out for a walk when he was attacked on Gramercy Street near his Northwest home.

Hamlin's attorneys said yesterday their client should get some leniency because he turned himself in and he took responsibility for his role in the crime by pleading guilty.

"From the outset, this was a tragedy of cataclysmic proportions," said Steven Kupferberg, an attorney for Hamlin.

Marcus Rosenbaum, the brother of David Rosenbaum, said after the hearing the family was pleased that Hamlin "took responsibility" but still hopes he spends "a good, long time in prison."

Hamlin's relatives declined to comment after the hearing.

During the hearing, Hamlin's mother yelled that she loved him, which prompted a rebuke from Judge Erik P. Christian against outbursts in the courtroom. Hamlin turned and nodded.

A graduate of Anacostia High School, Hamlin was employed as a trash truck driver in Virginia at the time of his arrest. He turned himself in after seeing his picture on television during coverage of the beating.

Stephen Mercer, an attorney for Hamlin, called his client "a young man who was led astray" and who had "a very strong family."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Amanda Haines said Hamlin and Jordan drove to Northwest in Hamlin's car after they agreed to commit a robbery together.

David Rosenbaum's death has highlighted serious problems in the District's emergency-response system.

A report by the D.C. Office of the Inspector General identified "an unacceptable chain of failure" in the response to Mr. Rosenbaum's beating, including the early prognosis by a medical crew that he was drunk.

The inspector general found that the Metropolitan Police Department officers who responded to the scene did not collect all of the evidence or interview potential witnesses. The report also found that Mr. Rosenbaum was left in a hallway untreated at Howard University Hospital, while emergency workers walked past him.

Marcus Rosenbaum said he's hopeful that the D.C. Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department will improve.

"We're going to have a new mayor, so let's see what the new mayor does," he said.

D.C. Council member Adrian M. Fenty, a strong favorite to win the mayor's race in November after his victory last week in the Democratic primary, has said he plans to place emergency medical services and firefighting functions in separate departments.

LOS ANGELES - A man accused of collecting intelligence for Saddam Hussein's regime during the 1990s was indicted on charges of failing to register as an agent of a foreign government, authorities said Wednesday.

William Shaoul Benjamin, 64, of Los Angeles also faces charges of making false statements and conspiracy, according to the FBI.

On Monday, Benjamin, an Iraqi-born naturalized citizen, pleaded not guilty and was released on $500,000 bond with electric monitoring following his arrest on Sept. 14.

Code-named "9211," Benjamin allegedly worked with the Iraqi Intelligence Service between 1993 and 2001, infiltrating groups and organizations considered hostile to Saddam's government and relaying information to his Iraqi handlers. Prosecutors refused to say which groups he allegedly monitored.

He also traveled to Iraq to train with intelligence officers, authorities said. In June 2001, an Iraqi agent went to Tunisia to meet with Benjamin.

In return, Benjamin received separate payments of $2,000, $4,000 and $2,500 over the years, gifts including two bottles of whiskey, and other compensation from the IIS, according to authorities.

The FBI says that he not only failed to state he was a paid source for Iraq intelligence in his application for U.S. citizenship, but also falsely declared that he had renounced allegiance to Iraq.

A call to Benjamin's attorney, James Blatt, was not immediately returned Wednesday.

If convicted on all counts, Benjamin faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison.

West Hills Man Indicted On Charges Of Spying For Hussein In The 1990s (LAT)

By Joe Mozingo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

William Benjamin pleads not guilty to allegedly infiltrating anti-regime groups.

A 64-year-old man from West Hills has been indicted on charges that he secretly worked for Saddam Hussein's intelligence services throughout the 1990s by infiltrating groups in the United States considered hostile to the former Iraqi regime, the FBI announced Wednesday.

William Shaoul Benjamin was arrested Sept. 14 for allegedly acting as a foreign agent without registering with the attorney general, as required by law. He also was charged with lying under oath to immigration officials.

Benjamin pleaded not guilty Monday and was released on a $500,000 bond.

At his ranch-style home in West Hills, Benjamin declined to comment. He referred questions to his attorney, James Blatt, who did not return several phone calls.

According to the federal grand jury indictment, returned in June and unsealed Sept. 14, Benjamin is accused of working for the Iraqi Intelligence Service from 1993 to 2001, under the codename "9211."

The indictment alleges that Benjamin met with intelligence service officers in Iraq and Tunisia, and received three payments totaling $8,500, as well as two bottles of whiskey.

The indictment reveals only this about what Benjamin allegedly did for the Iraqi government: "Defendant Benjamin would infiltrate groups and organizations located in the United States that were considered by the Iraqi Intelligence Service to be hostile to the government of Iraq under the leadership of Saddam Hussein. [He] would collect information regarding these groups and organizations, and the individuals in them, and provide this information to co-conspirators who were Iraqi Intelligence Service officers."

The indictment did not say which groups were allegedly infiltrated. Several local Muslim leaders with ties to the Iraqi community said they had never heard of Benjamin.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Judith Heinz, who is prosecuting the case, would not comment.

If convicted on all counts, Benjamin faces a maximum of 20 years in prison.

In May, a Palestinian man was sentenced in Indianapolis to 13 years for what prosecutors said was a plot to sell U.S. intelligence secrets to Hussein's regime. Prosecutors stopped short of saying that the man, Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, actually had classified information and said the deal never went through, according to the Associated Press.

Klobuchar Campaign Aide Resigns (STPPP)

By Rachel E. Stassen-berger

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 21, 2006

Democrat Amy Klobuchar's U.S. Senate campaign communications director resigned this week after she viewed and shared a possibly fraudulently obtained campaign ad for U.S. Rep. Mark Kennedy, Republican opponent, the campaign disclosed Wednesday.

"What happened here was wrong… Some people may believe that this happens on campaigns all the time, but it is not acceptable on our campaign," Klobuchar said in a prepared statement. "I offer a sincere apology to Mark Kennedy and his campaign."

According to the Klobuchar campaign, a blogger sent Klobuchar's former Communications Director, Tara McGuinness, the Kennedy campaign ad on Saturday. She was told the ad was obtained through, "use of passwords."

Ben Goldfarb, Klobuchar's campaign manager, wouldn't further explain how the blogger got the ad or if he believed the blogger hacked into Kennedy's campaign computers. He did say McGuinness, who has been with the campaign for about five months, should not have accepted the information.

"Tara acted with exceedingly poor judgment by accepting the information and not turning it away," he said.

When he and Klobuchar, the Hennepin County Attorney, learned of the incident over the weekend they reacted immediately, he said. They reported it to the FBI, asked for McGuinness' resignation and told the blogger not to send any further advertisements to the campaign.

Goldfarb said they began dealing with the incident over the weekend and completed their follow up by today.

The FBI hadn't interviewed anyone with Klobuchar's campaign by Wednesday, he said.

He and Pat Shortridge, Kennedy's campaign manager, had a brief conversation Wednesday about the incident.

Top Klobuchar Aide Fired For Viewing Leaked Kennedy Ad (DULNT)

By Patrick Condon

The Duluth News Tribune, September 21, 2006

ST. PAUL - Democrat Amy Klobuchar's U.S. Senate campaign has fired its chief spokeswoman, revealing Wednesday that she viewed an unreleased TV ad for Republican candidate Mark Kennedy that may have been illegally obtained.

In a prepared statement, Klobuchar campaign manager Ben Goldfarb said that communications director Tara McGuinness was contacted last Saturday by a local blogger who sent her a link to the ad. Goldfarb said the campaign had turned the matter over to the Minneapolis office of the FBI.

"The blogger indicated to Ms. McGuinness that he had gained access to the advertisement by use of passwords," Goldfarb said in the statement. "Exercising poor judgment, Ms. McGuinness opened the link, watched the advertisement and asked others on our campaign to watch it."

At a hastily called press conference late Wednesday, Noah Kunin, who maintains the liberal blog http://www.blanked-out.com, revealed that he uncovered the ad. He said he was at the Web site of Kennedy media consultant Scott Howell, looking for previously aired examples of his work.

Kunin said he typed the word "Allen" into a field at the site, seeking the ads of Howell client U.S. Sen. George Allen, which led to several more links that ultimately brought up the Kennedy ad.

"At no point in the process did I circumvent security measures," said Kunin, 24. "The Web site containing this ad can be accessed by anyone with Internet access. It was in no way secured."

On the advice of his attorney, Kunin wouldn't discuss his contact with McGuinness. But he said he was not working on behalf of Klobuchar. "I want to apologize to the Klobuchar campaign for placing them under scrutiny," he said.

FBI spokesman Paul McCabe confirmed his office had been contacted by the Klobuchar campaign. "We are currently reviewing the facts of this matter to determine if there was any violation of federal law," McCabe said.

Kennedy's campaign manager, Pat Shortridge, held a news conference late Wednesday to demand the Klobuchar campaign answer a list of questions about the incident. Chief among them, Shortridge said: Why was McGuinness's firing announced Wednesday if she viewed the ad Saturday?

"Why did it take them so long to notify us?" Shortridge said. That in turn raises other questions, he said, such as whether other Klobuchar staffers or supporters saw the ad; or if McGuinness used information in the ad in a way that benefited the Klobuchar campaign.

Goldfarb said he first found out about the ad on Saturday night but not the full scope of the problem until Monday, when he dismissed McGuinness. He said the campaign didn't announce her dismissal until Wednesday because it took that long to finish making the report to the FBI.

Goldfarb said the Klobuchar campaign wouldn't answer any more questions about the matter while the FBI was investigating it. Goldfarb did say in his prepared statement that neither he nor Klobuchar watched the ad, and that "no campaign strategy or decisions will be changed because of it."

In her own prepared statement, Klobuchar apologized to Kennedy and his campaign.

"What happened here was wrong," said Klobuchar, the chief prosecutor for Hennepin County. "By reporting the blogger's activities and this incident to law enforcement, we are doing the right thing."

McGuinness did not return a phone call seeking comment.

Petersburg Doctor Convicted In Virginia Delegate Fraud Case (DPHR/AP)

By The Associated Press

Daily Press, September 21, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. -- A Petersburg doctor has been convicted of obstructing an FBI investigation and making a false statement after federal authorities say he signed two competency letters that helped a Virginia lawmaker commit bank fraud.

Dr. Clarence Scranage Jr., 51, faces up to 25 years in prison and $500,000 in fines when he's sentenced on Dec. 15.

A federal jury convicted Scranage Tuesday, according to Chuck Rosenberg, United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia. The FBI and Virginia State Police led the investigation against Scranage.

The charges relate to a 2004 joint investigation of Virginia Del. Fenton Bland. Bland is serving a 57-month federal prison sentence for forging deeds to property owned by an elderly Petersburg resident. Bland has been ordered to repay $1.2 million for his role in the scheme in which he forged signatures to take control of the property and get bank loans to benefit a Richmond funeral home he owned.

According to trial testimony, Scranage assisted the scheme by signing two letters addressed to a title insurance company that suggested the elderly victim was competent when he deeded property to Bland.

Authorities say Scranage later denied having contact with Bland during the August 2004 investigation. They later learned the two met a day before Scranage was interviewed by law enforcement.

Assemblyman Calls For Probe Of State Police Manhunt (TLPA)

By Michael Gormley

Times Leader (NE PA), September 21, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. - The state police superintendent on Wednesday rejected allegations of mismanagement that prompted a state assemblyman to call for an independent investigation into how the manhunt for Ralph "Bucky" Phillips was handled.

DOJ_NMG_0066854

"I think there should be something more, based on this," said Assemblyman William Parment, referring to complaints from the state troopers union released in a letter Tuesday. "During the process of the search, I had numerous complaints from constituents who felt the search was not being properly conducted."

Superintendent Wayne Bennett said the internal review already under way would address all questions. Gov. George Pataki issued a statement later, saying his office looks forward "to the timely completion" of the police review.

Three troopers were shot and one died during the five-month manhunt that ended with Phillips' capture Sept. 8 just across the Pennsylvania border.

Parment, a Jamestown Democrat, wants both an internal state police investigation and an outside review. He said the Legislature, which has oversight responsibility for all state agencies, or the executive branch might be capable of a proper investigation without hiring an outsider.

Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver said he would discuss with his members how to proceed.

Saying troopers were under-equipped and poorly led during the search, the New York State Troopers Police Benevolent Association asked state officials to assign an investigator from outside state government. Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver had no immediate comment Wednesday on Parment's request. State Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who is running for governor, has not commented on the letter.

Trooper union president Daniel De Federicis said Wednesday that he was "flat out refused" a meeting with State Police Superintendent Wayne Bennett about his concerns before Phillips was captured.

"If they are going to be arrogant and stubborn, which is precisely what got them into this problem in the first place, that is precisely why an outside entity must dictate to them what they did wrong in the task and what they must do in the future," De Federicis said.

Bennett said he would welcome an independent investigation, but he wouldn't call for one since the State Police can do the job.

"I can tell you there is no credibility to some of these allegations," he said, for example that state police turned away FBI assistance.

The letter also claimed state police created what became a deadly routine during the manhunt, using the same observation posts and shift-change times, and some troopers lacked adequate weaponry and body armor. Bennett said shifts have to be relieved "on post, so you can't get around that," and changing times would have meant even longer hours for some.

Bennett said the two troopers shot on a stakeout of Phillips' ex-girlfriend's house had a variety of body armor to choose from, and details that went into the woods pursuing Phillips had automatic weapons. He said some allegations, for example, that two other officers got lost in the woods and had to be found by a helicopter, he hadn't heard before and would be checked.

Phillips was captured five days after Trooper Joseph Longobardo died of injuries suffered when he was ambushed and shot during the largest manhunt in state history.

"This detail (manhunt) was poorly planned, poorly organized, poorly led and poorly executed," said the letter sent Tuesday by De Federicis on behalf of the union. The letter said the union had "significant" firsthand information from police to back its claims.

The letter, which painted an image of bullying local commanders and exhausted personnel, went to the highest levels of state government. Bennett the State Police is required to investigate personnel complaints, and some of them apparently are against personnel who are union members.

De Federicis said he feels this issue is the biggest since a fingerprinting scandal in the 1990s. Lower level state police personnel were investigated for manipulating fingerprints at crime scenes. After an independent investigation, state police adopted reforms.

"I know this is embarrassing for not just the agency, but for us as members," said De Federicis, a state police sergeant on leave for union work. "We don't like to see that. But my hope is that through a proper independent investigation, looking backwards and forwards, this agency comes out much stronger in the end."

Hundreds of police, at least 140 each shift near the end, spread out in remote, wooded southwestern New York to search for Phillips, a longtime petty criminal who escaped from an Erie County jail in April.

The condition of Trooper Donald Baker Jr., who was shot along with Longobardo while staking out the home of Phillips' former girlfriend on Aug. 31, was upgraded to serious Tuesday at a Pennsylvania hospital.

The union includes about 3,600 active state police employees, and "we feel we have the support of the majority," De Federicis said.

A suspect in the attack on Longobardo and Baker, Phillips has been charged in the shooting of Trooper Sean Brown near Elmira in June. Brown recently returned to duty.

Police Union Seeks Review Of Manhunt For Fugitive (NYT)

By Michael Wilson

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

The president of a union for state police troopers and a state assemblyman are demanding an independent review of a five-month manhunt for an escaped inmate in western New York. The union president cited what he said were several investigative missteps that may have prolonged the fugitive's flight.

The fugitive, Ralph J. Phillips, known as Bucky, surrendered on Sept. 8 in a field in Pennsylvania near the New York State line as hundreds of troopers closed in. He has been charged with attempted murder in a shooting on June 10 that wounded a trooper in Elmira, N.Y., and he is the prime suspect in an Aug. 31 ambush in Stockton, N.Y., that killed one trooper and wounded another.

The president of the Police Benevolent Association of the New York State Troopers, Sgt. Daniel M. DeFedericis, criticized the manhunt in a letter sent on Tuesday to Gov. George E. Pataki, Attorney General Eliot Spitzer and several state lawmakers. In the letter, which he also sent to reporters, Sergeant DeFedericis said turf wars among investigators, as well as poor management, enabled Mr. Phillips to elude troopers who were, at times, literally lost.

"At one point during the detail, two troopers became lost in the woods and a state police helicopter had to be used to find them," he wrote. "Had there been proper command and control, incidents like this never would have happened."

He called for an investigation of the manhunt, as did Assemblyman William L. Parment, a Democrat from Jamestown, a city in the search area. "During the process of the search, I had numerous complaints from constituents who felt the search was not being properly conducted," Mr. Parment said.

The state police superintendent, Wayne E. Bennett, said at a news conference in Albany yesterday that he would welcome an independent investigation, and that police investigators would look into the incidents described in the letter. Mr. Bennett said he knew of no complaints from troopers about the manhunt.

Governor Pataki issued a statement later, praising the troopers' work in the manhunt and saying the review was under way. "We look forward to the timely completion of that review," he said.

Mr. Phillips, 44, who has a long criminal history, escaped from the Erie County Correctional Facility near Buffalo on April 2 by prying open a tile in a kitchen ceiling with a can opener. The manhunt began in earnest after the June 10 shooting, but for many weeks that followed the state troopers rebuffed an offer of help from the F.B.I., Sergeant DeFedericis said in an interview yesterday.

"We do have evidence that the F.B.I. both was given the impression and felt they were not wanted on that detail," he said. "Hence, they left it."

Superintendent Bennett, at the news conference, said, "I can tell you there is no credibility to some of these allegations." He said the F.B.I. agents in question were part of a tactical group meant to capture Mr. Phillips once his location was known, which was not the case at the time, and that both the F.B.I. and the state police agreed that the agents were needed elsewhere.

Paul Moskal, a special agent and spokesman for the Buffalo F.B.I. office, declined to comment on the matter and referred questions to the state police.

The union letter described exhausted troopers working weeks of double shifts and supervisors at times "ranting and raving" and bullying troopers, or donning camouflage uniforms and joining the search instead of supervising.

On Aug. 19, a trooper following a suspicious motorcycle identified its driver as Mr. Phillips as he was entering a house. But before backup officers could arrive, he had escaped again, the state police have said. Sergeant DeFedericis said the trooper was initially denied backup because of a policy of "measured response" to sightings.

In a statement, a spokesman for the New York State Police, Lt. Glenn Miner, said, "We welcome the input of the P.B.A., and all members of the New York State Police, and trust that in the future, when there is an issue of health and safety regarding an ongoing matter, that it will be brought to the attention of management immediately, not weeks later."

Mr. Phillips is being held at the Chemung County jail on charges of attempted murder in the shooting of Trooper Sean M. Brown in June.

Jr. Gibes On Pet Peeves (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 21, 2006

John A. (Junior) Gotti's Long Island mansion is mobbed up - with pets.

"My mansion, it could be featured in House & Garbage," Gotti said in a dig at prosecutors' claims he has a team of servants at his $1.3 million Oyster Bay Cove estate.

Gotti mused that it was quieter on the cellblock in his upstate New York prison than the home he shares with "six kids, four dogs, six rabbits, two chickens, two horses and a bird that screams every hour on the hour."

"Where's the kids?" and "Grandpa," the bird recites in an endless soundtrack.

Until recently, the Gottis had a Vietnamese pot-bellied pig, but it got so fat it was putting a dent in the family's food bill. Gotti took it to an animal shelter. "I had to draw the line somewhere," he said.

Gotti's impromptu comedy routine came as jurors finished a second day of deliberations without a verdict in his latest trial.

Jurors sent a note yesterday to Manhattan Federal Court Judge Shira Scheindlin asking whether they must find that Gotti, 42, continued to be involved in construction extortion after 1999 in order to find him guilty.

And they asked to listen to a March 2003 tape of Gotti and pal Steve Dobies discussing the failed startup of a prison magazine that would dispense legal advice and feature photos of rapper babes.

Prosecutors say Gotti continued to reap the benefits of his life in the mob even after he pleaded guilty to racketeering charges in 1999 and began serving a six-year sentence.

In order to find him guilty of participating in a racketeering conspiracy, prosecutors must prove that he participated in at least one crime after 1999, five years from his 2004 indictment.

'HAPPY' CAPO NOT LAUGHING ANY MORE (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, September 21, 2006

Call him Louie Ta Ta.

Bonanno crime-family big Louis "Louie Ha Ha" Attanasio was sentenced to 15 years behind bars yesterday for whacking another mobster.

Attanasio, 62, and fellow capo Peter "Rabbit" Calabrese, 58, who was also given a 15-year prison stint yesterday, both pleaded guilty last month to murdering Cesar Bonventre, a member of the family's Sicilian faction.

Former godfather Joe Massino ordered the gangland hit after Bonventre fell out of favor with him. Attanasio admitted to shooting Bonventre in the back of the head as they sat in a car parked inside a garage in Maspeth, Queens, in 1984.

Attanasio and Calabrese - who both took plea deals to get the pre-arranged sentences instead of facing up to 20 years in prison - then hacked Bonventre's body into pieces and stuffed his remains into steel drums inside a New Jersey glue factory.

Attanasio's younger brother, Robert "Bobby Ha Ha" Attanasio, was also in court yesterday to plead guilty to his role in the rubout.

"I cleaned up the car involved in that murder," the younger Attanasio told Brooklyn federal court Judge Nicholas Garaufis.

Bobby Ha Ha's admission was also contingent on a prearranged prison sentence. He is expected to get 10 years behind bars when he is sentenced in January.

Former SBC Worker Denies She Lied To Grand Jury In Pellicano Case (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

A former SBC employee denied Wednesday that she lied to a federal grand jury about her contacts with a co-worker who has been indicted in the racketeering and wiretapping case of indicted private investigator Anthony Pellicano.

Facing five counts of perjury, Joann Wiggan, 52, of Burbank also testified that whatever calls she made to or received from her former co-worker, Ray Turner, had nothing to do with his alleged involvement in accessing confidential phone records for Pellicano.

Wiggan at one point broke down in tears as she testified in her own defense, contradicting assertions by federal prosecutors that she repeatedly lied to a federal grand jury about her contacts with Turner. As they presented the government's case on the first day of trial Tuesday, prosecutors said that two other ex-SBC employees who have admitted illegally providing confidential phone company information to Turner were contacting him at the same time as Wiggan.

But the former SBC employees, Teresa Wright and Michele Malkin, testified Wednesday before U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer that they did not know Wiggan. Other government witnesses, including an FBI agent and an SBC security official, testified that they had no way of knowing what Turner and Wiggan talked about, or even if the many calls between their home, work and cellphones were made by them or others with access to those phones.

Under questioning by her attorney, David R. Reed, Wiggan described Turner as a co-worker whom she had known for years and as a "fun guy … who would always make you feel good about yourself."

His friendship was particularly welcome, Wiggan said, during the period from late 1999 to 2002 that has been the subject of interest by authorities because of the phone calls between the former SBC employees. "We talked now and then," Wiggan said. "I was depressed. I was going through a bad time," she said, recalling how her mother had died and that she was too ill to attend the funeral. It was also during that period, Wiggan testified, that she was first estranged from her husband and was seeing a psychiatrist. "I was going through a terrible period of my life," she said, breaking into tears. Turner "was nice to me."

When she was later called before the grand jury to testify about her contacts with Turner, Wiggan said, she testified without an attorney because she did not think she needed one.

"I didn't have anything to hide," she said, reiterating that she never provided any proprietary information to Turner.

In his opening remarks, Reed portrayed Wiggan as someone whose grand jury testimony has come back to haunt her because she appeared without an attorney and relied on her memory and other faulty information.

Despite phone records showing calls from her numbers to her voicemail at work, Reed said, Wiggan originally told the grand jury she had not accessed her office voicemail before 2003, only to learn later that her estranged husband had been checking it during that time because he suspected that she was seeing someone else.

Wiggan also testified that she would often forget about specific voicemail messages and would often not check her voicemail because she found the process "annoying," especially when her three children would call just to complain about each other or report a fight at home.

"It was supposed to be used for emergencies," she said, "not to complain."

"Did you ever call your voicemail and have a voice message from Ray Turner?" her attorney asked.

"Not that I can remember, no," Wiggan said.

After the trial recessed Wednesday, Wiggan's lawyer said he would present witnesses who will testify that they repeatedly accessed Wiggan's office voicemail. He also said he will call other former co-workers who will attest to her devotion to the company where she worked for 33 years before being fired in March as a result of the federal probe.

Prosecutors declined to comment about the day's testimony. They are scheduled to cross-examine Wiggan today.

Effort To Combat Child Pornography On Internet Would Close Sites (NYT)

By Kurt Eichenwald

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

As part of the battle against the spread of child pornography on the Internet, an initiative has begun allowing for the shutdown or blocking of sites offering illicit images of minors, even in cases where no criminal investigation is being conducted.

The initiative, expected to be announced today at a Congressional hearing, is part of an effort among a group of Internet service providers and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

Until now, the decisions to close child pornography sites were ad hoc, based on thousands of referrals to the service providers and the Cybertipline of the center.

Often such shutdowns did not occur, and many times closings were reserved for sites that were the targets of criminal investigations

But in an inquiry this year by the Investigations and Oversight Subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, lawmakers learned of an aggressive effort in Britain to shut or block access to identified sites.

That effort, run by the Internet Watch Foundation, resulted in a major decline in the percentage of child pornography sites based in Britain, to 0.2 percent this year from 18 percent in 1997.

In that period, the percentage of such sites based in the United States rose, to almost 50 percent, officials said.

The chairman of the House committee, Representative Joe Barton, Republican of Texas, asked the center why the United States did not have a similar effort. In response, officials with the center joined with Internet service providers to begin the initiative.

In prepared testimony to be delivered today to the subcommittee, the president of the center, Ernie Allen, credits Mr. Barton as the catalyst for the initiative. Under the program, the testimony says, the center will confirm the presence of illegal images on reported sites and provide the Web addresses and related information to the service providers. Those companies will then take down such sites if they are based on their systems or will block their subscribers' access using filters.

Among the groups participating in the effort are the U.S. Internet Service Provider Association, as well as AOL, Earthlink, Google, Microsoft and United Online.

The initiative is part of an array of tactics adopted in recent months to combat child pornography sites on the Internet. Among them was the creation of the Financial Coalition Against Child Pornography, a group of major financial institutions and Internet companies that are working with the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. Payment processors representing 87 percent of the business in the United States have joined the coalition, according to Mr. Allen's statement.

The coalition will be able to follow the money that is the lifeblood of the commercial child pornography business and has the goal of eradicating the business by 2008, Mr. Allen said in his prepared remarks.

"We will aggressively seek to identify child pornography sites with method of payment information attached," Mr. Allen said. "Then we will work with the credit card industry to identify the merchant bank. Then we will stop the flow of funds to these sites."

The initiatives respond to problems identified by the Congressional subcommittee in hearings that began in April with the testimony of Justin Berry, who as a teenager had his own Web cam pornography site featuring images of himself. Mr. Berry laid out the network of companies that were hosts, payment processors and other businesses that have remained the focus of the hearings.

Sen. Burns Not A 'target,' But Campaign Quiet On Whether's He's A 'subject' (MTST)

By Jennifer McKee, The Standard State Bureau

Montana Standard, September 21, 2006

HELENA — Sen. Conrad Burns' re-election campaign revealed this week that Burns is not the "target" of an ongoing federal probe into lobbying and corruption, but that doesn't mean the three-term incumbent is not a "subject" of the probe.

The distinction stems from definitions spelled out in an exhaustive U.S. Justice Department manual. It defines the "target" of an investigation as someone about whom "substantial evidence linking him or her to the commission of a crime" exists. Targets of investigations are presumed to be the prospects for future charges.

"Subjects" of investigations are different. The manual defines subject as a "person whose conduct is within the scope of" an investigation.

Ralph Caccia, Burns' Washington-based criminal defense attorney spoke with Justice Department officials this week, who confirmed that Burns was not the "target" of the investigation.

Asked if Burns might be the "subject" of an investigation, Erik Iverson, Burns' campaign manager said he was "not going to speculate."

The campaign did not make Caccia available for comment.

Iverson said Caccia's conversation with the Justice Department came in response to comments this week by Jim Farrell, executive director of the Montana Democratic Party. Farrell told a Montana television station that "we know from many sources now that Senator Conrad Burns is the target, in fact, the center of this (investigation)."

Iverson said Farrell was referring to the Justice Department definition of "target."

"These guys are making a very specific allegation," Iverson said, an allegation that is false.

Iverson said the agency has never contacted Burns and aside from an initial letter Burns sent the agency late last year promising cooperation and Caccia's latest discussion, there have been no communications between the senator's office and investigators.

"The only word we've ever gotten from the Justice Department is to say Burns is not a target," Iverson said. "Beyond that, Senator Burns has pledged his full cooperation. He's done that and he'll continue to do that."

A Justice Department spokesman did not return phone calls Wednesday seeking comment. The agency has steadfastly refused to comment on the case.

Local and national press reports have linked Burns to Jack Abramoff, a disgraced former lobbyist who has pleaded guilty to a host of federal corruption charges stemming from lobbing abuses.

Abramoff is at the center of the ongoing Justice Department probe.

An Ohio congressman, Republican Rep. Robert Ney, pleaded guilty earlier this month to two conspiracy counts involving Abramoff's lobbying abuses.

Burns received roughly $150,000 in Abramoff-related campaign donations, the most of any member of Congress, although he returned the money after the scandal broke. Two members of Burns staff also attended the 2001 Super Bowl at Abramoff's invitation and expense.

Matt McKenna, a spokesman for Burns' Democratic opponent, Jon Tester, also called Burns a "target" in the Justice Department probe.

Both Farrell and McKenna said they weren't aware of the federal definition to "target" when they made their statements.

"I don't have a $600-an-hour criminal defense attorney like Sen. Burns, so that subtlety was lost on me," McKenna said.

Saying Farrell made "intentionally misleading and deception claims" about Burns being a "target" in the investigation, Karl Ohs, chairman of the Montana Republican Party, on Wednesday asked Farrell to step down as head of the Montana Democrats.

Farrell said he "would resign when Burns resigns and we can end this dispute today."

Farrell said he stands by his belief that Burns is part of the investigation. He said more than 20 newspapers, magazines and other news outlets have reported the story and the Justice Department has never come forward to correct the claim. But when ABC News erroneously reported earlier that House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., was also linked to the Abramoff probe, the agency corrected the inaccurate story.

"If Senator Burns is not under investigation, why has the Department of Justice remained silent?" Farrell said.

But Iverson countered that tying Burns to Abramoff has been part of the Democrats campaign strategy for months, but Burns has never been contacted by the agency.

Democrats, he said, "have created an entire campaign strategy around this issue and yesterday it evaporated on them," he said. "Facts are the facts and the fact is Burns is not a target of this investigation."

Man Arrested In Colorado Dragging Death (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

CASTLE ROCK, Colo. -- An arrest was made late Tuesday in the vehicle-dragging death of a Colorado woman, with authorities charging a man who left behind a photo of himself at the crime scene and is suspected of being an illegal alien.

Jose Luis Rubi-Nava, 36, was being held without bail yesterday on first-degree murder charges. Douglas County Sheriff Dave Weaver said he had placed an immigration hold on the prisoner and notified Immigration and Customs Enforcement of the arrest.

Investigators tracked down the suspect after finding a photograph of him and a woman at the crime scene in the Surrey Ridge subdivision, Sheriff Weaver said.

"It has not been determined if the female in the photograph is our deceased victim," he said.

Identifying the victim, whose body was found Monday, has been difficult because her face was unrecognizable after she was dragged for about 1½ miles on a paved road in the rural community about 20 miles south of Denver.

Preliminary autopsy results say that the victim was alive when she was tied to the vehicle and that she died of asphyxiation and head injuries. An orange tow rope was found around her neck.

Records obtained by KUSA-TV, the Denver NBC affiliate, showed that Rubi-Nava was arrested April 21 and charged with false identification and driving without a driver's license and proof of insurance.

The arrest comes four days after the murder conviction of Raul Gomez-Garcia, an illegal Mexican alien who last year killed Denver Police Detective Donald Young. Gomez-Garcia also had been cited in the months before the killing on traffic-related charges stemming from his illegal status but was never detained or reported to federal immigration authorities.

"It's horrifying," said former state Senate President John Andrews, referring to the dragging death. "This is another case where police had an opportunity to apprehend someone before he could commit a more serious crime, and they didn't do it."

Rep. Tom Tancredo, whose district includes the Surrey Ridge neighborhood, said the federal government shared "a certain degree of responsibility" for the woman's slaying.

"This is another example of what happens when you have no control over your borders," said the Republican, a vocal proponent of immigration reform.

The dragging death left a weaving, mile-long trail of blood and clothing scraps along Surrey Road. Washing the road with high-power hoses failed to wipe out the blood, so the county yesterday sent a road crew to resurface the street.

"It was kind of horrible seeing this trail every time you drove through the neighborhood," said Surrey Ridge resident Sharon Braddock. "I can't believe someone could do that to another human being."

Sheriff Weaver emphasized to rattled residents that their neighborhood hadn't been targeted by the killer.

Authorities said that the victim was about 5 feet tall with long auburn hair and green or hazel eyes and that she could have been white, Hispanic or American Indian. The woman in the photograph is heavyset, has short black hair and appears to be Hispanic.

3 Portland Residents Charged With Fraud (AP)

AP, September 21, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — A federal grand jury indicted three Portland residents in connection with real estate transactions.

The Department of Justice announced Wednesday that Ryan Bonneau, 30; real estate agent Troy Martin, 40 and real estate loan broker Leanne Booth, 48, were charged in the indictment.

The charges stem from a federal investigation by the IRS and the FBI into allegations that the defendants engaged in a scheme to defraud a bank to finance the sale of two properties in Northeast Portland.

Bonneau was on federal-supervised release from a prior conviction during the time he allegedly engaged in the fraud.

An arraignment has not been scheduled.

Insurance Agent Admits Fraud, Money Laundering (BILLGAZ)

By Clair Johnson, Of The Gazette Staff

Billings Gazette, September 21, 2006

A Billings insurance agent Wednesday admitted he defrauded companies and laundered money.

Michael Don Hutton, 59, pleaded guilty in federal court to wire fraud, mail fraud and money laundering. The hearing before Senior U.S. District Judge Jack Shanstrom was his first court appearance.

Hutton was the principal of M.D. Hutton Insurance, an insurance agency in Billings. From May 1999 until May 2004, Hutton issued 38 performance and payment bonds on behalf of St. Paul Mercury Insurance Co. and St. Paul Fire and Marine Co. to S.E. Inc. in Deaver, Wyo., according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Kurt Alme. SEI paid Hutton $160,152 for the bonds.

Hutton did not notify the St. Paul insurance companies he had issued the bonds and kept the insurance premiums that he had collected from SEI on the policies, Alme said. The wire fraud charge involved faxing a bond invoice from Billings to Deaver.

Hutton admitted he knew it was wrong for him to issue the unreported bonds and to retain the premiums. He told investigators he did it because he was broke and needed the money because of business losses.

In the mail fraud scheme, which ran from September 2002 to May 2004, Hutton submitted 28 premium financing agreements to Provident Financial Inc. on behalf of 12 customers to obtain loans purportedly to pay the customers' insurance premiums. Hutton did not have the consent of the customers to get premium loans on their behalf, Alme said.

Hutton forged the names of customers on the premium finance agreements and sent them to Provident, which then would pay loan proceeds to Hutton or directly to the insurance company issuing the customers' policies. When Provident provided the loan proceeds to Hutton, he kept them. When Provident provided the loan proceeds directly to the insurance company to pay the premium, Hutton instead kept some or all of the premium paid to him by the customer.

Hutton used some of these loan proceeds and premiums to make payments on the loans to Provident.

In the money laundering count, Hutton sent Provident a check for $7,067 from a US Bank account knowing he had obtained the money in the mail fraud scheme. Hutton sent the check to make a payment on the unauthorized customer loans to continue the scheme.

Agents with the FBI, the Criminal Investigation Division of the IRS and the Montana State Auditor's Office conducted the investigation.

Shanstrom set sentencing for Dec. 20. Hutton faces a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison and a $500,000 fine. Hutton remains released pending sentencing.

FBI Nabs Fugitive 'king' Of Child Porn (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, September 21, 2006

A man who described himself to FBI agents as the "king of child pornography" has been arrested after more than 20 years on the run.

Kirk Alan Swearingen Kirk Alan Swearingen has been indicted by a federal grand jury in Utah on charges of receipt of child pornography and possession of child pornography. He is scheduled to be arraigned this morning before a federal magistrate.

Swearingen, 45, was arrested after FBI agents said he gave a stolen Social Security number while trying to rent an apartment in Salt Lake City. In criminal charges filed Monday in Utah's federal court, FBI agents said Swearingen told the landlady his name was Chet Weseman. The Social Security number belonged to a 91-year-old man.

When FBI agents investigating the identity theft brought "Weseman" in for questioning, he told them his real name was Carl Clark, giving them another name and Social Security number. Those also turned out to be fake.

When agents threatened to run his fingerprints, "Swearingen advised that he understood and indicated that he had been on the 'run' for 22 years and had been profiled on 'America's Most Wanted,'" FBI Special Agent Jeff Ross wrote in an affidavit filed with criminal charges in federal court.

Swearingen is wanted in several states for child sex offenses including Iowa, South Dakota and New Mexico. He was convicted of a sex offense against a child in Colorado back in 1983. Since then, the FBI said he has been on the run with criminal charges filed against him in 1994, 1998 and 2001.

"He's got a history of travels, a history of child molestation," FBI Special Agent Patrick Kiernan told the Deseret Morning News. "He had over 30 different aliases and six or seven dates of birth. He's been using different names for years."

During questioning by FBI agents, Ross wrote in an affidavit that Swearingen called himself the "king of child pornography but denied being involved in the possession, receipt, manufacture or distribution of child pornography."

Swearingen gave FBI agents permission to search his computers and e-mail accounts. Agents said while searching his property they found a pair of CD cases with numerous compact discs featuring video files of child pornography.

On Wednesday, the FBI said it was beginning to back-track Swearingen's life for the past 20 years, learning where he has been and who he met.

"He admitted to us that he came from California," Kiernan said. "Look how far these offenses go back. We're talking over 20 years. That's a long time, and that could be a lot of victims."

If convicted of the child pornography charges in federal court, Swearingen faces a minimum of 25 years in federal prison.

Kirk Alan Swearingen Arrested in SLC

A California man who allegedly tried to rent a Salt Lake City apartment under a false identity was indicted Wednesday by a federal grand jury on charges of receipt and possession of child pornography.

Investigators say the man's true identity is Kirk Alan Swearingen, a 45-year-old former truck driver who is a fugitive wanted in Iowa on state charges of sexual abuse for allegedly molesting two minors in 2001. He is being held without bail on a federal charge of flight to avoid prosecution.

Swearingen was arrested Friday after an apartment complex owner suspected he was giving her a false Social Security number and called the FBI Identity Theft Task Force.

At first, Swearingen insisted to investigators that the Social Security number, which belonged to a 91-year-old man, was his, according to an affidavit by FBI Special Agent Jeff Ross. He then gave another fake name before finally revealing his true identity, Ross said.

The affidavit alleges that Swearingen described himself as the "king of child pornography" but denied having any illegal material and gave permission for a search of his belongings. Agents found compact discs containing numerous images of minors engaging in sexual acts, Ross alleges.

If convicted of the federal child pornography charges in Utah, Swearingen faces a 10-year mandatory minimum prison term on the possession count and a 15-year mandatory minimum sentence on the receipt count. He could get a maximum of 40 years.

The FBI affidavit says Swearingen's record shows a 1983 conviction for a sex offense against a child in Aurora, Colo.; a failure to appear in court after being charged in 1994 in Rapid City, S.D., with a sex offense against a minor, and a 1998 arrest in Gallup, N.M., on a charge of possession of child pornography. The disposition of the New Mexico case was unavailable.

Another FBI affidavit, filed in the Iowa case, said Swearingen also has a record of burglary and larceny. In addition, it alleged that Swearingen had used approximately 40 aliases in the past two decades.

'King Of Child Porn' Busted On Arrival In Utah (KUTV-TV)

KUTV-TV, September 21, 2006

(KUTV) SALT LAKE CITY - Utah authorities have arrested the self-proclaimed "King of Child Porn," who was apparently tripped up by an identity theft scheme.

Police learned about Kirk Alan Swearingen, 45, after a Salt Lake City couple alerted them about a man wanting to rent a unit in their building – whose name and social security number seemed a little suspicious.

According to John and Betty Daley, who own an apartment building, Swearingen called them two weeks ago from San Francisco. He told them he was coming to Utah and was looking for a place to rent.

But Betty got suspicious when he gave out his social security number. She did some detective work and found that his name and social security number didn't match.

The Daleys agreed to rent an apartment to Swearingen, and called the FBI. When the suspect showed up to claim his apartment, he was arrested for identity theft.

However, after further investigation authorities discovered that Swearingen has previously been arrested as an accused child sex predator. It turns out, he was wanted in a variety of states and had been on the run for 22 years.

"We could have been targets for this animal," John Daley told 2News. "We are nice people. We would have let him into our lives. He could have abused our children too."

The idea that Swearingen could have set up shop in Salt Lake City is painful for authorities to think about.

"He is one of the worst possible predators," said Brett Tolman of the U.S Attorney's office. "He's very aware of what he's doing. And he's systematic."

"We are concerned that he's traveling throughout the country, either possibly molesting children… or being involved in production or distribution of child pornography," Patrick Kiernan of the FBI told 2News.

"I got butterflies thinking about how close of a bullet we dodged," John Daley added.

Investigators say they have found several CDs in Swearingen's possession that contain child pornography. The suspect reportedly has used more than 30 aliases over the years, and officials say he was very good at deceiving people.

The FBI says at the current time, it is unclear exactly how many crimes Swearingen may have committed across the country – but he has previously been arrested in Colorado, South Dakota and New Mexico.

Iowa Fugitive Found In Utah (AP)

AP, September 21, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY A man wanted since 2001 for sex offenses in Iowa was arrested in Utah after a suspicious landlord doubted his Social Security number and called the FBI, authorities said Wednesday.

Kirk Swearingen, 45, likely won't be returning to the Midwest. He was charged in federal court with possession of child pornography after agents examined compact discs in his computer case.

"He's here now, and we have federal charges. We would certainly like to keep him," said Melodie Rydalch, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Salt Lake City.

Swearingen was in custody awaiting a detention hearing Thursday. Defense attorney Viviana Ramirez could not immediately be reached for comment.

After riding an Amtrak train to Salt Lake City from California on Sept. 15, he attempted to rent an apartment under a different name and supplied a Social Security number that actually belonged to a 91-year-old man, FBI agent Jeff Ross said in a court document.

The landlord called the FBI. Agents interviewed Swearingen and caught him in a series of lies about his name, date of birth and Social Security number, Ross said.

After fingerprinting him, agents found an arrest warrant from Jasper County, Iowa, where he was charged in the sexual abuse of two minors five years ago.

Swearingen also is wanted in Rapid City, S.D., where he was charged in 1994 with a sex offense involving a minor, Ross said.

His criminal history includes a conviction for sex offenses in Colorado in 1983, the agent said.

Swearingen declared himself the "king of child pornography" but denied possessing or making it, Ross said.

In 2002, four months after the Iowa charges were filed, FBI agents there filed documents in federal court accusing Swearingen of fleeing that state. He was described as a trucker who had used 40 aliases over 20 years.

DNA Evidence Frees A Man Imprisoned For Half His Life (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

WHITE PLAINS, Sept. 20 — Jeffrey Mark Deskovic came of age in a maximum-security prison, doing time for a crime he did not commit.

Sixteen years ago, Mr. Deskovic was convicted of raping, beating and strangling a Peekskill High School classmate in a jealous fit of rage. DNA evidence presented at his trial showed that semen in the victim's body was not his, but the police testified that he had confessed.

On Wednesday, after he fought exhaustive legal battles and wrote dozens of pleading letters that led him nowhere, Mr. Deskovic, 32, walked out of the Westchester County Courthouse an overjoyed if embittered man.

"I was supposed to finish my education, to begin a career," he said. "The time period to have a family, to spend time with my family, is lost. I lost all my friends. My family has become strangers to me.

"There was a woman who I wanted to marry at the time that I was convicted, and I lost that too," Mr. Deskovic added. "Given all that, I ask everybody: Would you be angry?"

Among the people who Mr. Deskovic said refused to review his case is Jeanine F. Pirro, the former Westchester district attorney, who took office after his trial; she is now the Republican nominee for state attorney general. The freed inmate and his lawyer expressed outrage that Ms. Pirro had scheduled a news conference to call for the reinstatement of the death penalty in New York just as Mr. Deskovic was being released Wednesday morning, but Ms. Pirro ended up canceling the event.

Ms. Pirro's successor, Janet DiFiore, agreed to run the evidence through a national DNA databank after she was approached in June by Barry Scheck, a director of the Innocence Project, which works to free the wrongly convicted.

The decision to release Mr. Deskovic came after the DNA matched that of a man who is serving time for another Westchester murder. Ms. DiFiore declined to identify him but said he recently confessed to killing Angela Correa, 15, the girl Mr. Deskovic was convicted of killing, on Nov. 15, 1989.

Mr. Scheck said that Mr. Deskovic was the 184th person nationwide to be exonerated because of DNA evidence since 1989, and that his case highlights the importance of having the authorities videotape interviews with suspects, as many police departments nationwide have begun to do.

"We've learned a lot about false confessions in the past decade," Mr. Scheck said at a news conference. "Videotaping of confessions and training of police officers can definitely lead to different results."

The case against Mr. Deskovic hinged largely on a confession he made after six hours of questioning in a small interrogation room in Brewster, where two Peekskill detectives took him for a polygraph test, according to court documents.

Mr. Deskovic, a sophomore, and Ms. Correa, a freshman, were in two classes together. Both were quiet and did not have a lot of friends, according to his mother, Linda McGarr, and Ms. Correa's stepfather, Pedro Rivera, who sat quietly in court to see Mr. Deskovic go free.

"I can't tell you why, but I've always had a feeling that the police had the wrong guy," said Mr. Rivera.

Mr. Rivera met Mr. Deskovic for the first time at Ms. Correa's wake, but saw him numerous times after that, he said. Mr. Deskovic went to church with the family, dined at their home and took Ms. Correa's younger sister to the movies, he recalled.

"Jeffrey cried a lot for Angela," Mr. Rivera said. "He was very distraught."

The police in Peekskill said Mr. Deskovic's behavior seemed odd. At his trial, investigators said they grew suspicious of Mr. Deskovic because he was late for school the day after Ms. Correa's murder and seemed "overly distraught" about the death of a girl who was not his close friend.

For two months, Mr. Deskovic denied having anything to do with Ms. Correa's death. Finally, in late January 1990, he agreed to the polygraph test, which preceded the interrogation that led to his confession.

"Believing in the criminal justice system and being fearful for myself, I told them what they wanted to hear," Mr. Deskovic said, by way of explanation. "I thought it was all going to be O.K. in the end," because he was sure that the DNA testing would show his innocence.

In convicting Mr. Deskovic, the jury effectively chose to give more weight to his tearful confession than to the DNA and other scientific evidence.

The conviction seemed to indicate that jurors believed the prosecution theory that semen found in Ms. Correa's body was likely from a consensual sexual relationship with someone else.

Many convicted criminals were compelled to give DNA samples in recent years, and the source of the semen in the victim's body was apparently identified that way. Until such database comparisons were available, there was no way for Mr. Deskovic to disprove the prosecution's theory, because there was no way to pinpoint whose semen it was.

While in prison, Mr. Deskovic said, he lived "from appeal to appeal," trying not to think of the 15-years-to-life sentence that hung over him. He finished high school, and earned an associate's degree.

He played a lot of chess and learned how to type, fix computers and paint walls, he said. He also learned how to cook.

A year into his sentence, he converted to Islam. "It was a major factor in surviving prison in terms of my mental sanity,'' he said.

After his release, Mr. Deskovic went with his mother, two aunts and two uncles for lunch at an Italian restaurant here. He ate tomatoes, mozzarella sticks, stuffed mushrooms, mussels and a dish of baked ziti. And for the first time, he talked on a cellphone.

"That was pretty weird,'' he said afterward. "I was looking for the little holes where you talk into, and couldn't find them.''

Sheriff Gets $17,000 Gang Grant (CHESTNR)

By Stephen Guilfoyle

Chester County (SC) News & Reporter, September 21, 2006

The Chester County Sheriff's Office has received $17,765 from the U.S. Attorney's Office in Columbia, part of $445,487 in anti-gang grants the office announced last week.

The grant application said the Sheriff's Office will start a program called, "Beat the Streets" to fight gangs in the county.

Deputy Kim Carnes, the gang officer for the Sheriff's Office, said the grant would allow her to buy a laptop and a projector so that she can give presentations on gang activity and raise awareness, as well as teach classes in local schools.

She currently uses a Sheriff's Department laptop, but she can't take it with her everywhere she needs to go.

Chester County Council accepted the grant, which has no match, at Monday night's meeting.

Sheriff Robby Benson said the computer will allow Carnes to track gang activity and put it into a state database so the state can track gang activity. Federal officers would probably have access to the database as well, he said.

Carnes said she would be able to advertise the department's tipline better. Going into the schools is a big concern of the grant.

She will have a contest to design an anti-gang billboard, and students will win a prize. The student who comes in first will have his or her billboard put up for about a year.

She will also prepare pamphlets and information sheets about gang activities with the grant.

She will be able to do PowerPoint presentations from the computer with the projector, Carnes said.

"We have to do exactly what we said we'd do with the grant," Carnes said.

The grant spells out exactly what they will do with the money. The Chester County Safe Schools/Healthy Student Initiative helped Carnes write the grant, and she thanked them for writing a good one.

Chester County is the only county in the area to receive a grant.

Benson told County Council that Rock Hill, York and the city of Chester Police Department applied but did not receive a grant.

Gang activity is on the increase, Benson said., Gang members are leaving the bigger cities to get away from the police there, and are coming to rural counties.

Benson said many gang members here have come down from Charlotte.

He said a recent shooting at a party July 15 on York Street was apparently gang-related.

No one was arrested at the time of the incident, Benson said, But one man was subsequently arrested. That man has already been released on bond, he said.

Six people were injured when one man opened fire at what was called a party attended by about 250 to 300 people..

"The party had apparently been going on for a while," said Benson.

All the victims in the shooting were treated by the rescue squads, then transported, according to the incident report. Two were taken by helicopter to hospitals..

The State Law Enforcement Division assisted the Sheriff's Office in investigating the second shooting.

Several .45 caliber casings were found, along with a Smith and Wesson .38 caliber pistol.

Despite recovering a gun of a different caliber than the recovered casings, Benson said investigators believe there was just one shooter.

Carnes said talk on the street is one person in a gang was shooting at members or another gang.

The report says none of the victim's injuries were life-threatening. One of the victims was a woman, the rest were men.

The incident report says the shooting happened at 12:34 a.m., July 16 at 1345 Old York Road.

U.S. Attorney Reginald I. Lloyd announced 10 other anti-gang grants from a federal program called Project Safe Neighborhood/Project CeaseFire.

The S.C. Department of Public Safety's Office of Justice Programs will administer these grant programs on behalf of the U.S. Attorney's Office and the Department of Justice, according to a release from Lloyd's office.

Project Safe Neighborhoods is a national federal initiative designed to reduce gun violence. Project CeaseFire is South Carolina's implementation of the Safe Neighborhoods.

"State and local law enforcement agencies are a tremendous part of our Project CeaseFire program. Therefore, we are pleased to be able to award them the funds that they need to help us address the gang problem in South Carolina," Lloyd said. "Together we can hopefully make a difference in South Carolina."

Lloyd said with the strong and consistent support of each law enforcement agency, Project CeaseFire can continue to have the success that it has had for the past five years. These anti-gang grant awards will allow law enforcement agencies to continue with innovative programs to reduce gang and firearm crimes in our towns and counties.

These grants comprise the $445,487 awarded to the South Carolina Department of Public Safety as fiscal agents for the U.S. Attorney's Office (District of South Carolina) by the U.S. Justice Department under the Project Safe Neighborhoods program. Under federal guidelines, agencies may use these funds for such purposes as hiring and training law enforcement officers and support personnel and establishing programs focusing on gang violence and gang violence prevention and education.

More information concerning the national initiative may be found at www.ProjectSafeNeighborhoods.gov, while more information concerning the South Carolina initiative may be found at www.usdoj.gov/usao/sc/.

Warren Wilson Gets Money To Prevent Violence Against Women (ASHCT)

Asheville (NC) Citizen-Times, September 21, 2006

SWANNANOA – Warren Wilson College has received a federal grant of $191,851 to reduce violence against women on campus.

The U.S. Attorney's office announced the award Tuesday, part of a Justice Department program that helps colleges pay for victim services, education programs, security measures and investigation strategies.

The goal is to better prevent and respond to domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault, and stalking.

Warren Wilson in Swannanoa has about 800 undergraduate students, 55 percent of them women.

Fla. Inmate Who Had Won Stay Is Executed (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, September 21, 2006

(AP) - STARKE, Fla.-A convicted killer who had argued that Florida's use of lethal injections amounted to cruel and unusual punishment was put to death by lethal injection Wednesday night after the U.S. Supreme Court narrowly denied him another stay.

Clarence Hill, 48, was executed for the 1982 murder of a Pensacola police officer in a savings and loan robbery.

He did not reply when asked if he had a last statement, staring straight at the ceiling. His head was strapped down, unlike some other executions.

After the injection, he blinked his eyes a couple times, his chest heaved and his mouth drooped. The physicians, wearing blue hoods and dark goggles, checked his vital signs at 6:11 p.m., and pronounced him dead a minute later.

Earlier in the day, the Supreme Court, which halted Hill's execution in January after he was strapped to a gurney awaiting his lethal injections, voted 5-4 to deny another stay. Justices Stephen Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, David Souter and John Paul Stevens voted to grant the stay, the court said in a two-sentence order.

The high court ruled unanimously in June that Hill could argue the three chemicals used in lethal injections in Florida and many other states - sodium pentothal, pancuronium bromide and potassium chloride - can cause excruciating pain. The first drug is a painkiller, the second paralyzes the inmate and the third causes a fatal heart attack, but death penalty critics have argued the painkiller could wear off too soon.

Neither the federal court in Tallahassee nor the Atlanta appeals court agreed to consider Hill's challenges to the chemicals. Both said Hill should have made those arguments years ago, although Doss contends they could not have been made until Gov. Jeb Bush signed the death warrant in November.

Hill, 48, of Mobile, Ala., was convicted of first-degree murder for the Oct. 19, 1982, killing of Officer Stephen Taylor, 26, and the wounding of Taylor's partner, Larry Bailly, when they responded to a silent alarm at Freedom Federal Savings Bank.

Hill's wife, Serena Mangano, of Modino, Italy, visited him before the execution. The couple married in June during a no-contact wedding at Florida State Prison in Starke.

The Supreme Court also halted the execution of another Florida inmate who sought to challenge the lethal injection procedure. A new execution date has not been set for Arthur Rutherford, who like Hill had been scheduled to die in January.

Court Refuses Second Delay; Inmate Dies (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

MIAMI, Sept. 20 — Clarence E. Hill, convicted of killing a police officer in 1982, died by lethal injection Wednesday evening after the Supreme Court narrowly refused to delay his execution a second time. Mr. Hill had claimed that Florida's lethal injection procedure was so painful as to be unconstitutional.

The court voted 5 to 4 Wednesday to deny a new stay, with Justices Stephen G. Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, David H. Souter and John Paul Stevens dissenting.

Mr. Hill was originally scheduled to die last January, but the court stayed his execution at the last minute and told the federal district court in Tallahassee to reconsider his argument that lethal injection was unconstitutionally cruel.

The district court rejected the argument again this month without holding a hearing, a decision upheld by the United States Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit, in Atlanta.

Mr. Hill, 48, was executed at Florida State Prison in Starke as relatives of his victim, Stephen Taylor of Pensacola, looked on. He was pronounced dead at 6:12 p.m., said Robbie Cunningham, a spokesman for the Florida Department of Corrections.

"Everything went according to protocol," Mr. Cunningham said.

Like 36 other states, Florida uses a combination of three chemicals in lethal injection: one to anesthetize the inmate, a second to paralyze the body and a third to stop the heart. Mr. Hill based his case on a 2005 study that found that the anesthetic could wear off before an inmate died.

The Supreme Court ruled unanimously on Mr. Hill's case in June, saying that inmates facing execution by lethal injection could invoke a federal civil rights law to challenge the state's choice of drugs and the way in which they are given.

But on Monday, a three-judge panel of the 11th Circuit court in Atlanta said Mr. Hill had waited too long to file a civil rights complaint — he did so four days before he was to be executed in January — and was merely trying to stall.

The Supreme Court issued no opinion to accompany its decision on Wednesday and responded only to Mr. Hill's request for a stay, leaving aside his appeal.

Flag-shop Hero Nabbed Armed Hill Intruder (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen And Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, September 21, 2006

A flag-shop worker, not the U.S. Capitol Police, first subdued an armed intruder in the Capitol this week, according to Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R-Miss.).

"A guy who worked in the flag shop grabbed him," Cochran said yesterday. "[The worker is] a big guy."

Cochran said his staff told him the intruder was near the flag shop and "looked suspicious."

The still-unidentified flag-shop worker "just assumed [the intruder] didn't belong in the Capitol," seized him and held him until Capitol Police arrived on the scene.

It was "an act of courage," Cochran said.

The Architect of the Capitol's office did not return several requests for comment.

During a press conference following the Monday incident, rumors flew about the possibility that someone other than the police had initially apprehended Carlos Greene, 20, who lead police on a four-floor chase around the Capitol after crashing his SUV on the East Front.

When asked whether officers apprehended Greene that day, Acting Chief Christopher McGaffin couched his answer to reporters, saying to his knowledge, "Capitol police apprehended Greene in the flag office" located on the basement floor of the Capitol.

The Capitol Police did not return multiple attempts for comment.

The criminal complaint filed in the U.S. District Court revelation makes no mention of the flag-shop employee.

The report, filed by Capitol Police Detective Nettie Watts, states that after being chased down a staircase into the basement level of the Capitol, "United States Capitol Police stopped the defendant and arrested him."

Channing Phillips, spokesman for the Office of the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia, said it is not uncommon for details to be left out of the initial criminal compliant.

"Many of the details will come out at the preliminary hearing," Phillips said.

Greene is currently being held without bond at the D.C. Jail's Correction Treatment Facility until Friday when the detention and preliminary hearings are scheduled.

The court document also describes how Greene entered the Capitol Visitor Center construction site after ramming into a Capitol Police cruiser, fleeing from the vehicle after crashing it into a concrete barrier and running into a construction entrance on the east side of the Rotunda.

Upon arresting Greene, officers allegedly found a Derringer .22 caliber handgun and a substance that tested positive for crack cocaine.

Several members of Congress have expressed disappointment and have called for the Capitol Police to investigate the incident thoroughly.

"The Speaker wants a complete review of what happened and for those who are accountable to be disciplined," said Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "He also wants to be informed about their plans to never let this happen again."

Staff Aided In Arrest (RC)

By John Mcardle

Roll Call, September 21, 2006

Acting Capitol Police Chief Christopher McGaffin revealed Wednesday that employees of the House Flag Office assisted officers in subduing the armed intruder who perpetrated the worst Congressional security breach in eight years.

"I want to recognize ... the courageous assistance that members of the House Flag Office brought to the department in apprehending the suspect," McGaffin said Wednesday while discussing further details of the incident. "I believe that they were instrumental. Greene came upon these employees seconds before [Capitol Police officers] came upon Greene. So they were valiant in their presence and in at least one instance participated in a bit of struggle with this fellow."

After running a Capitol Police barricade in a sport utility vehicle early Monday morning, Carlos Greene, of Silver Spring, Md., crashed into and came to a stop within the Capitol Visitor Center construction site. Greene, 20, exited his car carrying a Derringer .22-caliber handgun and crack cocaine and took off on foot toward the Capitol. He was able to access a construction door on the East Front of the Capitol, sprint through the building and almost make it to a basement-level door leading to the West Front before he was subdued and arrested just outside the House Flag Office.

Because the criminal investigation into Greene's early morning chase is still ongoing, McGaffin said he could not give further details about the AOC employees' actions or release their names.

McGaffin would only say that "it was a significant and courageous and valiant role. ... These individuals rose to the occasion and just performed valiantly."

But even while praising the flag office staff, McGaffin added that bystanders are strongly encouraged by police not to intervene in any unfolding security situations.

Flag office staffers contacted Tuesday and Wednesday referred interview requests to an AOC spokeswoman, who could not be reached for comment.

Along with a criminal investigation, McGaffin is conducting an internal review of the entire incident and said he shares the dissatisfaction that Members and staff have expressed since Monday's security breach.

"The expectations they're bringing as to corrective action ... is shared by me as well. Where there are performance failures there will be corrective action. Where there are failures in the execution of what I want to say are absolutely sound and exceptional security plans and procedures but where we failed to execute them properly, corrective action will be taken."

One criticism that has been directed at McGaffin since Monday was the fact that it took his office more than nine hours to hold a press conference and inform the public about Greene's breach of security.

On Wednesday, McGaffin responded, saying, "this incident was of such magnitude that I wanted to ensure that the incident had been resolved and that vulnerabilities that were immediately revealed by this assault were addressed and corrected before I stepped away from that responsibility and went to brief the media. And so as I prioritized the tasks that I saw needed to be accomplished on Monday the safety and security of the complex, the Members, the staff and the public was first and foremost in my mind. And once I saw to that accomplishment I saw then to the next need of briefing the public as to what occurred and that's why it took so long."

He added that he felt that the incident was of such significance that it required the chief of police to go forward and explain what happened and what had been done to correct it rather than a subordinate.

But in the days since the incident, even some Capitol Police officers have expressed frustration with how this incident was handled by Capitol Police brass.

One officer said rank-and-file cops have begun questioning the effectiveness of the current leadership and where it has been headed in recent months.

"It's a matter of time before one of us loses our life due to the lack of leadership and accountability within our chain of command," the officer said on Wednesday.

McGaffin also revealed Wednesday that Capitol Police had contact with Greene prior to the moment where he ran his rented 2006 Chevrolet Trailblazer through a CVC construction entrance at First Street and Maryland Avenue Northeast at approximately 7:45 a.m.

"It's my understanding as this unfolds that we had contact with him in the area of the 300 block of First Street Southeast for erratic driving, which jeopardized the safety of one or two pedestrians. And it was at that location where an officer who was attempting to stop Greene, but the officer was on foot, was unsuccessful at stopping him. He broadcasted a lookout for the vehicle's description as it fled at a high rate of speed from the area of First and C streets Southeast. [Greene] fled eastbound on C Street and that's when the officer put out a lookout which allowed our officers on First Street to observe him approaching northbound, and we saw what happened, he breached security."

Although McGaffin had indicated at a press conference late Monday afternoon that Greene's vehicle had crashed into and through a Capitol Police "blocking vehicle" to access the construction site, he said Wednesday that "the issue as to whether the block vehicle was actually struck or not is still under investigation. I can say that the traffic accident report that was taken by the police department did not establish physical evidence of the block vehicle being struck, but we're still attempting to at this point assess video recordings that we've got to see if in fact the vehicle was struck by Greene's car."

McGaffin added that the department also is exploring reports of Greene's erratic and high-speed driving being observed up to 10 blocks from the Capitol by bystanders who have since contacted the department.

"At least one individual said they saw the car that morning driving at a high rate of speed and driving erratically five to 10 blocks away," he said.

No motive has yet been established in Monday's incident and McGaffin said that part of the investigation also is still ongoing.

DOJ_NMG_0066867

"We have no indication that he was purposefully targeting the Capitol or the Capitol complex," he said. "We're trying to take this all the way back to where he began this journey and [find out] did he even know where he was going? And does he know where he ended up?"

After appearing before Magistrate Judge John Facciola Tuesday afternoon, Greene is being held without bond in a D.C. jail pending his detention and preliminary hearing on Friday.

Is Adult Prison Best For Juveniles? (USAT)

By Marilyn Elias

USA Today, September 21, 2006

Get-tough laws that have put more teenagers in adult prisons since the early '90s conflict with a wave of new research suggesting how children can be set straight and society protected at the same time.

At a two-day summit starting today in Washington, leading researchers will meet with juvenile justice decision-makers — directors of state juvenile justice systems, judges, prosecutors and defense attorneys — to discuss how the new evidence should affect treatment of teen offenders.

"We know so much more about the adolescent brain and behavior than we used to, and we want to get these facts into the hands of people who can make a difference," psychologist Laurence Steinberg says. He heads a network of researchers and juvenile-justice workers financed by the MacArthur Foundation, which sponsored the meeting.

Since 1992, every state but Nebraska has made it easier to try juveniles as adults, and most states have legalized harsher sentences. Many states limit judges' discretion, sending all teens who commit serious offenses to adult courts, or allowing prosecutors to opt for adult prosecution.

That sounds reasonable, but it can be unfair, says Kimberly O'Donnell, chief judge of the Juvenile and Domestic Relations District Court in Richmond, Va. She points to 14-year-olds tried as adults for "assault by a mob" — in effect, ganging up on and hurting a child at school.

"And once you're tried as an adult, you're always an adult, which can have awful consequences," she says.

For example, if these teens are arrested again, prosecutors can use the threat of lengthy prison sentences as leverage to gain a plea bargain agreement that might not be in a child's interest, O'Donnell says.

There's firm evidence that teens prosecuted as adults are much more likely to commit crimes when they get out than comparable young people tried as juveniles, says Shay Bilchik, president and CEO of the Child Welfare League of America.

Juvenile facilities tend to offer better education, job training, and drug abuse and mental health treatment, Steinberg says. Plus, teens aren't learning from adults how to be career criminals, he adds.

That's not to say kids don't commit serious crimes before landing in adult jails. Some even score in the psychopathic range on written tests that predict which adults are likely to commit future crimes. These tests are sometimes used in deciding whether young people should get severe punishments or be tried as adults, says psychologist Elizabeth Cauffman of the University of California-Irvine.

She says it's a dubious practice. Her studies show that adolescents tend to move away from this psychopath profile when they're tracked for a couple of years, while adult scores are usually stable.

Some hallmarks of psychopathy — thrill-seeking, impulsivity, failure to accept responsibility — are all too familiar to parents of teenagers, Cauffman says. In effect, youths grow out of this behavior.

Many younger children aren't even competent to stand trial because they don't understand the trial process or can't make decisions about pleas, says Thomas Grisso, a psychologist at the University of Massachusetts Medical School in Worcester. He has developed guidelines to determine juvenile competence and is training U.S. juvenile court workers in using them.

New findings of other MacArthur network scientists challenge common assumptions about teenage criminals. For example, a study that has tracked 1,355 serious offenders for three years finds that less than 10% of those involved in a lot of criminal activities at the outset continued to be heavily involved over the years. "A lot of policy is driven by the view that if a kid does a felony assault, he must be a bad actor from here on forward," says study leader Edward Mulvey of the University of Pittsburgh Medical School.

Still, 57% had at least one more arrest within two years. "Plus, we know arrests represent only the tip of the iceberg. Who really knows how much else they did that they weren't caught for?" asks Adrian Raine, a psychologist at the University of Southern California who studies criminal behavior.

Long-term studies of highly aggressive children suggest that some are headed for a life of violent crime and should be locked up early because they're dangerous, he says. Brain damage or family qualities may cause their behavior, Raine says.

"But it's naive to think many of these very violent kids are going to stop, and we don't need to be protected from them."

In Mulvey's study, better parenting and long-term treatment for drug or alcohol abuse correlated with less criminal behavior.

Bilchik, a former prosecutor of juvenile cases in Miami for 16 years and former head of the federal Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, can understand why research has been slow to translate into action.

"When you've got a kid in front of you who's done a vicious armed robbery with a beating, it's different than an intellectual argument about what works," Bilchik says. "Prosecutors think, 'Can I really make myself try him as a juvenile? Can I even get permission from my boss?' "

Sometimes prosecutors know a juvenile system has scant mental health treatment or rehabilitation, and they'd rather lock up a dangerous teen with adults than risk a slap on the wrist, Bilchik says. And often there's little follow-up monitoring by youth workers when troubled young people are let out. Still, he says adult prisons, despite their short-term appeal, aren't usually the long-term answer. "We have the research that tells us what to do. The tragedy is, we're not capitalizing on it."

Nursing Home Owners Indicted (USAT)

By Laura Parker And Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, September 21, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — A grand jury on Wednesday indicted the owners of a nursing home near New Orleans where 35 people drowned during Hurricane Katrina, according to court documents.

These are the first indictments arising from suspicious deaths during Katrina, which flooded much of the New Orleans area, including all of St. Bernard Parish, where St. Rita's Nursing Home was located.

The grand jury, the first seated in St. Bernard Parish since Katrina devastated the community a year ago, indicted Salvador and Mabel Mangano on charges of negligent homicide and cruelty to the infirm, according to documents obtained by the Associated Press.

Mike Fink of Niceville, Fla., whose mother, Trishka Stevens, survived the flooding of St. Rita's, applauded the indictment.

"Those people had responsibilities, and people died, so they should be held responsible," he said.

Lawyers in the case would not comment because of a gag order. Jim Cobb, the Manganos' attorney, said he will seek permission from the court to talk about the case publicly.

"If they were able to obtain information about an indictment, we should be able to respond and that's what we will seek," Cobb said.

The Manganos, arrested two weeks after the deaths, remain free on bond.

Mabel Mangano, reached at her home in Baton Rouge, said she was "disappointed" by the indictment. She declined to comment further because of the gag order.

The indictments stem from a broad investigation into more than 200 deaths at hospitals and nursing homes after Katrina's floodwaters stranded thousands and knocked out power. In July, Louisiana Attorney General Charles Foti arrested two nurses and a doctor, alleging they murdered at least four patients at Memorial Hospital in New Orleans by injecting with them with narcotics. A grand jury has not yet heard that case.

Prosecutors have said the Manganos were negligent for ignoring evacuation orders. The St. Rita's residents died after water poured into the nursing home, trapping many frail and immobile patients in their beds.

Relatives said they thought the Manganos should have been indicted.

"At this point, I believe it was the right thing to do," said Joe Gallodoro, an insurance broker and former St. Bernard fire official whose father, Tufanio, drowned in his bed. "It's in the hands of the judicial system, and I have to let them handle it."

Mike Fink agreed. "It seems like they should have got those people evacuated or had enough help there to keep them alive," he said.

Thirty-five lawsuits have been filed against the Manganos by relatives of those who died or who were injured at St. Rita's.

On Aug. 29, the Manganos filed a lawsuit against federal, state and local officials, including Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco. The lawsuit says those officials failed to evacuate St. Rita's residents as Katrina approached. And it contends that inadequate levees allowed 13 feet of water to fill St. Rita's, a 20-year-old facility that had never flooded.

At a court hearing on Monday, Cobb asked that the attorney general be disqualified from prosecuting the case because he is a defendant in the Mangano lawsuit.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Dismisses Challenge To Law Requiring Citizenship Proof For Government Health Benefit (FINDLAW/AP)

By Kevin Freking, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-A federal judge dismissed a challenge to a law that requires millions of Medicaid beneficiaries to prove their citizenship before obtaining health benefits.

Congress passed legislation earlier this year designed to ensure that only citizens or qualified legal immigrants gain access to Medicaid, the state-federal health insurance program for the poor. More than 50 million people get health care through the program.

Several beneficiaries contended in a lawsuit that the new documentation requirements would endanger their health care benefits. That contention was nothing more than conjecture, U.S. District Judge Ronald A. Guzman ruled.

Guzman's 21-page ruling was made public Tuesday. He did not rule on the law's validity. Instead, he said the plaintiffs made clear in their complaint that they were challenging the regulations that the Department of Health and Human Services issued concerning implementation of the law.

The contested regulations do not create the documentation requirements. They simply flesh them out, the judge noted.

"Absent a showing that their injuries can be traced to the regulations, which they have not made, plaintiffs do not have standing to pursue these claims," Guzman wrote.

Lawyers who are pursuing the case on behalf of Medicaid beneficiaries said they got a partial victory in the case when the judge said he probably will issue an injunction that would prevent 500,000 foster children from being subject to the documentation regulations.

"He said there is a strong likelihood of success on the merits for the foster children," said John Mark Bouman, a lawyer at the Sargent Shriver National Center on Poverty Law in Chicago, Illinois. "If he had also found they were about to be injured tomorrow, he would have entered an injunction. He just wasn't convinced of that part yet."

Bouman also said that one way or another the plaintiffs will pursue the case and ask the judge to rule on the validity of the statute. He described it as an interim ruling that says children in foster care are likely to win, but everyone else must overcome procedural hurdles.

In all, 15 people were listed as plaintiffs. Families USA, an advocacy group in Washington, helped organize the lawsuit. Ron Pollack, the organization's executive director, said the documentation requirements are most harmful to victims of natural disasters, the homeless and people with mental and physical disabilities who will have trouble finding documents such as passports or birth certificates.

"For many people, this documentation requirement is going to prove to be extraordinarily onerous, and many people will be unable to fulfill this requirement," Pollack said.

However, about 8 million Medicaid beneficiaries also are exempted from the documentation requirements, namely elderly and disabled people so poor they qualify for both Medicare and Medicaid, as well as those aged and disabled people who get cash to meet basic needs through Supplemental Security Income.

Congress said that, beginning July 1, documents will be needed to prove identity and citizenship.

Regulations issued by the Department of Health and Human Services say a passport would meet both criteria. A birth certificate would serve as evidence of citizenship, but a second document would be needed to prove identity. In rare cases, sworn affidavits from two citizens can be accepted, but at least one of the two cannot be related to the applicant.

Civil Rights:

City Of Boca Sued Over Ban On Drug Recovery Residential Centers (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum And Luis Perez

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 21, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice filed a civil rights lawsuit against the city of Boca Raton Wednesday challenging a 2002 zoning rule banning the operation of "sober houses" in residential neighborhoods.

Pushing recovering drug addicts and alcoholics into parts of the city reserved for motels and medical facilities discriminates against people with disabilities and violates the federal Fair Housing Act, government lawyers said in their complaint.

The government's suit asks a federal judge to stop the city from enforcing the rule, to impose a civil fine on the city, and to order the payment of monetary damages to victims.

"No citizen should be refused an equal opportunity for housing in their community," said Wan Kim, who heads the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division.

Boca Raton's ordinance applies to housing facilities that require substance abuse treatment or drug or alcohol testing as a condition of residency.

Jamie Cole, a lawyer for the city, said the rule was intended to prevent large, commercial facilities from intruding into residential neighborhoods, not to drive out recovering addicts.

"The city did not discriminate against anyone," Cole said. "This was a legitimate exercise of the city's zoning authority to avoid commercial entities coming into residential neighborhoods."

The measure has been on hold pending resolution of a 2003 lawsuit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union on behalf of residents of Boca Raton sober living residences.

That suit accused the city of segregating recovering alcoholics and drug addicts into "what is essentially a ghetto district." West Palm Beach attorney James Green, who represents residents of city sober houses in the suit, said the Justice Department's complaint validates criticism that the zoning ordinance illegally discriminates against people recovering from addiction.

"This rule effectively bans sober houses in the city of Boca Raton," Green said.

He said discrimination was evident during the May 2002 meeting when the City Council passed the law.

DOJ_NMG_0066870

In that meeting, one resident said the sober houses attract "pedophiles, murderers, God knows what," while others demanded that the City Council get them out of residential neighborhoods.

Justice Department Sues Boca Raton, Alleging Discrimination (AP)

AP, September 21, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department sued the city of Boca Raton on Wednesday, alleging a city zoning ordinance discriminates against disabled people.

The complaint, filed in federal court in Miami, alleges that the ordinance excludes housing recovering drug and alcohol addicts in residential areas and imposes "conditions and prohibitions on housing for persons with disabilities that are not imposed on housing for an equal or greater number of persons without disabilities."

The Justice Department alleges the ordinance intentionally targets housing for recovering addicts and illegally subjects them to different rules than others, in violation of the Fair Housing Act.

"No citizen should be refused an equal opportunity for housing in their community," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the department's civil rights division.

The lawsuit seeks monetary damages to compensate victims, civil penalties, and a court order barring future discrimination. The Justice Department also seeks to prevent the city from enforcing the ordinance.

"The Fair Housing Act protects all Americans from housing discrimination, including those persons recovering from substance abuse problems," said Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta.

Boca Raton Mayor Steven Abrams said the city has been negotiating a compromise with drug rehabilitation facilities and planned to meet Monday to discuss the details.

However, Abrams defended the ordinance and said the city would fight the complaint.

"The city has never discriminated against anyone," he said. "The ordinance was carefully crafted to protect residents from commercial intrusion."

Florida: Justice Department Sues City Over Zoning Law (NYT)

By Terry Aguayo

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

The federal Justice Department filed a lawsuit against the City of Boca Raton challenging a zoning ordinance that it said discriminated against people with disabilities. The lawsuit says the ordinance, passed in 2002, excludes housing for recovering alcoholics and drug addicts in the city's residential areas, in violation of the Fair Housing Act. The regulations "impose conditions and prohibitions on housing for persons with disabilities that are not imposed on housing for an equal or greater number of persons without disabilities," says the lawsuit, which seeks monetary damages for victims, civil penalties and a court order to stop future discrimination.

FBI Examining Excessive Force At Tucker Prison Unit (AP)

AP, September 21, 2006

Six Arkansas correctional officers have been fired after an internal investigation found that an inmate was assaulted with a baton at the Maximum Security Unit in Tucker.

At the request of the state, the FBI has now opened a civil-rights investigation regarding a May 29th incident at the Tucker unit.

Prison officials say the incident happened after 35-year-old inmate Terry Botts stabbed two other inmates with a homemade knife. Four jailers -- including a captain and lieutenant -- subdued Botts, but then began kicking and punching Botts.

Prisons spokeswoman Dina Tyler says six officers were fired last week -- the four involved in the beating and two who failed to report the beating or didn't tell the truth when questioned. Also, three officers were suspended and four other employees were given written warnings.

Botts is serving a 61-year sentence on theft, robbery, burglary and illegal possession of a firearm convictions. After the attack, he was treated at a Little Rock hospital for bruises and swelling to his face and nose. He's since been moved to the Varner Supermax unit.

In a separate incident, a state excessive-force investigation led to the resignation of Captain Eric Hobbs -- nephew of Correction Department Deputy Director Ray Hobbs. Eric Hobbs resigned Monday. Tyler says he would have faced disciplinary action had he not resigned.

The F-B-I last investigated excessive force at an Arkansas prison in 1998. Then, five officers were sentenced to federal prison terms for a series of inmate beatings -- including the use o a cattle prod -- at the Cummins unit.

FBI Files Shed No Light On Disappearance Of Civil Rights Pioneer (AP)

By Alan Scher Zagier

DOJ_NMG_0066871

COLUMBIA, Mo. - The disappearance of civil rights pioneer Lloyd Gaines nearly 70 years ago dominated headlines across the country, with amateur sleuths, activists and historians stumped over the fate of the black man who successfully sued to gain admission to the segregated University of Missouri law school.

Decades later, Gaines' few surviving family members had hoped to garner clues to the mystery from classified FBI files that can be released once a person is presumed dead.

But FBI records obtained by The Associated Press through the federal Freedom of Information Act show the agency didn't investigate the fate of Gaines, who was last seen leaving a Chicago boarding house in 1939.

An internal memo dated May 10, 1940, and signed by FBI director J. Edgar Hoover advises that bureau agents "are conducting no investigation in connection with this matter."

Thirty years later, Hoover responded to another inquiry from an unidentified member of the public with a similar reply.

"Although I would like to be of assistance in connection with your letter of May 7, the case you mentioned involving Lloyd Gaines was not within the investigative jurisdiction of the FBI," Hoover wrote on May 13, 1970.

George Gaines, the missing man's nephew, said the lack of information in the FBI files was disappointing but not surprising.

"Given the time that's elapsed and what (my) family has previously said, I wasn't expecting anything concrete," he said.

Gaines, a Mississippi native who grew up in St. Louis, was an honors graduate of historically black Lincoln University in Jefferson City. His initial inquiries to the state's flagship university in Columbia were received favorably. Those responses changed after university officials realized he was black.

Denied admission solely because of his skin color, Gaines sued. The U.S. Supreme Court sided with Gaines, ruling in 1938 that the state must either admit him or establish a separate law school for blacks.

Before the high court's decision, any black person in Missouri who wanted to attend law school or other professional schools at the graduate level was sent to neighboring states that accepted minorities, at Missouri's expense.

One of Gaines' attorneys from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was a young Thurgood Marshall, who would go on to argue the landmark Brown vs. Board of Education desegregation case in 1954 before spending 24 years as a Supreme Court justice.

Gaines never made it to Columbia. Discouraged by the state's response to the high court ruling - Missouri created a bare-bones law school for blacks in a former St. Louis beauty academy - he moved north and earned a master's degree in economics from the University of Michigan.

Gaines then spent several months shuttling between St. Louis, Kansas City and Chicago, struggling to earn a living while grappling with his notoriety. His jobs included working as a gas station attendant.

Gaines, who would be 95 if still alive, has not been seen since October 1939. Theories about his disappearance ranged from a violent ending at the hands of the Ku Klux Klan to a self-imposed exile in Mexico.

In recent months, Gaines' case has received renewed attention in Missouri. The university that denied him admission to its law school honored Gaines with a posthumous, honorary degree in May. And next week, the Missouri Bar will award Gaines an honorary law license at its annual meeting in St. Louis.

After the high court's ruling, Missouri lawmakers converted a ramshackle St. Louis beauty college into the Lincoln law school, a solution Marshall and the NAACP were poised to challenge.

When Gaines disappeared, they were forced to drop the case. It would be another decade before Missouri admitted a black student.

Museum Honors Emmett Till In Mississippi (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

GLENDORA, Miss. -- Photographs that captured a mother's grief and Emmett Till's mutilated body were on display as this tiny Mississippi Delta town opened a museum honoring the slain black teenager whose death was pivotal in the civil rights movement.

Among the items on display are family snapshots and a picture of Till's mutilated body that stunned the nation after the 14-year-old Chicago boy was brutally murdered in 1955, allegedly in retaliation for whistling at a white woman.

"I want the country to see this moment as an historic event of how far we have come in the civil rights movement and to open people's eyes to the many other injustices that have happened in other places besides the Delta," said Till's cousin, Priscilla Sterling.

The town converted a cotton gin into the Emmett Till Historic Intrepid Center, which includes oral histories, an audio-visual archive and a cotton gin fan like the one used to weigh down Till's body after it was dumped in the Tallahatchie River.

Two white men were acquitted in Till's case by an all-white jury. The two men later confessed in an interview with Look magazine.

The FBI reopended the case in 2004 but decided in March not to press charges. The case was turned over to District Attorney Joyce Chiles for possible state charges. She did not return a call seeking comment.

The boy's case has never been forgotten in more then half a century.

The National Conference of Black Mayors commissioned the Till center as a model of revitalization for other small towns.

The museum also has a space dedicated to Glendora native and legendary blues harmonica player Sonny Boy Williamson.

House Passes Bill To Make Voters Show ID (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, September 21, 2006

The House voted Wednesday to require Americans to show proof of citizenship in order to vote, and the Senate moved to build a 700-mile fence along the Mexican border as Republicans sharpened attacks on illegal immigration before the midterm elections.

The 228-196 House vote on a new photo ID plan and the Senate's consideration of the fence were both part of a get-tough policy on illegal immigrants that Republicans have embraced after Congress' failure to agree on broader legislation that would set a path for undocumented workers to attain citizenship.

House GOP leaders have insisted that tighter borders and tougher laws must precede more comprehensive immigration changes. The House passed the fence bill last week and plans votes Thursday on other enforcement measures: to increase penalties for people building tunnels under the border, make it easier to detain and deport immigrant gang members and criminals and clarify the ability of state and local authorities to detain illegal immigrants.

Republican sponsors of the voter identification bill said it was a commonsense way to stop fraud at the polls. People need photo IDs to board planes, buy alcohol or cash checks, said Rep. Vernon Ehlers, R-Mich., chairman of the House Administration Committee. "This is not a new concept."

"This is what Americans want," said Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., "They want safe borders and they want safe ballots."

But Democrats assailed the legislation, saying it could hurt minorities, the poor and the elderly — groups that tend to vote Democratic — who might have trouble producing a photo identification.

"This bill is tantamount to a 21st century poll tax," said Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer, D-Md. "It will disenfranchise large number of legal voters."

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., said he was initially denied a voter ID required under a Missouri state law because he doesn't have a driver's license and couldn't immediately produce a passport or birth certificate. His congressional ID card was not accepted.

A Missouri court earlier this month struck down the state law, and on Tuesday a state superior court judge in Georgia ruled that that state's law requiring a photo ID was an unconstitutional condition for voting.

The bill would require everyone to present a photo ID before voting in federal elections by 2008. By 2010 voters would have to have photo IDs that certified they were citizens. In response to criticism that this would be a burden for the poor, the bill stipulates that states must provide the identification cards free of charge to those who can't afford them.

The Senate, meanwhile, voted Wednesday to take up a bill to build a 700-mile fence along one-third of the U.S.-Mexico border.

Action on the fence, which could cost billions of dollars, comes four months after the Senate approved legislation that, along with tightening border security, created a guest worker program and outlined how people in the country illegally could work toward legal status and eventual citizenship.

President Bush has supported this broader approach, but it has met strong resistance in the House, where opponents have said it was tantamount to amnesty for illegal immigrants.

Bush, in an interview with CNN's Wolf Blitzer, said he would sign a fencebuilding bill as part of efforts to strengthen the border. But he added, "I would view this as an interim step. I don't view this as the final product. And I will keep urging people to have a comprehensive reform."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said, "While I've made it clear that I prefer a comprehensive solution, I have always said we need an enforcement-first approach to immigration reform."

Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada countered, "We can build the tallest fence in the world and it won't fix our broken immigration system." To do that, he said, "we need the kind of comprehensive reform that the Senate passed earlier this year."

The current bill wouldn't provide funding to cover costs of the fencing and other barriers aimed at preventing illegal entry. About $1 billion for the fencing is likely to be included in a bill for the Department of Homeland Security that Congress is expected to approve before its scheduled adjournment next week for the elections.

Also on Wednesday, a bipartisan task force recommended that Congress provide a path to legal status for immigrants who can demonstrate steady employment, knowledge of English and payment of taxes and who pass a background security check.

The panel, chaired by Spencer Abraham, former Republican senator from Michigan and energy secretary, and Lee Hamilton, former Democratic representative from Indiana and chair of the 9/11 Commission, also urged new verification mechanisms to assist employers in hiring only authorized workers.

House Passes Photo ID Bill (HILL)

By David Mikhail

The Hill, September 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066873

Amid heated partisan rhetoric, the House yesterday passed a controversial bill that would mandate the use of photo identification in federal elections, 228-196.

The legislation, which was introduced by Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), would require voters to provide government-issued photo IDs before voting in federal elections, amending the National Voter Registration Act of 1993 and the Help America Vote Act of 2002.

Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Calif.), ranking member of the House Administration Committee, said, "Those impacted by H.R.

4844 include the least among us - the elderly, disabled, the poor and ethnic minorities. And it would clearly have a disproportionate impact on women, and many students."

House Administration Committee Chairman Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.) stated,

"Every day millions of Americans show a picture ID to pay by check, board a plane, or buy alcohol or tobacco. Surely the sanctity of the ballot warrants as much protection as these other activities."

Only seven lawmakers crossed party lines on the vote, as Reps. Melissa Bean (D-Ill.), Jim Marshall (D-Ga.), Collin Peterson (D-Minn.), and Gene Taylor (D-Miss.) backed the bill and Reps. Charles Bass (R-N.H.), Jeb Bradley (R-N.H.), and Don Young (R-Alaska) voted against it.

House Bill To Require Voter ID (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

The House yesterday passed legislation that would require voters to show a valid photo identification in federal elections over the overwhelming objections of Democrats who compared the bill to segregation-era measures aimed at disenfranchising Southern blacks.

The Federal Election Integrity Act was approved on a nearly party-line 228-196 vote. Republicans backed the bill 224-3, with three nonvoters; Democrats opposed it 192-4, with five nonvoters. They were joined in opposition by the House's one independent member.

The bill, which faces an uncertain future in the Senate, is part of a Republican effort to complete before the November elections a package of proposals aimed at curbing illegal immigration and its effects on ordinary Americans.

The so-called "Voter ID" bill, aimed at stamping out voter fraud, would require voters in federal elections to provide picture identification by 2008 and provide proof of U.S. citizenship by 2010. It was among the recommendations made last year by the bipartisan Commission on Federal Election Reform, headed by former President Jimmy Carter, a Democrat, and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a Republican.

"Effective voter registration and voter identification are bedrocks of a modern election system," they wrote in their final report.

But Democrats, siding with groups that work on behalf of minorities and illegal aliens, called the bill a "modern-day poll tax" and said it would place an insurmountable burden on voters and infringe upon their voting rights.

Rep. Brian Bilbray, California Republican, countered that the real infringement upon voting rights would be allowing fraudulent votes by the dead or illegal "to cancel out legitimate votes."

"That is the violation of the Voters Rights Act that we have not addressed," he told colleagues before the vote.

Democrats, who have long demanded reforms to the federal voting process, yesterday dismissed Republican concerns about voter fraud.

"Show me the examples of the problem you're trying to solve," demanded Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat who accused Republicans of trying to appeal to the "fear and -- yes, perhaps -- the prejudices of people."

A Republican cited a study by Johns Hopkins University that found 1,500 dead people who had voted in recent elections. Mr. Hoyer belittled the study, saying no criminal convictions for voter fraud had been won in any of those cases.

Mr. Bilbray pointed out that such convictions might be obtained if proper identification were required.

"Voter fraud is not something you can come back to after the fraud is committed," he said. "The person who voted for those dead people is long gone by the time it comes up on the record."

Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite, Florida Republican, urged support of the bill because, she said, it would prevent illegal aliens from voting in U.S. elections.

"It's outrageous and inexcusable that voters do not have to show proof of citizenship in order to vote in an election," she said. "Illegal immigrants are populating this country at an unprecedented number, and it is unjust and unfair to citizens of this country that noncitizens should have a hand in electing federal officials."

Rep. Alcee L. Hastings, Florida Democrat, said he's more concerned about discouraging voters than he is about illegals voting.

"Nonparticipation in the election process is more of a problem in this country than noncitizens trying to vote," Mr. Hastings said.

Rep. John Lewis, Georgia Democrat, called the bill a "modern-day poll tax" and charged that the bill "is nothing less than voter suppression."

He also reminded the Republican chamber of its overwhelming support in July for renewing the Voting Rights Act, although many conservatives off Capitol Hill warned that portions of it are no longer necessary.

"Just three months ago, this body passed the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, admitting the sad fact that voter discrimination is still the reality," said Mr. Lewis, who said requiring identification at the polls is "an attack on the voting rights of millions of Americans."

Across the Capitol in the Senate, Democrats continued to slow-walk legislation approved by the House last week to construct 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border. The chamber voted yesterday 94-0 on a procedural motion to take up the bill.

Despite universal approval for taking up the legislation, Democratic leaders refused to grant "unanimous consent" agreements to speed up the process.

House Passes Bill To Make Voters Prove Citizenship (USAT)

USA Today, September 21, 2006

Voters would have to prove their citizenship before casting ballots under legislation the House of Representatives passed Wednesday. The measure passed 228-196. Republicans said it was needed to prevent vote fraud. Democrats called it a modern-day poll tax.

No action is likely in the Senate, so the legislation stands little chance of becoming law this year.

Republicans used the debate to highlight illegal immigration. They said that unless Congress passes a law requiring voters to prove citizenship, illegal immigrants' votes will cancel out those of legal voters. Americans “want safe borders, and they want safe ballots,” said Rep. John Mica, R-Fla. Democrats said that election fraud is scarce and that the GOP was trying to intimidate voters, particularly the poor, elderly, disabled or minorities who usually vote Democratic. Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., called it “an attack on the voting rights of millions of American citizens.”

Twenty-six states require some form of ID to vote. Florida, Georgia, Indiana and Missouri have laws requiring photo ID. Courts struck down the Georgia and Missouri statutes this month.

Air Force accelerates planto eliminate 40,000 jobs

The Air Force plans to cut 40,000 jobs by 2009, two years earlier than expected, a spokesman said. Capt. David Small said officials are determining the mix of active duty and Reserve positions to be eliminated. Air Force personnel costs have risen 51% over the past decade, though the number of personnel has been constant.

The cuts are part of a long-range Defense Department plan to reshape the military into a more agile force better able to fight terrorism, while preserving the ability to wage large conventional wars.

Court says Graham can't serve as judge and senator

A federal court ruled Wednesday that Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., cannot serve in Congress and as a military judge.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces said Graham violated the Constitution's Incompatibility Clause by serving as an Air Force Reserve colonel on the Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals. The clause prohibits members of Congress from also holding “an office of the United States,” specifically in the executive branch. The framers included the clause to avoid conflicts of interest.

In its decision, the court said a member of Congress “performing independent judicial functions runs afoul of the fundamental constitutional principle of separation of powers.”

Eugene Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice, said the decision bars Graham and any other member of Congress from the judicial bench but does not forbid lawmakers from serving in another military capacity. FAA official says nation's air-traffic control is safe

Several members of the House accused federal aviation regulators of allowing air-traffic staffing levels to slip to dangerous levels.

Spurred in part by the fatal crash of a Comair jet in Lexington, Ky., last month in which staffing has arisen as an issue, lawmakers at a House aviation subcommittee hearing peppered a top FAA official with questions about a recently imposed contract that reduces pay and changes work rules for air-traffic controllers.

“I believe that the FAA has to come to grips with some serious staffing issues,” Rep. Bill Pascrell, D-N.J., said.

The FAA has enough controllers to handle traffic and “safety is never compromised,” said Russ Chew, chief of the FAA's Air Traffic Organization.

Voter ID Bill Passes Split House (RC)

By Matthew Murray

Roll Call, September 21, 2006

House Republicans moved quickly Wednesday afternoon to downplay suggestions that a voter-identification measure was little more than a stalling tactic and an election-year stunt intended to capture law-and-order votes.

“This is what the majority does when they don’t want to bring legislation to the floor,” said Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Calif.) in a speech on the House floor. The Senate is not expected to act on the legislation, and Democrats complained that the move was made only in an attempt to stoke voters’ worries about illegal immigration.

In a vote split along party lines, the House passed the Federal Election Integrity Act, 228-196 Wednesday afternoon. The measure, sponsored by outgoing Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), would require voters to show government-issued photo identification to vote in federal elections beginning in 2008.

Some Republicans argued the proposed law would limit the incidence of voting by non-citizens, a fear stoked by recent claims that ineligible voters have gained access — whether inadvertently or not — to the rolls in some states.

Judges in Missouri and Georgia recently struck down laws requiring similar proof of citizenship.

"The requirement of a photo ID to vote is common sense, " said Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.) in a statement. "A photo ID is needed to get on a plane, buy alcohol, or get in an office building."

"Yet when it comes time to step into a voting booth," he added, "oftentimes you don't need a thing."

Democrats countered that it was little more than a modern-day poll tax intended to suppress votes and a requirement that potentially could backfire.

"Disenfranchisement is on peoples' minds," said Rep. Rush Holt (D-N.J.) "This would only add to that [and] deter people from voting."

Keep Away The Vote (NYT)

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

One of the cornerstones of the Republican Party's strategy for winning elections these days is voter suppression, intentionally putting up barriers between eligible voters and the ballot box. The House of Representatives took a shameful step in this direction yesterday, voting largely along party lines for onerous new voter ID requirements. Laws of this kind are unconstitutional, as an array of courts have already held, and profoundly undemocratic. The Senate should not go along with this cynical, un-American electoral strategy.

The bill the House passed yesterday would require people to show photo ID to vote in 2008. Starting in 2010, that photo ID would have to be something like a passport, or an enhanced kind of driver's license or non-driver's identification, containing proof of citizenship. This is a level of identification that many Americans simply do not have.

The bill was sold as a means of deterring vote fraud, but that is a phony argument. There is no evidence that a significant number of people are showing up at the polls pretending to be other people, or that a significant number of noncitizens are voting.

Noncitizens, particularly undocumented ones, are so wary of getting into trouble with the law that it is hard to imagine them showing up in any numbers and trying to vote. The real threat of voter fraud on a large scale lies with electronic voting, a threat Congress has refused to do anything about.

The actual reason for this bill is the political calculus that certain kinds of people — the poor, minorities, disabled people and the elderly — are less likely to have valid ID. They are less likely to have cars, and therefore to have drivers' licenses. There are ways for nondrivers to get special ID cards, but the bill's supporters know that many people will not go to the effort if they don't need them to drive.

If this bill passed the Senate and became law, the electorate would likely become more middle-aged, whiter and richer — and, its sponsors are anticipating, more Republican.

Court after court has held that voter ID laws of this kind are unconstitutional. This week, yet another judge in Georgia struck down that state's voter ID law.

Last week, a judge in Missouri held its voter ID law to be unconstitutional. Supporters of the House bill are no doubt hoping that they may get lucky, and that the current conservative Supreme Court might uphold their plan.

America has a proud tradition of opening up the franchise to new groups, notably women and blacks, who were once denied it. It is disgraceful that, for partisan political reasons, some people are trying to reverse the tide, and standing in the way of people who have every right to vote.

Election Officials Seek Out Data Cards (WP)

By Rosalind S. Helderman And Eric Rich, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

Pr. George's Looks For Missing Votes 1 Machine at a Time

In a cavernous warehouse in Upper Marlboro, the Prince George's County Board of Elections cracked open voting machines yesterday in search of dozens of data cards filled with still uncounted votes from the Sept. 12 primary election.

They acknowledged that the memory cards from each of more than 2,000 voting machines used at the county's 206 polling stations should have been delivered by election workers to a central office shortly after voting concluded Sept. 12.

Instead, in the days since then, supervisors discovered that nearly four dozen cards -- holding potentially hundreds or more votes -- had not yet been uploaded into a central server.

Although unlikely in the major contests, those votes and thousands of provisional ballots still being counted created the mathematical possibility -- tantalizing to candidates who came up short in close races -- that outcomes could shift.

Some cards were left locked in voting machines for days. Others arrived at the voting office but were overlooked and left in sealed bags, along with other cards that had been counted, officials said.

Board of Elections members gathered yesterday alongside carts stacked with thousands of the suitcase-like plastic machines to hunt down each missing card.

With fanfare, board attorney Robert G. McGinley called out the first precinct from which votes were missing: "02-05, Rogers Heights Elementary School, machine 4!"

Then, a technician stepped forward and unlocked a padlock holding a cord in place on a cart of machines. He lifted machine 4 onto a table, withdrew a key from his pocket and unlocked a small lock.

Next, he took pliers and snipped a plastic seal. Carefully opening the box, the group edged in to examine a piece of tape affixed across the data card.

"Card found!" McGinley called out.

The find was a victory, but not the kind supporters of the voting machines anticipated when they promoted the equipment as a way to get instantaneous tallies.

"Needless to say, this is not a fast process," board Vice President Carl R. Ruble said after the group had successfully uploaded two cards in 45 minutes.

Robert J. Antonetti Sr., the interim elections administrator, said that in all, officials think they began the day in search of 47 data cards from 26 precincts. By the end of the day, they had located 13 cards from eight precincts. He promised to start the process again this morning.

District 4 congressional candidate Donna Edwards, who trails Rep. Albert R. Wynn (D), has complained vigorously about problems voting and counting ballots in Prince George's and Montgomery County.

She has been especially critical of the missing cards. She trails Wynn by about 3,000 votes and said she won't concede until all the votes are counted.

County executive candidate Rushern L. Baker III (D) yesterday wrote to the U.S. Justice Department and State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey (D) and demanded an investigation into voting problems.

Antonetti insisted that all the cards have remained secure and that it's not unusual for some to trickle in before the election results must be formally certified.

Board President S. John di Stefano blamed human error for the fact that so many cards did not show up promptly at the election office.

"It happens," he said. "We give [workers] training. We're going to repeat the training" before the November general election.

A variety of problems slowed the process yesterday. Workers opened the third machine, from Eugene Burroughs Middle School in Accokeek, but the card was nowhere to be found. They called over an employee from Diebold Inc., which makes the machine, to help extract the information from the machine's hard drive.

He spoke quietly to the gathered board members. "Speak up," one instructed him, gesturing to reporters and candidates sitting 20 feet away and straining to hear.

"I can't speak to the press," he said, before continuing his mumbled instructions.

After several tries, they figured out how to burn the data onto a new card and upload the votes.

ANTITRUST:

Lawmakers Worry Smithfield Deal Is Bad For Farmers (SFAL)

By Kevin Dobbs And Terry Woster, Argus Leader

Sioux Falls (SD) Argus Leader, September 21, 2006

Smithfield Foods Inc., the parent of John Morrell & Co. in Sioux Falls, is rushing the consolidation of the pork industry and hastening the demise of small hog producers, agriculture groups and several farm-state senators say.

Lawmakers from South Dakota, Iowa and Nebraska worry that Smithfield, the nation's largest pork producer and processor, will squeeze out small farmers when it completes its acquisition of Premium Standard Farms Inc., the nation's No. 2 hog producer and No. 6 pork processor.

Smithfield announced this week it would buy its rival for about $650 million in cash and stock. The deal is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007. If it does, Smithfield will own a fifth of the nation's hogs. That could limit independent producers' options and ability to get good prices for their meat, some critics say.

National Farmers Union President Tom Buis said the "deal perpetuates the consolidation and concentration of the meat industry" and "all but guarantees independent producers will be left without a market."

Sen. John Thune, R-S.D., said today the deal deserves "careful scrutiny" by federal regulators because it "presents some real risks for our producers."

Analysts correctly predicted the move would raise antitrust concerns because it punctuates a trend among big meat companies to vertically integrate by slaughtering their own hogs rather than buying from independent farmers.

DOJ_NMG_0066877

Meatpackers such as Virginia-based Smithfield say the strategy protects them against fluctuating commodity prices. Smithfield in fact reported last month disappointing first-quarter earnings results — a 50 percent drop from the previous year — that it blamed on a dip in revenue from pork production operations.

Small farmers and the lawmakers they've elected counter that the vertical integration movement threatens farm-state economies. Smithfield gets the majority of its hogs from independent producers, including at its Morrell operations in South Dakota and Iowa.

But when it acquires Premium Standard that could change. The Kansas City, Mo.-based company is a vertical integration leader. It has the capacity to slaughter about 4.6 million hogs every year, and according to the Wall Street Journal, the company owns most of the hogs it kills.

With those hogs under the Smithfield umbrella, it will be able to produce more than half of the pigs it slaughters.

Charlie Johnson, who raises hogs near Madison, said the move continues an ongoing and troubling trend.

"I'm not losing much sleep over this one. The horse has already gone out the barn door," Johnson said. "You're talking about two entities that never should have been allowed to get that big in the first place.

"They've been a menace to this state and the upper Midwest for the last 10 years," he said.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, and Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, asked the U.S. Department of Justice to investigate the proposed merger. They worry about too much concentration of power within the meat industry, which could hurt independent farmers by reducing the number of places they can sell their hogs and eventually raise food prices for consumers.

All of that should trigger antitrust concerns, they say.

Approval For Smithfield Won't Be Easy (DPHR)

By Chris Flores, Daily Press

Newport News (VA) Daily Press, September 21, 2006

Smithfield must pay up if it can't get past federal anti-trust regulators.

SMITHFIELD -- If the Smithfield Foods acquisition of Premium Standard Farms is denied by federal regulators, Smithfield will be required to pay $100 million to Premium.

The risk of the deal falling through is impossible to gauge, but the Smithfield purchase will draw scrutiny by the Department of Justice. Farm state senators, who have raised antitrust concerns in the past about Smithfield, are already speaking out against the deal.

Smithfield is the largest processor of hogs, with 26 percent of the market, and the company will have 31 percent once the deal is done. It will raise about 20 percent of the hogs nationwide. This concerns independent hog producers and politicians, who claim the deal will give Smithfield the ability to determine hog prices.

Smithfield, the world's largest processor and producer of hogs, paid $674 million for Premium. Kansas City-based Premium was the second largest producer and sixth-largest processor. Some analysts have speculated that the deal might have a hard time getting anti-trust approval.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, immediately fired off a letter to the Justice Department, asking it to "carefully scrutinize" the deal. Grassley, a longtime Smithfield foe, says the concentration of ownership hurts family farmers and independent farms that raise hogs in Iowa.

Fellow Iowa Senator Tom Harkin introduced a bill earlier this year to provide protections for independent livestock producers. Harkin has also-co-sponsored a bill that takes on Smithfield's vertical integration business model of owning, slaughtering and packaging animals.

Social Whirl Facebook, Riding A Web Trend, Flirts With A Big-Money Deal (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney, Rebecca Buckman And Robert A. Guth

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

As Big Companies Pursue Networking Sites, Start-Up Is in Talks With Yahoo Youthful Audience Is Fickle

One popular use of social-networking site Facebook.com is to flirt with other members. As it happens, Facebook Inc., the start-up company behind the Web site, has been doing some serious flirting of its own.

People familiar with the matter say the company has held separate acquisition talks with Yahoo Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Viacom Inc. over the past year. Now, say some of these people, the start-up is in serious discussions -- again -- to sell itself to Yahoo for an amount that could approach $1 billion.

Behind the pursuit of Facebook is a high-stakes battle by big technology companies to extend their influence on the Internet. Sites like Facebook and rival MySpace have become the Web hangouts for a coveted market: young people. They gather there in large numbers to create Web pages with their own profiles and musings, look for friends, pick up strangers and send messages to each other.

Suddenly, social-networking sites, as they are called, are starting to look like the latest incarnation of the Internet's Holy Grail: an entry point onto the Web, where an owner can sell access to all the consumers that come there. In past years, that search has taken investors and marketers to Web browsers, to "portals" such as Yahoo that assemble a wide array of Web services and to search engines such as Google Inc. (See related article1.)

Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. bought MySpace last year for $650 million and quickly set about turning it into a cash machine. The Murdoch empire now uses MySpace to promote music, movies, soft drinks and books, helped by features including video downloads and instant messaging. In August, Google guaranteed MySpace and some other News Corp. sites a minimum of $900 million in ad revenue over the next three and a half years.

The danger of building a business around networking sites -- which also include Friendster, Bebo and myriad smaller players -- is the fickle nature of their consumers. As the Internet has sped up the life cycle of success and failure, it is possible some of these sites will flame out as their young devotees flock to the next thing.

Two and a half years ago, Facebook was a college project run by an undergraduate. Today, in an echo of the 1990s technology boom, it is being chased by large companies with their wallets wide open.

During one series of talks with Microsoft, Facebook executives told their Microsoft peers they couldn't do an 8 a.m. conference call because the company's 22-year-old founder and chief executive, Harvard dropout Mark Zuckerberg, wouldn't be awake, says a person familiar with the talks. Microsoft executives were incredulous.

In an interview, Mr. Zuckerberg declines to comment on any talks. The young entrepreneur says he generally works late -- he recalls eating French fries recently in the parking lot of a local McDonald's restaurant at 3 a.m. -- and doesn't get to work early. "I'm in the office at 10:30 a.m. sometimes," he says.

These days, Facebook is wrestling with whether to sell or stay an independent concern. People familiar with the matter say some Facebook executives have considered following the example of Google, which countered critics and acquirers by going it alone. In the process it became a publicly traded juggernaut with a market capitalization of $120 billion.

"I would never say that at no point in the future would we go public or become part of a larger company...but what I would say is, it's not our priority," Mr. Zuckerberg says. "There's so much more to do here." People familiar with the matter say Mr. Zuckerberg holds a roughly 30% stake in the closely held Palo Alto, Calif., start-up business.

At some point, the venture capitalists who funded Facebook will want to see some return on their investment. Jim Breyer, partner at Accel Partners, says he and his firm invested around $13 million in Facebook in 2005. "Clearly we have had significant strategic discussions that have covered everything from outright acquisition to major strategic partnerships," he said. Mr. Breyer says his main focus is turning Facebook into a "major standalone business."

Based on online ad sales, Facebook will likely soon top $100 million in annual revenue, say people familiar with the matter. That is a level now considered the minimum for a high-technology initial public offering in today's difficult Wall Street environment for small-stock offerings.

Facebook may have a limited window of opportunity, having built much of its business on young, Internet-savvy students who could in time switch to using rival sites.

The company recently encountered the fickleness of its world when it rolled out features that enabled users to keep track of their friends' activities on the site. Hundreds of thousands of members joined groups protesting what they saw as a privacy invasion. Facebook added some privacy protections, but Mr. Zuckerberg concedes the company "did a very bad job of communicating" details about the original features to users.

Facebook originally limited membership to college students, later inviting high-school students and people who work for certain companies and organizations. Now, Facebook plans to allow anyone with a valid email address to join.

Some teenagers who once embraced social networking have started to shun such sites, saying they have become too popular and commercial. "It's like a bad party, where you've got too many people talking too loud and you can't enjoy yourself," says Carlo Montagnino, a 22-year-old living New York who killed his MySpace profile this summer. Mr. Montagnino says he was sick of reading the innermost thoughts of his 500 online "friends."

"I don't care about the food they ate that day, I don't care about the new poem they wrote, or the pictures of their birthday party," he says.

Facebook says its site is so integral to the lives of college students and others that it has become more like a service such as email, instead of merely a place to chat about parties and find dates.

Mr. Zuckerberg started Facebook while still a Harvard University student in February 2004. The native of Dobbs Ferry, N.Y., intended the site to assume some of the functions of printed "facebooks" with students' photos and contact information. Mr. Zuckerberg added features enabling students to customize their pages and communicate with each other. Members can "poke" each other, a message sent from one user to another that is sometimes considered a form of flirting.

Facebook quickly spread to other universities. By early 2005, the site had 1.6 million monthly U.S. visitors, a number that soared to nearly nine million last month, according to research firm NetRatings Inc. Facebook users spent an average of more than one hour a month on the site in August, a long time by Internet standards and more than double what they spent a year earlier.

As Facebook's popularity swelled, Mr. Zuckerberg, who wears Adidas sandals to work many days, dropped out of Harvard after his sophomore year and moved to Palo Alto. The former computer-science and psychology major quickly set a brash tone, joking with colleagues about Facebook's goal of "world domination" and once distributed business cards that read, "I'm CEO...bitch." A Facebook spokeswoman says the cards were a joke.

News Corp.'s July 2005 announcement that it was buying MySpace raised Facebook's profile among Internet and media industry deal makers. Yahoo, of Sunnyvale, Calif., for one, began negotiating to take a minority stake in Facebook, with a deal that would have given the start-up company a $750 million valuation, according to a person familiar with the matter. The deal never worked out.

Facebook entered discussions with Viacom, of New York, in early 2006 to be acquired for a total that could have exceeded $1 billion if Facebook reached certain targets, say people familiar with the matter. The talks broke down over valuation and other disagreements, according to those people.

Yahoo, meanwhile, continued to pursue its Facebook aspirations. The Web company has roughly 500 million users world-wide but largely missed the boom in social-networking sites.

Around March, Yahoo was weighing a roughly $1 billion offer, according to people familiar with the matter. Facebook's Mr. Zuckerberg met with executives at Yahoo's headquarters in late March to discuss a possible deal.

At one point in the Yahoo negotiations, the talks extended into the weekend, says a person familiar with the matter. Mr. Zuckerberg, this account continues, said he couldn't take part because his girlfriend was in town. Others pointed out they were closing in on a billion-dollar deal. Mr. Zuckerberg said it didn't matter: his cellphone would be off, this person says.

Mr. Zuckerberg says he doesn't "remember anything like that." He adds: "I have a girlfriend; when I'm hanging out with her I tend to not be that engaged."

In April, Facebook announced $25 million in a third round of financing. That valued the company at around $500 million, according to a person familiar with the matter.

Microsoft soon got word that Facebook had suitors and contacted the company, says a person familiar with the matter. Microsoft Senior Vice President Hank Vigil was one of the main drivers behind starting acquisition talks. After several weeks the talks faltered, largely because Facebook told Microsoft it wanted $2 billion, according to one version of events, a number that had been touted by some investors. That was too rich for Microsoft, which was thinking of a figure in the hundreds of millions of dollars, say people familiar with the talks.

Microsoft also faced internal challenges. The talks with Facebook were being driven by Mr. Vigil and the corporate mergers-and-acquisitions team, not its MSN online business. Without full backing of the online group, Microsoft couldn't justify a deal, say people familiar with the talks.

In July, Yahoo formally offered roughly $1 billion for Facebook, say people familiar with the matter. Shortly after, a new batch of traffic numbers for Facebook indicated the site wasn't growing as quickly as Yahoo had expected. At the same time, Yahoo stock fell sharply after it announced a delay in a key corporate initiative. The company dropped its offer closer to $800 million, say people familiar with the talks, which Facebook rejected.

Facebook's whipsawing series of talks took another turn in August when Google announced it had agreed to broker ads for MySpace and other News Corp. sites. The size of the guaranteed revenue spurred Facebook executives to put any acquisition talks aside and pursue a similar deal, first with Google, then with Microsoft. The deal with Microsoft was signed and sealed in less than a week. Microsoft has promised to deliver ads valued at a minimum of $200 million over three years, according to one person familiar with the deal.

Although it has joined forces with Microsoft, Facebook signaled to Yahoo that the advertising deal didn't preclude further acquisition talks, according to people familiar with the matter. The discussions are at an advanced stage, although it appears the two sides still differ about valuation. If a deal goes through, Yahoo could use Facebook to boost advertising revenue and pitch Yahoo services -- which range from email to music and online dating -- to Facebook's young member base.

Mr. Zuckerberg says he isn't focused on making money or using his position at Facebook to become a media tycoon. Still, he has met media luminaries such as Donald Graham, the chairman and chief executive officer of Washington Post Co.

"I do feel like I share a lot of values with folks like Don. He's very into building a long-term business and focusing on that," Mr. Zuckerberg says. He describes Mr. Graham as "a bit of a mentor."

Doctors' Group Sues Two Insurers, Charging Unfair Coercion (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

The statewide trade group for doctors in New York has filed a class action lawsuit against one of the state's largest insurers, Oxford Health Plans, and its parent company, UnitedHealth Group, accusing them of illegally coercing doctors to do more business with them.

UnitedHealth Group, an insurance giant based in Minnesota, had a small presence in New York until 2004, when it bought Oxford. Last year, Oxford and United told thousands of doctors in New York that if they wanted to stay in or join one of the two insurers' networks, they had to be in both.

The suit, filed on Tuesday in State Supreme Court in Manhattan, says that that requirement violates state antitrust law and laws against unfair and deceptive trade practices. The plaintiffs are the Medical Society of the State of New York and several individual doctors practicing in New York City and on Long Island.

They say that Oxford and United's new rules, known as an "all-products" requirement, force doctors to do business with an insurer they dislike — because its payments are low, its paperwork is cumbersome or it does not cover some services — or risk losing many of their patients. And in many cases, they contend, Oxford and United have breached contracts with doctors.

"This is the first time the Medical Society has brought a lawsuit expressly challenging an all-products provision," said Donald R. Moy, the group's general counsel.

"Some other insurers have similar practices, but this is the most egregious one," Mr. Moy said.

In an exchange of e-mail messages, Maria Gordon Shydlo, a spokeswoman for Oxford and United — which still operate under separate names — said that the new system had improved customer service.

She said it had added 6,600 doctors to United's provider network in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut and 3,800 doctors to Oxford's network, while fewer than 1 percent of the combined companies' providers had dropped out rather than accept the new requirement.

"Our customers and employer groups now have had access to a broader network of physicians and providers on an in-network basis," she said. But she did not address the allegations that the companies had violated state law or that they had breached contracts.

In part, the suit reflects doctors' frustration with the growing power of a handful of insurers, fueled by a series of mergers that has left consumers with fewer choices. Empire Blue Cross Blue Shield, the largest health insurer in New York, was taken over this year by WellPoint, the largest in the country; Oxford became part of United, the nation's second-largest; GHI and HIP plan to merge; and there have been several takeovers of small insurers by larger ones.

But the complaint is also the latest in a string of accusations by hospitals, doctors, patients and state regulators in New York, who say that Oxford and United subject doctors and hospitals to harsher and more unfair practices than other insurers.

In 2000, the Medical Society filed suits against several insurers, charging them with unethical practices in their dealings with doctors. Most of those were consolidated in federal court with similar cases filed by doctors' groups in other states.

Most of the major insurers settled and agreed to change some practices; United has not settled. Mr. Moy said the society's only other significant continuing suit against an insurer was also against United, challenging its definitions of "usual and customary" charges for medical care.

Legal Dueling Over Web Site Domain (LVS)

Harrah's wants WSOP.com for poker series

In 2004, Harrah's acquired the venerable Binion's Horseshoe casino downtown in large part, company executives said at the time, so the company could cash in on Binion's increasingly popular World Series of Poker, or WSOP for short.

But that plan has hit a snag, Harrah's claims in a lawsuit filed last week in U.S. District Court in Las Vegas against Binion's former information technology director, Federico Schiavio.

One year before the sale of Binion's, Harrah's claims, Schiavio registered the domain name for an Internet site called WSOP.com. Since then, Schiavio has used the site to divert Web traffic to an online gambling site called All In Poker, Harrah's claims. More recently, it appears WSOP.com is in the process of designing its own gambling site.

Harrah's has no control over that Web site and receives no profits from it - a problem it's anxious to fix.

The casino giant claims it owns the trademark on the name "World Series of Poker," and that it has applied for a patent on the name "WSOP" as well, so Schiavio's Web site should be passed over to Harrah's.

Schiavio is attempting to create an association between his Web site and the World Series of Poker where none exists, Harrah's claims. The company says Schiavio "is attempting to frustrate or divert Internet traffic intended for Harrah's."

What's more, the company says Schiavio's Web site is promoting Internet gambling.

"Schiavio's use of the WSOP mark in connection (with) the domain name WSOP.com is intended to trade off Harrah's goodwill and reputation and deceive people into thinking Internet gambling is acceptable," the suit claims.

Harrah's 13-page lawsuit includes claims of trademark infringement, "cybersquatting" and unfair trade practices. The company is asking that Schiavio be prohibited from using the WSOP trademark; that the WSOP.com domain name be transferred to them, and that they be awarded damages.

Harrah's also notes that the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office suspended examination of its applications to trademark the acronym "WSOP" because of Schiavio's similar application - and is asking that the court order the federal trademark office to reject Schiavio's application and approve Harrah's.

DOJ_NMG_0066881

The legal dispute has been ongoing virtually since Harrah's Entertainment Group and MTR Gaming Group purchased Binion's on March 10, 2004. Thirteen days later, after receiving a "cease and desist" letter that Harrah's had sent him, Schiavio changed the content of the WSOP.com site to make it seem less directly affiliated with the World Series of Poker, the lawsuit contends.

Schiavio's site now reads: "WSOP.com: World's Standard of Online Poker."

According to the site, its operators are in the process of developing "the most exciting concept in online multiplayer poker ¦ We will soon be starting an online poker room with a unique selling proposition geared toward rewarding professional poker players, keen amateurs and other players for whom poker is becoming their favorite online activity."

On May 30 of this year, Harrah's filed a complaint with the National Arbitration Forum, asking it to resolve the dispute. A three-judge panel with the forum dismissed Harrah's complaint, finding last month that it would be inappropriate for it to decide while the trademark office was weighing Schiavio's "WSOP" trademark application.

Schiavio could not be reached for comment, and his attorney in the arbitration, Darren Rimer of Laguna Niguel, Calif., did not return a phone call.

According to the suit, Schiavio got the idea to use the WSOP.com domain name while working for the Horseshoe Club Operation Co., owner of Binion's, as a consultant from 1999 to 2004.

Though Binion's no longer holds the World Series - Harrah's hosts the annual event at its Rio Hotel and Suites - Binion's still hosts live poker games.

But Binion's has not done well since MTR Gaming Group took over the management of the casino from Harrah's Entertainment in March 2005. The Sun reported in April that in MTR's latest earnings report, Binion's posted a net loss of $702,000 last year, compared with a profit of $934,000 in 2004. Regulators Probe Paper Mill Deal (AP-YBIZ)

European Union Regulators Probe U.S. Company's Deal for British Mill

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- European Union antitrust regulators opened an in-depth probe into U.S. paper maker Glatfelter's plans to buy a British paper mill, saying Wednesday it believed the deal could create a monopoly supplier with the power to fix prices for tea bags and coffee filter paper.

The European Commission said its initial investigation found that P.H. Glatfelter Co., based in York, Pa., would control a very high market share for coffee filters and tea bags if it bought a paper mill at Lydney in western England from J.R. Crompton Ltd.

"The only remaining competitors, Ahlstrom and Purico, have only limited production capacity," it said. "Although the proposed transaction affects a niche market, annual sales in the European economic area of tea and coffee filtration papers alone amount to around 145 million euros ($183 million)."

British fiber producer Crompton was placed in court-ordered administration in February as part of British insolvency proceedings. It is the leading manufacturer of specialty papers for tea and coffee filters with three paper mills in Britain selling to customers all over the world.

The Lydney plant makes wetlaid fibre, which is also used for wall paper, adhesive tapes and battery components.

EU officials have until Feb. 6 to decide whether to block or clear the deal. It can also ask the companies to sell assets or change the way they do business in future to try and solve antitrust problems. Although it has the power to block mergers and acquisitions, it rarely does so.

Both companies' sales are lower than the threshold for the EU to get involved -- it usually decides on deals where both companies make more than 250 million euros ($316 million) in Europe -- but the commission said both the German antitrust authority, the Bundeskartellamt, and Britain had asked it to investigate this case.

Hospira To Buy Mayne Pharma For $2 Billion (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman And Thomas M. Burton

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

Hospira Inc. agreed to acquire Australian generic-pharmaceuticals maker Mayne Pharma Ltd. for about $2 billion, the companies said.

The deal is the largest corporate move yet for the two-and-a-half-year-old Hospira, which is a hospital-products spinoff of health-care giant Abbott Laboratories. Hospira has a big business in injectable pharmaceuticals, which package medications in prefilled syringes while also creating vials of medicine used in standard doctor's needles.

It also makes and sells products such as intravenous drug-delivery equipment and patient-controlled drugs for pain management.

Melbourne-based Mayne is a world leader in generic injectable pharmaceuticals, with its strongest presence in cancer treatments. Last year, the company registered sales of about $517 million, an increase of more than one-third from the previous year.

Hospira is expected to pay a 32% premium to where Mayne's shares closed on Sept. 18, marking a total price of about $2 billion. That figure represents about one-third of Hospira's overall market capitalization, making the deal a significant step for the Lake Forest, Ill., company. The company plans to finance the purchase almost entirely with new debt.

Prior to this transaction, Hospira has been weighted heavily toward domestic sales. In 2005, for instance, U.S. sales made up 83% of the business, with international sales constituting the other 17%.

The company said it hopes to create annual savings of at least $50 million by 2008 and predicted the deal would add to earnings in 2007.

But its measure of earnings accretion excludes transaction-related costs and the amortization of intangible assets. As measured by more rigorous generally accepted accounting principles, the deal won't add to earnings during 2008, Hospira said.

The market hasn't been favorable to Hospira this year. Since January, its shares have declined 14%, while an index of other health-care-equipment makers fell 5%.

Morgan Stanley and law firm Baker & McKenzie advised Hospira. Merrill Lynch & Co. and law firm Clayton Utz advised Mayne.

Aalberts, 29 Other Companies Fined EU314.7 Million (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, September 21, 2006

Sept. 20 (Bloomberg) -- Aalberts Industries NV, Europe's largest maker of water and gas fittings, and 29 other companies were fined a total of 314.7 million euros ($399 million) for colluding to fix prices for copper fittings used in plumbing and heating. Aalberts shares fell as much as 12 percent.

Aalberts was fined 100.8 million euros, the European Commission, the EU's antitrust authority, said in a statement today. In addition, IMI Plc was fined 48.3 million euros, Delta Plc 28.3 million euros and Tomkins Plc 5.3 million euros.

The fines are the third time since 2003 that the commission has penalized companies in the copper tube industry. In this case, four of the 11 groups fined, including Aalberts and Delta, had penalties increased by 60 percent because they continued their illegal activity after the commission started its probe.

``We will not tolerate cartels and will take all measures to stamp them out," EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in the statement. ``We will not only punish firms severely for cartel behavior, but also increase the fines for flagrantly continuing after a commission dawn raid and for providing wrong or misleading information."

Aalberts shares fell 7.25 euros, or 12 percent, to 55.40 euros as of 1:07 p.m. in Amsterdam. That's the biggest one-day decline since February 1991. Marja Bouw, a spokeswoman for Langbroek, Netherlands-based Aalberts, said the company would appeal the fine.

Net Income

The EU fine is almost double the company's first half net income of 51 million euros. In August, the company said profit rose 34 percent, boosted by acquisitions as the company charged more for its products.

Stephanie Badjonat, a spokeswoman for Birmingham, England- based IMI, said the company had no immediate comment. Robin Walker, a spokesperson for London-based Tomkins, also said the company had no immediate comment. Calls to Delta Plc Chief Executive Officer Todd Atkinson weren't immediately returned.

Shares of Tomkins fell 5.5 pence, or 2.2 percent, to 235.5 pence in London. Shares of IMI rose 2.5 pence to 492 pence in London trading.

Mueller Industries

Memphis-based Mueller Industries Inc. got full immunity from fines because it alerted EU authorities about the illegal price- fixing in January 2001.

Mueller ``took the lead in bringing these issues to the attention" of the commission ``and has fully cooperated in the investigation from its inception," Mueller said in a July 28 filing to the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

Mueller and its subsidiaries were also granted full immunity in September 2004 when the commission fined seven companies, including IMI, 222.3 million euros for fixing prices for copper plumbing tubes used for water and heating.

The commission's investigation of the copper-tube business also led to 79 million euros in fines against three companies in December 2003.

The highest cartel penalties were in 2001 when the commission imposed 1.83 billion euros in fines, including 790 million euros against a vitamin price-fixing conspiracy.

Software Makers Complain To EU Over Microsoft's New Vista System (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066883

BRUSSELS -- Two U.S. software makers are lobbying European Union regulators for action against Microsoft Corp.'s next-generation Windows computer operating system, slated for release to corporate customers in November.

Adobe Systems Inc. of San Jose, Calif., has told regulators that Microsoft should be prohibited from building free competing software for reading and creating electronic documents into the operating system, called Vista, according to people familiar with the situation.

Meanwhile, officials from antivirus-software maker Symantec Corp. plan to travel to Brussels next week to brief journalists about Vista features that the Cupertino, Calif., company has told EU regulators will undercut rival computer-security-software makers. The briefings are intended to combat a similar public-relations effort by Microsoft, said a Symantec spokesman, Cris Paden.

At a Sept. 12 briefing, Erich Andersen, Microsoft's general counsel for Europe, said any regulatory action requiring changes in Vista's design could "increase security risks for European consumers" by making them more vulnerable to malicious attacks through the Internet, something that Symantec contests.

EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes has warned Microsoft not to design the new version of Windows, which runs more than 90% of the world's personal computers, in ways that would put rival software companies at a competitive disadvantage. The EU fined Microsoft €497 million, or more than $600 million, for antitrust violations related to its earlier versions of Windows in 2004. In July, Ms. Kroes imposed an additional penalty of €280.5 million against Microsoft for defying orders to change its business practices. The company is appealing both fines.

"Our goal is to deliver a fully innovative, secure version of Windows Vista that is compliant with EU law," said Tom Brookes, a spokesman for Microsoft, based in Redmond, Wash. However, Adobe and Symantec have told EU regulators that Vista has put them squarely in Microsoft's cross hairs.

Symantec is concerned that Vista will direct consumers toward a Microsoft-designed security console, or box that shows what level various security functions, such as an Internet firewall, are set on. The rival company wants to be able automatically to override the Microsoft template with its own design and features, as it has been allowed to do in the past.

Also, Microsoft has a new feature, called PatchGuard, designed to protect the core of its operating system from hacking. But Symantec's Mr. Paden said the design has been changed from previous Windows versions to prevent security-software companies from accessing this crucial part of the system to update computers against security threats.

Adobe is objecting to Microsoft's inclusion in Vista of its own software for creating and viewing digital snapshots of documents, known as XML Paper Specification, or XPS. XPS competes with Adobe's widely used portable document format, or PDF.

While Adobe earns money by selling its Acrobat software to create PDF documents (while giving away the software to read such documents), Microsoft will include both reading and writing software as part of Vista for no extra charge. That could erode Adobe's sales. An Adobe spokeswoman declined to comment.

Microsoft Chief Executive Steve Ballmer wrote to Ms. Kroes in the spring and asked if she wanted Microsoft to remove its XPS electronic-document software from Vista, said Mr. Brookes, the Microsoft spokesman. Ms. Kroes didn't respond, Mr. Brookes added.

A spokesman for Ms. Kroes, Jonathan Todd, said: "The commission has been giving guidance to Microsoft for over a year. But ultimately it is for Microsoft to decide how they package and sell Vista." He added that regulators could take no action until Vista was on the market.

White House Outlines Global Warming Fight (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

The Bush administration yesterday laid out a long-term "strategic plan" for using technology to curb the impact of global warming, reiterating its position that basic scientific research and voluntary actions can curb greenhouse gases linked to climate change.

Addressing complaints by environmentalists and some scientists that Bush has not done enough to cut the nation's emissions of such gases, Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman said the 244-page "Climate Change Technology Program Strategic Plan" promotes initiatives such as sequestering carbon dioxide before it enters the atmosphere and promoting hydrogen-powered cars.

"This plan was inspired by the President's vision to harness America's strengths in innovation and technology to transform energy production and use in ways that significantly reduce greenhouse gas emissions over the long term," Bodman said in a statement. "This strategic plan is unprecedented in its scope and scale and breaks new ground with its visionary 100-year planning horizon, global perspective, multilateral research collaborations, and public-private partnerships."

Energy Department officials described the plan -- which has taken four years to produce -- before the House Science subcommittee on energy yesterday. It immediately came under fire from senior Hill Republicans as well as several outside scientists and policy experts.

"It's good as far as it goes, but it needs to go a lot further," House Science Committee Chairman Sherwood L. Boehlert (R-N.Y.) said in an interview after the hearing. "It's good to look ahead, but people expect something immediate, as well as futuristic."

DOJ_NMG_0066884

House Government Reform Committee Chairman Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who has scheduled a hearing today on climate change research, said the administration failed to spell out how future research will be funded.

"They address the need for research but give a very convoluted answer as to how that's going to occur," Davis said in an interview. "What we're asking is, is this sufficient? You've got to have some teeth and focus."

In the document, the administration said it spends $3 billion a year on the research.

But Ken Caldeira, a senior scientist at the Carnegie Institution at Stanford University, said the country would have to spend "hundreds of billions of dollars a year" to move away from a carbon-dependent economy. He added that the government would have to regulate carbon dioxide emissions, either through a tax or cap-and-trade system, to create incentives to develop and implement cleaner technologies.

"Most energy technologies that do not emit carbon dioxide to the atmosphere will cost more than those that do emit carbon dioxide to the atmosphere," Caldeira said. "A major energy R&D program only makes sense in the context of a price on carbon emissions."

Rafe Pomerance, who chairs the bipartisan Climate Policy Center, praised the administration for emphasizing the need for exploratory research to produce innovative responses to global warming.

Some outside scientists, such as William Fulkerson, a senior fellow at the University of Tennessee's Institute for a Secure and Sustainable Environment, said the plan could provide a blueprint for encouraging the development of technologies that would cut emissions. "It makes it clear this is a long-term issue and it is not solved by any one technology or strategy," Fulkerson said.

Margo Thorning, chief economist at the American Council for Capital Formation, said the plan is "a substantial, credible effort" to address global warming.

"The technology-based approach is the only way to go, and the administration's emphasis on that is the right one," said Thorning, whose think tank accepts money from Exxon Mobil Corp.

John Coequyt, an energy policy specialist for the advocacy group Greenpeace, said that the plan's biggest flaw is shown by the 2010 start of its initial goals.

"The big picture from the Bush administration is always the same: This is a long-term problem that will be solved by another administration," Coequyt said. "It's time to start talking about what are the things we can do tomorrow."

White House Presents Plans To Cut Emissions (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — As the rich and powerful gathered in New York to discuss sweeping approaches to climate change under the aegis of former President Bill Clinton, the Bush administration unveiled its priorities for working with Asian countries on voluntary efforts and for spending $3 billion on technologies that could cut emissions of heat-trapping gases.

James L. Connaughton, chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality at the White House, told the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee that the Asia-Pacific partnership between the United States and Australia, China, India, Japan and South Korea would share technology advances.

An example of their plans, Mr. Connaughton said, was a $58 million deal by which the Caterpillar company provided a Chinese mining operation with generators that could burn methane gas that would otherwise be vented into the atmosphere. Methane's warming potential in the atmosphere is more than 20 times that of carbon dioxide.

Shortly before Mr. Connaughton testified, Stephen Eule, director of the Climate Change Technology program at the Energy Department, gave the energy subcommittee of the House Committee on Science an overview of the administration's technology priorities.

But the committee chairman, Representative Sherwood Boehlert, Republican of New York, chided Mr. Eule about the long time horizon envisioned for some technologies, saying that the administration's plan "is silent on the deployment of technologies already out or near the end of the pipeline" of research efforts.

"What are we doing about deploying these technologies next year" Mr. Boehlert added, "not 15 years from now?"

In response, Mr. Eule referred to the department's energy-efficiency efforts and its aid to builders of less energy-intensive homes. In addition, he cited a part of the Energy Policy Act providing $1.5 billion for developers of six new nuclear plants if they face costly regulatory delays.

Global Warming Suit Hits Carmakers (USAT)

By Chris Woodyard

USA Today, September 21, 2006

LOS ANGELES — California's attorney general filed a public-nuisance lawsuit Wednesday against the six biggest-selling automakers, alleging their products spew dangerous greenhouse gases and foster global warming.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Oakland, seeks unspecified compensation for the "billions of dollars in damages" from global warming caused by cars.

DOJ_NMG_0066885

The lawsuit names General Motors, Ford Motor, DaimlerChrysler, Toyota, Honda and Nissan. They have made 88% of the vehicles sold in the USA so far this year.

"Vehicle emissions are the single most rapidly growing source of the carbon emissions contributing to global warming, yet the federal government and automakers have refused to act," state Attorney General Bill Lockyer said in a statement. "It is time to hold these companies responsible for their contribution to this crisis."

Though limited to California, the lawsuit could invite others from around the nation. It could put automakers under more pressure to speed development of hybrids and alternative-fuel vehicles, such as those powered by hydrogen fuel cells, to lessen air pollution.

"CEOs and members of boards of directors of companies have to be thinking, 'Do we have liabilities here? Are we exposed here?' " says David Doniger, climate policy director for the Natural Resources Defense Council. "These kinds of suits are only going to multiply until we have an effective national legislation that curbs global warming."

GM, Ford and DaimlerChrysler referred response to their Washington-based trade group, the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, which said that today's cars and trucks are "99% cleaner" than the past generation.

This type of lawsuit requires courts to go beyond their jurisdiction and "opens the door to lawsuits targeting any activity that uses fossil fuel for energy," the group said.

Honda, not a member of the alliance, issued a statement saying it favors higher fuel economy standards as one way of reducing greenhouse gases.

The lawsuit is similar to one filed by eight state attorneys general and the city of New York in 2004 against utilities, alleging that smokestack pollution increased global warming. That lawsuit was dismissed. It's on appeal.

These types of lawsuits aren't clear cut.

"Nuisance law is very squishy," says Sean Hecht, executive director of the Environmental Law Center at the University of California-Los Angeles. "It's a basic feature of nuisance law that it reaches problems that are not otherwise illegal."

Calif. Sues Six Automakers Over Global Warming (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

California filed a lawsuit against the six largest automakers operating in the United States, alleging car and truck emissions are causing global warming, injuring the state's environment and economy and endangering public health.

The complaint, filed yesterday in U.S. District Court for Northern California, is the latest escalation in a clash between states and the U.S. auto industry over global warming. The California complaint alleges that under federal and state common law the automakers have created a public nuisance by producing millions of vehicles that collectively emit massive quantities of carbon dioxide.

The lawsuit targets U.S. operations of General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co., the Chrysler division of DaimlerChrysler AG, Toyota Motor Co., Honda Motor Co. and Nissan Motor Co. Most of the automakers declined to comment, saying they were still reviewing the complaint. In a statement, Honda said "the real issue regarding climate change is how the United States as a nation, not the individual states, is going to address the proliferation of greenhouse gases."

Honda repeated its position that the federal government, through the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, should raise fuel economy standards to address greenhouse gas emissions from cars and trucks. Most automakers have strongly opposed attempts to raise fuel economy standards.

The lawsuit does not seek a specific claim for damages. The complaint says the state is spending millions of dollars on planning, monitoring and making infrastructure changes to address "a large spectrum of current and anticipated impacts." The complaint blames global warming for raising sea levels along the state's coastline, increasing ozone pollution in big cities, increasing the threat of wildfires and reducing the amount of fresh water flowing from mountain snow packs.

California Attorney General Bill Lockyer pegged current damages at "tens of millions of dollars." He said the amount could grow as the legal battle continues.

"Money is being spent in our regulatory system preparing for small disruptions in the water supply due to the smaller snow pack, saltwater intrusion of the water supply, beach erosion," Lockyer said in an interview yesterday. "There is a lot of spending that is already ongoing that we are claiming. The point is taxpayers shouldn't pay for those damages, the industry should."

The complaint comes as Congress is deadlocked on how to curb global warming. California is the country's largest single auto market and in many ways has set the nation's agenda on vehicle emissions regulations for the past three decades.

Lockyer said the lawsuit was the first of its kind trying to hold auto manufacturers liable for the damages caused by the greenhouse gases their products emit. He said that vehicle emissions in California account for 30 percent of carbon dioxide in the air, while nationally the figure is 20 percent.

The Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, an industry trade group in Washington, said lawsuits like California's have failed in the past. The lobbying group said the suits draw courts into deciding political questions.

"We've made no secret of our belief that any attempt to regulate carbon dioxide is an attempt to regulate fuel economy, and that is something that is reserved for the federal government," said Charles Territo, a spokesman for the group.

DOJ_NMG_0066886

Still, both sides have sought to draw the courts into the battle. The auto industry has sued the state of California in U.S. District Court in Fresno to block implementation of a greenhouse-gas emissions law. This fall the U.S. Supreme Court is set to hear arguments in Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency which addresses whether the federal government must regulate carbon dioxide as a pollutant. The case could have broad implications for utilities, automakers and other industries.

Calif. AG Sues Automakers Over Emissions (AP)

By Samantha Young

AP, September 21, 2006

SACRAMENTO — California's attorney general on Wednesday sued the six largest U.S. and Japanese automakers for causing millions of dollars in damage through vehicle emissions of greenhouse gases, the latest action to combat global warming by the nation's most populous state.

The federal lawsuit is intended to hold the auto industry accountable for what regulators say is their contribution to climate change, Attorney General Bill Lockyer said. Vehicles are the largest single source of greenhouse gas emissions in the state.

"In effect, we're getting the taxpayers' money back," Lockyer said in a telephone interview.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Oakland, marks the first time a state has sought monetary damages for the impact of global warming by vehicles. It names Chrysler Motors Corp., General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co., Toyota Motor North America Inc., American Honda Motor Co. and Nissan North America Inc.

It adds a new dynamic to an ongoing battle between the state and the auto industry over greenhouse gas emissions. In 2002, California lawmakers approved legislation requiring cuts in emissions from cars and light trucks.

The auto industry is challenging those regulations, arguing they can be met only through increased fuel-economy standards, which is the domain of the federal government. The state has countered that emission reductions can be achieved in other ways.

Lockyer's suit claims California already is dealing with the effects of global warming and its projected consequences. He said the auto companies should be held accountable for past and future actions harming Californians' health and damaging the state's environment.

Reports by state agencies indicate that a 2- to 3-degree rise in temperature could melt the Sierra snowpack earlier each year, lead to flooding in the Central Valley and threaten the state's long-term water supply for cities and farms. The lawsuit states that California agencies will spend millions to deal with those problems.

David Doniger, an attorney with the Natural Resources Defense Council in Washington, D.C., who is defending the California auto regulations in court, said it was not surprising California is looking to hold automakers responsible.

"Industries that release the pollution that is causing global warming have to expect there are going to be more suits of this kind until and unless we have effective national legislation to curb global warming," Doniger said.

Most automakers declined to comment on the lawsuit.

Ford spokeswoman Kristen Kinley, DaimlerChrysler spokesman Michael Palese, a receptionist at GM's media division and a spokeswoman at Nissan referred calls to the Alliance of Auto Manufacturers. Toyota Motor Sales U.S.A. spokeswoman Sona Iliffe-Moon said the company was still evaluating the lawsuit.

Honda spokesman David Iida in Detroit said the company was unfamiliar with the lawsuit but said Honda believes the federal government should raise fuel-economy standards as a means to address global warming.

The Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers responded to Lockyer's lawsuit by issuing a statement saying auto companies already are building cleaner and more fuel-efficient vehicles. A spokeswoman declined to address the substance of the 15-page complaint, saying manufacturers would need time to review it.

Lockyer is suing on the theory that greenhouse gases are a "public nuisance" under both California and federal law, an argument similar to one being pursued in a case before the 2nd U.S. District Court of Appeals in New York. Connecticut and seven other states, including California, have sued five power companies in an effort to get them to reduce their greenhouse gas emissions.

The Connecticut lawsuit was dismissed by a district judge who said it attempted to address political questions. In a brief filed in support of the utility companies, the automakers alliance argued that such a suit "opens the door to lawsuits targeting any activity that uses fossil fuel for energy."

Lockyer often joins multistate lawsuits, but he said he did not know whether other states or environmental groups planned to enlist in his latest effort against auto manufacturers.

California is attempting to cut the amount of greenhouse gases to 1990 levels by 2020. As part of its strategy, auto emissions from cars and light trucks would account for about a third of the reductions.

Other reductions would come from industrial sources in a landmark deal that Schwarzenegger struck with Democratic leaders in August during the waning days of the legislative session. It will be the first such cap in the nation if Schwarzenegger signs it into law this month as expected.

The timing of Lockyer's lawsuit _ coming 48 days before the November election _ raised questions about his motives. Lockyer is termed out as attorney general and is running in a contested race for state treasurer.

"This is the silly season of elections in the fall, and obviously he thinks this will gain him a few marginal votes," said Sean McAlinden, an economist with the nonprofit Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, Mich. "I don't think it means anything more than it says. It's California politics."

Lockyer, a Democrat, said the complaint has nothing to do with election-year politics. His Republican opponent, state Board of Equalization member Claude Parrish did not return calls seeking comment. Attempts to reach him through the state Republican Party also were unsuccessful.

Lockyer said he intentionally waited until the Legislature passed the industrial greenhouse gas bill before filing his lawsuit against the automakers because he didn't want to jeopardize its chances.

Linda Adams, secretary of the California Environmental Protection Agency, declined to comment specifically on Lockyer's lawsuit, saying her office had not had time to review it. But she said the agency supports "any effort to defend California's right to clean our air."

Exxon Reviews Funding In Climate-Change Issue (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Ball

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

Exxon Mobil Corp., which has sparked criticism for funding groups that challenge the scientific validity of concerns about global warming, is reviewing whether it will continue to fund some of those groups.

Exxon spokesman Mark Boudreaux said yesterday the company's decisions about which outside groups to fund for the rest of 2006 and for 2007 "are under review." The Competitive Enterprise Institute, one past recipient of Exxon funding that has been vocal in questioning climate science, hasn't received any money from Exxon in 2006, he said.

Also yesterday, California filed a lawsuit against six auto makers alleging their vehicles have contributed to global warming, hurt the state's environment and cost it millions of dollars to address the effects. The suit would hold them liable for damages caused by warming.

Exxon's statement follows a letter released by the Royal Society, Britain's independent scientific society. The letter said that in a July meeting between Royal Society and Exxon officials, society officials criticized Exxon's funding of "organizations that have been misinforming the public about the science of climate change" and Exxon officials responded that the company "would not be providing any further funding to these organizations." The letter was reported yesterday in the Guardian newspaper.

The letter said Exxon has been "misleading" in characterizing the extent of doubts about climate science. Exxon said yesterday the society "inaccurately and unfairly" described its position.

Exxon, one of the tallest lightning rods in the global-warming debate, has opposed the Kyoto Protocol, the global-warming treaty, and has stressed remaining uncertainties in climate science. In a report in February, Exxon said atmospheric concentrations of carbon dioxide have increased, that the Earth is getting warmer and that fossil-fuel emissions are a factor in the increased concentrations. But how significantly fossil fuels are contributing to global warming remains uncertain, it said.

One group mentioned during the meeting was the Competitive Enterprise Institute, said Royal Society spokesman Bob Ward, who participated in the meeting. In May, the institute ran television ads that argued that carbon dioxide, widely seen as the main global-warming gas, is helpful. In 2005, Exxon and its philanthropic foundation gave the institute $270,000, Exxon says. That was out of a total of $6.8 million that Exxon says it and its foundation gave in 2005 to tax-exempt nonprofit groups engaged in "public information and public policy research."

Myron Ebell, the institute's director of energy-and-global-warming policy, declined to discuss whether Exxon had decided to stop funding the group.

Mr. Boudreaux said Exxon hasn't made any final decisions on funding of such groups for this year or next year. The review is part of a regular annual assessment of funding for outside groups, he said.

California filed suit in U.S. District Court against General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co. and the U.S. arms of DaimlerChrysler AG, Toyota Motor Corp., Honda Motor Co. and Nissan Motor Corp. State Attorney General Bill Lockyer said "the federal government and auto makers have refused to act" to address automotive emissions.

The Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers said it hadn't had time to review the lawsuit. But it said: "Using nuisance suits to address global warming would involve the courts in deciding political questions beyond their jurisdiction. This opens the door to lawsuits targeting any activity that uses fossil fuel for energy."

Judge Restores Clinton's 'Roadless Rule' (AP-Y)

By Terence Chea, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

A federal judge on Wednesday reinstated the "Roadless Rule," a Clinton-era ban on road construction in nearly a third of national forests.

U.S. District Judge Elizabeth Laporte ruled that the Bush administration failed to conduct necessary environmental studies before making changes that allowed states to decide how to manage individual national forests.

DOJ_NMG_0066888

The 2001 rule prohibits logging, mining and other development on 58.5 million acres in 38 states and Puerto Rico, but the Bush administration replaced it in May 2005 with a process that required governors to petition the federal government to protect national forests in their states.

Laporte sided with 20 environmental groups and four states — California, New Mexico, Oregon and Washington — that sued the U.S. Forest Service over the changes.

"This is fantastic news for millions of Americans who have consistently told the Forest Service that they wanted these last wild areas of public land protected," said Kristen Boyles, an attorney for Earthjustice, one of the plaintiffs.

Forest Service officials could not be immediately reached for comment.

Laporte's ruling does not affect about 9.3 million acres of Alaska's Tongass National Forest, which is covered by a separate rule on road construction and other development.

Judge Voids Bush Policy On National Forest Roads (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — In the latest round of legal Ping-Pong over the future of 49 million roadless acres of national forests, a federal judge in California on Wednesday reinstated Clinton-era protections against logging and mining on the land and invalidated the Bush administration's substitute policy.

The judge, Elizabeth D. LaPorte of Federal District Court in San Francisco, said the new policy had been imposed without the required environmental safeguards.

The reversal, however, does not cover nine million acres of the Tongass National Forest in Alaska because a separate set of legal opinions determines their use.

Judge LaPorte ruled in a suit filed by a coalition of environmental groups and states that objected to the decision last year to scuttle what was widely known as the "roadless rule" of 2001.

The administration replaced that rule with a policy of state-by-state management under which governors submit recommendations for the use of national forest lands within their borders.

Judge LaPorte said that the original rule had laid out "the inherent problems in this kind of local decision making," particularly "the failure to recognize the cumulative national significance of individual local decisions."

In repealing the 2001 rule, she said, the Forest Service, which is part of the Agriculture Department, had failed to comply with the National Environmental Policy Act, which requires agencies to conduct detailed environmental analyses of alternative approaches.

Judge LaPorte said the Forest Service had failed to consult federal agencies responsible for protecting endangered species. Among other points, her order enjoined the service "from taking any further action contrary to the roadless rule without undertaking environmental analysis."

Justice Department lawyers had argued that such analyses and endangered-species consultations would be performed as decisions were made on managing individual forests and that giving states the right to petition was more procedural than substantive.

The legislative director of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, Anna Aurilio, said that the judge's ruling "sort of took it back to the first principles of environmental protection and said, you can't just ride roughshod over the environment."

"They can't just trample on all the laws," Ms. Aurilio said of the administration.

Two Agriculture Department officials said they had not decided whether to appeal the decision and would continue to accept and review state petitions.

"As a general matter, we disagree with it, but the court's order is what it is," Deputy Under Secretary David P. Tenny said.

Mr. Tenny said working closely with states to gather information was "more effective in managing roadless areas properly than a sweeping approach that deals with all areas at one time."

"We'll do our level best to keep working with the states," he added.

Six states have submitted requests under the changed policy. Five of them — California, New Mexico, North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia — sought protection for their entire inventories of roadless areas.

Idaho, with the largest inventory of roadless acres outside Alaska, submitted its petition on Wednesday. It sought full protection for 1.7 million of its 9.3 million roadless acres and the option for logging and road construction in what state officials called the remaining "backcountry" areas.

A state environmental official, James L. Caswell, said that such logging would in general be intended to protect forest health and manage fire risks.

Kristen Boyles, the lawyer for Earthjustice who argued in support of the roadless rule, said the governors' petitions were "never a guarantee that we would get the protections." The repeal of the rule "was illegal, Ms. Boyles said, because the Forest Service didn't look at the environmental consequences or the alternatives."

In June, the Forest Service sold timber leases on two small roadless tracts of the Rogue River-Siskiyou National Forest near the Oregon coast despite the explicit objections of Gov. Theodore R. Kulongoski.

DOJ_NMG_0066889

Fire ravaged the area in 2002.

The merits of the roadless policy and its successor have been argued in three federal courts — in Idaho, Wyoming and, now, California — for six years.

The rule was first enjoined by a judge in Idaho, an injunction that the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit overturned.

A judge in Wyoming then enjoined the rule nationwide, and the United States Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit did not rule on that appeal until after the Agriculture Department had rescinded the rule and set up the system of state petitions in May 2005. Thereafter, the 10th Circuit said, any ruling would be moot because the roadless rule was no longer in effect.

U.S. District Judge Reinstates Roadless Rule In National Forests (WSJ)

By Jim Carlton

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A U.S. District Court judge here reinstated President Clinton's roadless rule that sharply curtails development in nearly 60 million acres of national forests, setting aside a decision by the Bush administration last year to replace that measure by one considerably less stringent.

The decision Tuesday by Judge Elizabeth Laporte came in a case filed by several environmental groups and four states, after the U.S. Forest Service last year replaced the Clinton roadless plan with one requiring states to petition for protection of roadless forests. Critics of the new plan said it would open pristine forests to logging, mining and other activities. The Bush administration has argued its plan would still protect the forests, without locking up vast tracts of forests from industrial and recreational uses.

Justice Department officials declined comment pending their review of he case, but it's likely the decision will be appealed. Before the Bush administration replaced the rule last year, federal courts in Idaho and Wyoming had issued rulings enjoining the roadless rule from being implemented. The Idaho one was struck down on appeal, while the Wyoming one was under appeal when the Bush administration replaced the roadless rule last year. Legal experts said the Wyoming case probably wouldn't have any bearing on this case, because it became moot after the new roadless decision went into effect.

In this case, Judge Laporte concluded the Forest Service failed to follow proper environmental procedures when it issued the rule allowing states to file petitions.

Judge Reinstates Ban On Forest Development (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, September 21, 2006

A federal judge in California on Wednesday struck down Bush administration rules for development on nearly all 58.5 million acres of “roadless” National Forest land and reinstated a Clinton-era ban on road-building, logging, drilling and other activities.

The ruling by U.S. District Judge Elizabeth Laporte is a victory for four states — California, New Mexico, Oregon and Washington — and 20 environmental groups that sued the U.S. Forest Service to overturn the changes.

If upheld, the decision would allow recreational activities that don't require roads, such as camping, fishing, hiking, hunting and horseback riding. It would prevent road construction, motorized travel, logging and mining in these areas.

Laporte ruled that the Forest Service had violated two environmental laws and a statute governing administrative procedures when it blocked the Clinton administration plan in 2001 and replaced it last year with new procedures.

Laporte said the Forest Service had the authority to issue the new rules but had “failed adequately to consider the environmental and species impacts.”

Her ruling does not apply to about 9.3 million acres of Alaska's Tongass National Forest, which is governed by a separate rule on development. The Tongass had been included in the Clinton ban.

“There's no question this is important for all Americans who appreciate clean water, healthy fish and wildlife populations and the opportunity to get out and enjoy the outdoors,” said Jonathan Oppenheimer of the Idaho Conservation League, one of the plaintiffs. “But it's far from over.”

Dave Tenny, deputy undersecretary of U.S. Department of Agriculture, said the administration disagrees with the ruling but has not decided whether to appeal.

“We disagree with the judge's decision,” Tenny said. “The approach we took was one we carefully considered. We believe it is not only the right course, but fully legally defensible.”

In place of the blanket protections ordered by the Clinton administration in early 2001, the Bush administration gave governors a say on what land could be developed.

Governors with roadless forest areas in their states had until November to petition the Department of Agriculture, specifying which roadless lands they want protected and which could be developed.

Five states have submitted their proposals, and seven others have said they intend to file. Laporte's decision blocks the process from going forward.

DOJ_NMG_0066890

Wednesday's ruling came less than an hour before Idaho Gov. Jim Risch — with Mark Rey, the top U.S. forestry official, by his side in Boise — was to announce his state's proposal for its 9.3 million acres of roadless forest. Idaho's proposal would allow some development on most of that land.

Prior to the Clinton administration ban, decisions on how to manage roadless areas were made by each national forest and periodically reviewed. About 34.3 million of the nation's 58.5 million roadless forest acres were open to logging and other development.

Judge Restores Protection To National Forests (LAT)

By Tim Reiterman

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A federal judge has restored broad protection of about one-third of national forest land in the lower 48 states, rejecting efforts by the Bush administration to relax a ban on logging in the most pristine forests.

The decision by U.S. District Court Judge Elizabeth D. Laporte gives new life to one of the past decade's most hotly contested environmental decrees, a Clinton administration policy that sought to protect the parts of the forests that don't yet have any roads in them.

The policy responded to concerns that areas of the forests that are sanctuaries for wildlife and reservoirs of clean water would be damaged by logging and other types of development.

U.S. national forests, once the province of timber companies and only the most intrepid outdoor enthusiasts, have become destinations for millions of people -- hikers and skiers; hunters and fishermen; river rafters and mountain bikers -- many of whom seek out the least disturbed areas.

In her ruling, Laporte declared that the current administration could not weaken the ban until it complied with requirements of the federal Endangered Species Act and the National Environmental Policy Act, which she said it hadn't done.

While the ruling does not put an end to the controversy, environmentalists and state officials believe that the ruling will make it difficult for the Bush administration to cut many trees or build new roads across the nearly 50 million acres of forest at issue.

"Today marks a huge victory for America's last remaining wild forest and the millions of Americans who have spoken out in support of protecting these special places for future generations," said Carl Pope, executive director of the Sierra Club, one of 20 environmental groups that filed the suit to halt the Bush policy.

Their suit was consolidated with one by attorneys general in California, Oregon, New Mexico and Washington.

Officials at the U.S. Department of Agriculture, which oversees national forests, said they disagree with the decision but have not yet decided whether to appeal.

Dave Tenny, USDA's deputy undersecretary for natural resources and environment, said the administration always has intended to conduct environmental reviews of its new policy -- but only after receiving input from the states on how much protection to provide in their road-less areas. "Our view is that the most effective . . . environmental review will be done at the local level," he said.

But critics of the Bush policy said that without a ban, there is nothing to stop new roads for logging or mineral exploration in the future.

"What if a change in leadership and administration were to elect to enter these areas for whatever reason, such as logging?" said Jim Lyons, a Yale University forestry school lecturer who helped draft the original road-less rule. "Without the Clinton policy in place, these areas are fair game."

After years of debate and study, the ban on road construction was adopted by President Clinton shortly before he left office in 2001.

Opponents of the road-less rule successfully challenged it in Idaho where a federal judge invalidated the policy. But the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reinstated the rule after environmentalists filed suit.

The state of Wyoming later filed a suit against the road-less rule, and won a nationwide injunction against it. Then, while an appeal by environmentalists was pending, the Bush administration adopted a new policy in 2005 that rescinded the ban and established a system under which individual forest plans could allow construction on 34 million acres without roads.

The new policy allowed states to petition the federal government to provide additional protection if they wished.

Judge Laporte ruled the Bush policy was adopted without the environmental analysis and the study of impacts on endangered and threatened species required by federal laws.

The judge rejected the administration's contention that its approach amounted to a procedural change that did not require environmental assessment.

The ruling did not choose which of the policies is best, and the judge affirmed the Forest Service's "authority to change polices from a uniform national approach strongly protecting road-less areas from human encroachment to a more localized approach permitting more roads and logging, providing that it follows the proper procedures."

Federal officials said they are digesting the ruling before deciding on a course of action.

Lyons, the former Clinton official, said nothing would preclude the Bush administration from conducting the environmental reviews and reinstating their policy. "But it will take them plenty of time," he said. "It took us 18 months."

Bush Dealt Setback On Opening Forests (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0066891

By Blaine Harden And Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

SEATTLE, Sept. 20 -- Ruling against the Bush administration's efforts to open national forests for logging and mining, a federal judge in California on Wednesday set aside a U.S. Forest Service rule that allows governors to decide which land in national forests is suited for development.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Elizabeth D. Laporte largely reinstated one of the most sweeping, emotionally fraught and legally contentious land-protection measures in decades: the Clinton-era "roadless rule," which put nearly a third of the national forests -- roughly 60 million acres -- off-limits to most development.

Administration officials "don't agree with the decision of the court" in California and "are considering our options" in appealing, said Dave Tenny, the deputy undersecretary of agriculture responsible for Forest Service policy.

The court ruling did not stop Idaho Gov. James E. Risch (R) from presenting a petition on Wednesday to open up the majority of the state's 9.3 million acres of roadless areas to commercial development. Colorado and Utah may soon do likewise.

"Idaho is moving forward," said Brad Hoaglun, a spokesman for Risch. "It sounds like there will be another court case."

Laporte's order chastised the Bush administration for having changed the 2001 roadless rule without explaining why it was doing so, for failing to cite "any new evidence" for altering land protections that had been years in the making and for ignoring the consequences of its new policy on endangered species.

Early in the Bush administration, timber companies and several Western states challenged the roadless rule, winning in lower federal courts but losing on appeal. About 97 percent of roadless areas are in 12 Western states. By issuing a new rule in 2005 that allowed governors to decide which roadless areas warranted continued protection, the administration said it was trying to head off "the prospect of endless lawsuits" that harmed local communities.

But when the Forest Service granted governors the right to make state-by-state decisions, it violated federal environmental law, Laporte wrote in a 53-page ruling released in San Francisco.

"Eliminating a major program triggers the obligation to perform environmental analysis," Laporte wrote, noting that the administration did none.

The decision can be appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit, which in the past has upheld the roadless rule.

The Forest Service has had "a great deal of success working with the states" under the current rule, Tenny said. "There's a lot of agreement out there about the need to protect roadless areas. If there are differences out there, they're on the margins."

The court challenge to the administration came from four Western states -- California, Oregon, Washington and New Mexico -- along with numerous environmental groups.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D), who is hoping to protect his state's 1.6 million acres of roadless areas, welcomed the court decision. "This is a monumental victory for everyone who enjoys our wild forests," he said.

Kristen Boyles, a lawyer for Earthjustice who argued the case in behalf of 20 environmental groups, said the ruling is "a pretty direct assault on what the Forest Service is trying to do under the Bush administration."

The ruling does not affect 9.3 million acres of Alaska's Tongass National Forest, which is covered by a different Forest Service rule.

Suits Say U.S. Impeded Audits For Oil Leases (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — Four government auditors who monitor leases for oil and gas on federal property say the Interior Department suppressed their efforts to recover millions of dollars from companies they said were cheating the government.

The accusations, many of them in four lawsuits that were unsealed last week by federal judges in Oklahoma, represent a rare rebellion by government investigators against their own agency.

The auditors contend that they were blocked by their bosses from pursuing more than $30 million in fraudulent underpayments of royalties for oil produced in publicly owned waters in the Gulf of Mexico.

“The agency has lost its sense of mission, which is to protect American taxpayers,” said Bobby L. Maxwell, who was formerly in charge of Gulf of Mexico auditing. “These are assets that belong to the American public, and they are supposed to be used for things like education, public infrastructure and roadways.”

The lawsuits have surfaced as Democrats and Republicans alike are questioning the Bush administration’s willingness to challenge the oil and gas industry.

The new accusations surfaced just one week after the Interior Department’s inspector general, Earl E. Devaney, told a House subcommittee that “short of crime, anything goes” at the top levels of the Interior Department.

In two of the lawsuits, two senior auditors with the Minerals Management Service in Oklahoma City said they were ordered to drop their claim that Shell Oil had fraudulently shortchanged taxpayers out of $18 million.

A third auditor, also in Oklahoma City, charged that senior officials in Denver ordered him to drop his demand that two dozen companies pay $1 million in back interest.

DOJ_NMG_0066892

And in a suit that was filed in 2004, Mr. Maxwell charged that senior officials in Washington ordered him not to press claims that the Kerr-McGee Corporation had cheated the government out of $12 million in royalties.

On Wednesday, Interior officials denied that the agency had suppressed any valid claims and implied that the auditors simply wanted a share of any money recovered through their lawsuits.

"If these auditors believed there were fraud and or false claims on the part of the companies they were auditing, they should have followed the proper procedures," the Interior Department said in a written statement. "Instead, they opted to pursue private lawsuits under which, if they prevail, they could receive up to 30 percent of the monies recovered from the companies."

In defying their own agency, the Interior Department's auditors sued the oil companies under a federal law, called the False Claims Act, that was created to allow individuals to expose fraud against the government. People who successfully recover money for the government in such cases are entitled to a portion. A losing company is required to pay triple the amount of recovered money as well as back interest — potentially more than $120 million in the cases brought by the auditors.

Destin Singleton, a spokeswoman for Shell, said the company had not seen the suits and could not comment. John Christiansen, a Kerr-McGee spokesman, said, "We believe the case is without merit and we are defending against it."

In dollar terms, the suspected underpayments amount to a tiny fraction of the $8 billion in royalties that companies paid last year for oil and gas extracted from federal lands.

But the lawsuits come at a time when the Interior Department is already under fire from Congress, accused of covering up ethical lapses and managerial incompetence.

"These accounts, coming from the front lines, point a big red arrow at the large problem of taxpayers being stiffed," said Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, who has been investigating the accusations.

"If it was one isolated instance, you could say that's somebody who had a bad experience and was frustrated," Mr. Wyden said. "But when you have three or four professional, nonpolitical, independent auditors all bringing the same message, that is too important to ignore."

By any measure, the Interior Department under President Bush has placed top priority on increasing oil and gas production in the United States. Under its business-friendly agenda, the department has increased incentives for drilling in risky areas, has speeded approvals for drilling applications and has campaigned to open more coastal areas for oil exploration.

Lawyers who have specialized in lawsuits under the False Claims Act said they had never seen a group of government investigators use the law against their own agency.

"Most whistle-blowers are insiders at a company who spot something that government auditors have missed," said James Moorman, president of Taxpayers Against Fraud Education Fund, a nonprofit organization supported by lawyers that specializes in the False Claims Act.

"But here you have auditors saying, 'We did our job, we found the problems and our superiors don't want to hear about it,' " Mr. Moorman said. "If it were just one auditor, you could dismiss it. But with four auditors, that's a pattern of practice."

In their suits, the auditors contend that they had no choice but to go outside the agency because their supervisors ordered them to "cease work" on five separate investigations and drop their claims.

Documents recently unsealed in Mr. Maxwell's case against Kerr-McGee, which is scheduled for trial in November, show that federal officials abandoned his claims at almost the same moment that state auditors in Louisiana reached the same conclusions as Mr. Maxwell.

Under federal regulations, companies are supposed to pay the federal government a royalty of 12 percent or 16 percent on oil and gas they extract from federal lands or coastal waters.

Mr. Maxwell's job was eliminated in 2004. He received a settlement from the government and is now living in Hawaii.

A much-praised auditor who recovered hundreds of millions of dollars over a 20-year career, Mr. Maxwell concluded in late 2002 that Kerr-McGee had used a clever marketing deal to reduce its apparent sales receipts and royalty payments.

Under the marketing deal, Mr. Maxwell contended, Kerr-McGee sold its oil at $1 to $3 a barrel below market prices to a company called Texon. Mr. Maxwell's auditing team said that Texon was making up for Kerr-McGee's shortfall by providing marketing and administrative services. In effect, Mr. Maxwell contended, Kerr-McGee was being paid in both cash and services but only paying royalties on the cash portion.

Interior officials initially encouraged Mr. Maxwell when he raised the concerns about Kerr-McGee in early 2003. "I am sure we can make the case," wrote John Price, then head of the agency's appeals division, in an e-mail message to Mr. Maxwell.

But a few days later, lawyers in the Interior Department's solicitor's office urged him to drop the case. "Although I did not understand the reasoning, it was made clear to me that the agency did not want the order issued," Mr. Maxwell wrote in an affidavit for his suit. "The next day, Mr. Price telephoned me and reiterated to me that if I issued the order, the director would be very upset with me."

But Louisiana auditors were investigating the same practices in connection with royalties on state-owned land, and had concluded that Kerr-McGee was lowballing its sales price by $1.50 to $3 a barrel. Louisiana officials demanded more than $1 million in additional state royalties from the company, and eventually settled for $600,000.

In two of the lawsuits that were unsealed last week in Oklahoma, senior auditors in Oklahoma City said they had been ordered to drop claims that Shell Oil had underpaid by $18 million.

The suits were brought by Joel F. Arnold, a supervisory auditor who oversees a team of offshore auditors based in Oklahoma City, and Randall L. Little, a senior auditor on Mr. Arnold's team in Oklahoma City.

Like Mr. Maxwell, both of the Oklahoma auditors have more than two decades of experience in government and industry and have received numerous government awards for the money they have recovered.

In one suit, Mr. Little contends that he found evidence from his audit that Shell had reduced the sales value of oil from six leases by fraudulently inflating transportation costs. One practice, they said, allowed Shell to improperly escape $15 million in royalties. A second practice allowed Shell to save $3.8 million by claiming transportation costs for oil that was being delivered to the government at its own production site in the Gulf.

The Justice Department, which reviews such suits and sometimes joins them, declined to participate in these cases. But it did not urge the courts to dismiss the suits, as some senior Interior Department had wanted.

None of the Oklahoma auditors would agree to an interview. Elizabeth Sharrock, a lawyer for Mr. Arnold and Mr. Little, said both men had already been removed from their usual jobs and were afraid of being fired.

But according to their suits, the auditors presented their findings about Shell last October to their supervisor in Houston, Lonnie Kimball. Mr. Kimball, according to court papers, initially told the auditors to "go straight to Shell" with the complaints.

But in January, after meeting with a Shell executive, Mr. Kimball abruptly reversed course and told the auditors to "cease work on all false claims" against Shell.

In its statement on Wednesday, the Interior Department acknowledged that the auditors had been told not to send "issue letters" — an official notification that a company appears to have underpaid royalties.

But it said that other auditing offices had been investigating the issues and taken certain actions. "In fact," it said, "our actions to date include: issuing late-payment interest bills; continuing an ongoing audit; and determining that an issue was not supported by the regulations."

Interior officials did not say how much money they had recovered from companies named by the auditors. But the agency's own statistics indicate that revenue from auditing and enforcement plunged after President Bush took office.

From 1989 through 2001, according to a report by the Congressional Budget Office, auditing and other enforcement efforts generated an average of $176 million a year. But from 2002 through 2005, according to numbers that the department provided lawmakers last May, those collections averaged only $46 million.

In another clash, frustrated federal auditors have complained that the Interior Department no longer allows them to subpoena documents from oil companies.

"Subpoenas are a very powerful tool to get the information you need, but I don't think they've approved a single subpoena in years," Mr. Maxwell said in an interview. "In the good old days when we were able to issue subpoenas on our own, each of us was able to recover millions of dollars a year."

Agency officials acknowledged that they have not issued any subpoenas in the last three years. "Enforcement of subpoenas by the courts can take years and be very costly," the agency said in a written response to questions. "We have not found them to be a very effective tool."

Water-quality Study Finds No Change In Potomac Pollutants (WT)

By Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

Six years of water-quality monitoring along the headwaters of the Potomac River revealed that some contaminants decreased and nitrates increased, but that there was no compelling change in the content of the river's flow, officials said.

"This is a very complex issue," said Curtis Dalpra, a spokesman for the Interstate Commission on the Potomac River Basin, which helps the federal government and the states that make up the Potomac Basin address water quality and related resource problems in the Potomac watershed.

"Over the years [of the water-quality study], there have been great changes," Mr. Dalpra said. "There have been huge swings in the weather. That equates to huge changes in water flows."

Weather changes can affect a river's content of nitrogen and phosphorus, which are important for the health of animals and fish, Mr. Dalpra said. Many pollutants flow into waterways when it rains.

The study, which was released by the West Virginia Department of Agriculture, began in 1998 after the state's Environmental Protection Department reported that seven streams flowing into the Potomac were contaminated with fecal coliform bacteria.

Those streams had been cited by the federal Environmental Protection Agency as polluted by fecal contamination.

The study concluded in 2004 after 13,000 samples had been taken and analyzed from 100 sites in Lost River, South Branch, the north and south forks of the South Branch of the Potomac, Mill Creek, Lunice Creek and Anderson Run.

DOJ_NMG_0066894

Analysis revealed that phosphorus and ammonia decreased at 26 test sites and increased at three other test sites. Nitrates increased at 36 test sites but could not be found at three other test sites.

Fecal coliform bacteria, which could be traced to poultry and farm animals, decreased at 14 test sites, while there was no detectable change at 12 other sites.

No detectable change is surprising since there have been many changes in the environment while the study was conducted, officials said.

The poultry industry has tripled during the study years, Mr. Dalpra said.

A government cost-share program was initiated in the mid-1990s to focus on accelerated development of nutrient-management plans and installation of agricultural-waste storage structures, mortality composters and livestock-confinement areas, the study shows.

Nearly 85 percent of poultry growers in the five-county area of the Potomac Valley Conservation District in the eastern part of West Virginia are participating in that program, the study found.

Researchers sought data that might indicate if increased amounts of poultry litter, including manure and bedding materials, infiltrated the headwaters.

"It was a very complicated period of time," said W. Neil Gillies, executive director of West Virginia-based Cacapon Institute, explaining that the headwaters region experienced a drought in 1998 and 1999, and that 2003 and 2004 "were as wet as it could be."

During drought conditions, river and creek waters contain few nutrients, but because of little water, the nutrients are not as diluted and test at higher levels. During wet seasons, more nutrients and debris run into the rivers and creeks, but because of more water, the nutrients test at smaller levels.

Officials Narrow Investigation After Finding Bad Spinach (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

SAN JUAN BAUTISTA, Calif., Sept. 20 — The investigation into an outbreak of E. coli that killed one person and sickened more than 140 others both broadened and shrank on Wednesday, as more victims were reported and scientists zeroed in on the contaminated spinach that caused the illness.

In Washington, federal officials said that they had narrowed the focus of their investigation after health officials in New Mexico announced that they found the strain of E. coli responsible for the outbreak in an open bag of baby spinach in the refrigerator of a sickened woman.

That batch, under the Dole brand, was hailed as a “smoking gun” by California officials who have been frantically trying to identify the source of the infection, which has halted the state’s spinach harvest and raised the specter of millions of dollars of agricultural losses.

“We are working with industry in the State of California to come up with a way to get spinach back on the shelves that have not been implicated,” said Dr. David Acheson, chief medical officer for the Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition at the Food and Drug Administration.

By Wednesday, the bad batch had been traced to Natural Selection Foods, which recalled 34 brands soon after health officials announced the outbreak last Friday.

In a news conference here at Earthbound Farm, one of Natural Selection’s best known brands, company officials confirmed that it had packaged the Dole brand found in New Mexico. But they said a preliminary test of facilities by a private laboratory had found that the contamination probably occurred in the fields. Tests cleared the plant, a company spokeswoman, Samantha Cabaluna, said. But Ms. Cabaluna cautioned that tests from the F.D.A. and the California Department of Health Services were not complete.

But the news from New Mexico did little to address the source of the E. coli, which is found in mammals’ intestines and can be spread via polluted irrigation water, raw animal droppings or unsanitary work conditions. Ms. Cabaluna noted the challenge of pinpointing the source, saying, “there’s a lot more space in the fields than in the processing plant.”

The authorities traced the spinach to one of three counties — Monterey, San Benito and Santa Clara, all south of San Francisco — and investigators continued to prowl plants and farms looking for evidence of the bacteria, which can cause diarrhea, kidney failure and even death.

As of Wednesday, 146 people in 23 states had been sickened by E. coli from fresh spinach, with 76 requiring hospitalization, including 23 who have developed hemolytic uremic syndrome, a serious kidney problem.

While federal and California officials seemed somewhat relieved by the day’s developments, concerns continued to percolate in agricultural counties. In San Juan Bautista, about 90 miles south of San Francisco, where street signs are hand-painted and farms back into modern housing developments, residents said a serious farm disruption could shatter the economy.

Few agricultural leaders were discussing economic damage, as spinach sat unpicked on thousands of acres, saying the health issues far outweighed their money woes.

But Bob Perkins, the executive director of the Monterey County Farm Bureau, said, “We have to be able to assure the public that our product is safe in order to sell it.”

“If I can’t do that,” Mr. Perkins said, “then I’ve got a tremendous problem.”

Search Narrows For Source Of E. Coli (WP)

By Michael S. Rosenwald And Annys Shin

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

Health officials in New Mexico positively identified a deadly strain of E. coli in a bag of spinach yesterday, providing a crucial clue that investigators say can be used to trace the source of an outbreak that has sickened 146 people.

Until now, the evidence implicating spinach has been circumstantial. By confirming the presence of the germ in a bag of spinach eaten by one victim, investigators can begin tracing it back to a farm in California, a step toward clearing the sale of fresh spinach from other parts of the country, David W. Acheson, a top FDA food safety expert, said.

"Yesterday, we narrowed it to California," he said. "Today, we narrowed it down to three counties. We're hoping to narrow it down to a field and . . . to a spinach leaf."

The E. coli outbreak, which was reported a week ago, has led to the leafy vegetable's banishment from restaurants and dinner tables across the country and is threatening the spinach industry with severe damage. Losses are estimated at up to $100 million if the crisis lasts just a month, and the industry has been hoping for a quick resolution in order to stem long-term damage.

Nutritionists and food-policy experts said public fears about spinach could extend to other popular produce, such as bagged salads. Even though there have been 20 E. coli outbreaks from spinach or lettuce since 1995, this one has attracted the most attention because it has the most victims, with one death, another death suspected and the number of illnesses climbing by 15 yesterday. Two more states, Arizona and Colorado, reported cases yesterday.

The uncertainty has virtually shut down the fresh spinach industry.

"This is going to kill the spinach industry for who knows how long," said Marion Nestle, a professor of nutrition, food studies, and public health at New York University. "The idea that salad greens have become a source of E. coli is very shocking, and it means we have a real problem in the food system. This is very serious."

Samuel Fromartz, the author of a recent book about the natural foods business in California, said: "It's not just the spinach industry. I think it's a big blemish for fresh produce production out of the Salinas Valley."

Federal officials yesterday narrowed the source of the outbreak to three counties, Monterey, Santa Clara and San Benito, in and around the greater Salinas Valley. The germ was found in a bag of Dole baby spinach, marked best used by Aug. 30. Acheson said the spinach was processed by Natural Selection Foods LLC, saying the code on the bag fit with information provided by the company, which has previously been linked to the outbreak.

Yesterday, the FDA said a New Jersey company, RLB Food Distributors, was recalling a number of products containing spinach possibly supplied by Natural Selection. The brands -- including Balducci's and FreshPro -- were sold on the East Coast, including in Maryland, Virginia and the District. Those with an "Enjoy Thru" date of 9/20/06 or earlier should be returned to the store where they were purchased.

And officials reiterated that no one should consume fresh spinach until they lift their warning.

The Salinas Valley is a dominant area for spinach production in California, which produces roughly 74 percent of the country's fresh spinach, thanks in large part to Natural Selection's Earthbound Farm and its innovative bagged produce. California recorded $258 million in spinach sales last year. In Monterey County, sales of spinach reached $188.2 million last year, up from $56 million in 1995.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture has credited the growth of spinach sales to the convenience of buying it fresh in bags, which became popular in the 1990s.

The California region's spinach problems, amplified by the sheer size of its market share, have not only dented the state's more than $30 billion-a-year agricultural business, but are also causing concern in secondary spinach and produce markets across the country -- from Arizona to Colorado to New Jersey and even Maryland, where about 40 growers covering 1,200 acres are two weeks from harvesting late-summer plantings.

FDA officials have said they would like to quickly lift the cloud of concern over farmers not tied to the outbreak.

Kate Wagner, a spokeswoman for the Maryland Department of Agriculture, said the state's farmers were "cautiously optimistic" that they will be able to harvest their spinach.

In California, some growers have talked about "disking" -- plowing under ripe crops that cannot be harvested. "I don't know of anybody disking yet, but that's the decision we're going to have to face," said Joe Pezzini, chairman of the Grower-Shipper Association of Central California.

Spinach is grown in 80-inch beds and harvested mechanically, at a cost of about $33,500 an acre. Farmers with hundreds of acres, who may lose more than one crop before the end of the growing season in November, stand to suffer big losses, according to Richard F. Smith, a farm adviser in the University of California Cooperative Extension program in Monterey County. Last year, 17,000 acres in the county were planted with spinach.

Growers aren't the only ones in the food chain feeling the pinch.

DOJ_NMG_0066896

Mark Allen, president of the International Food Service Distributors Association, said, "From an economic standpoint, it's substantial because distributors have to pull back not just any tainted product, but anything that has fresh spinach in it." He couldn't say how much of a hit distributors would take but said larger companies could lose millions of dollars if they are not reimbursed by their suppliers.

The longer FDA officials take to figure out the problem, the worse the damage will be to the spinach industry. Not being able to pinpoint the cause would be an even worse situation.

"If you don't know what the problem is and you can't solve it, then you can't reassure the public that what they are eating is safe," said Nestle, the NYU professor.

As a leafy green vegetable, which nutritionists would like Americans to eat more of, spinach is known as being a good source of fiber and vitamin A, as well as iron, vitamin C and folic acid. "It's a pretty power-packed vegetable compared with iceberg lettuce," said Reed Mangels, nutrition adviser for the Vegetarian Resource Group.

There are other sources of leafy vegetables that provide similar nutritional value: kale, collard greens, mustard greens, arugula. Some of those have already become a replacement for dishes containing spinach in restaurants. Also, frozen and canned spinach are not included in the warning.

But while spinach is certainly taking a beating, nobody is saying the vegetable is going away forever. "There are no concerns about healthiness, that it's not a good food," Mangels said.

"Spinach isn't poison," said Daniel Sumner, an agricultural economist at the University of California at Davis. "Yes, there has been a problem. But there are outbreaks in hamburgers that make the news, and we haven't quit eating hamburgers."

Investigators Narrow Tainted-spinach Search To 3 California Counties (USAT)

By Robert Davis

USA Today, September 21, 2006

Health investigators trying to hunt down the source of a deadly E. coli strain got a big break Wednesday from a little bag.

A sack of Dole baby spinach in the refrigerator of an E. coli victim in New Mexico tested positive for the dangerous strain that has killed one person — a 77-year-old Wisconsin woman — and sickened 146 others in 23 states.

A Food and Drug Administration official said the bar code on the bag helped investigators trace the contaminated spinach back to one of nine farms in three California counties in the Salinas Valley — Monterey, San Benito and Santa Clara — raising hopes that spinach from other areas can soon be sold.

“We have established that all of the spinach that was implicated so far was grown in that area,” said David Acheson, chief medical officer at the FDA's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition.

The FDA reiterated that it is still not safe to eat fresh spinach of any kind. While cooking can kill E. coli, making the spinach safe to eat, the FDA advised against cooking fresh spinach just yet. The agency fears that a cook could get sick from handling contaminated spinach and that the bacteria could spread to other parts of a kitchen.

While investigators do not yet know if the spinach was contaminated in a field, in transit or at a processing plant, Acheson said stocking shelves with spinach grown in other areas of the country could ultimately be as easy as putting stickers on bags that tell consumers where it's from. He said such preparations could begin as early as today.

“Just as soon as we can work out a system with industry to get spinach from non-affected areas to the shelves, that will happen,” he said.

Also Wednesday, Arizona joined the list of states with victims of the outbreak of the strain known as E. coli O157:H7. The bacteria has so far put 76 people in the hospital, 23 of them with kidney damage.

While a lab in New Mexico was confirming that the bag of baby spinach was the cause of an illness there, federal and California investigators were looking for clues to the contamination in fields and processing plants in Salinas Valley.

Acheson said that because 20 previous outbreaks involving leafy greens such as spinach and lettuce were small, the exact source of contamination has never been pinpointed. But he said he has high hopes that the exact cause of this outbreak will be found because there are so many more victims — meaning many more clues.

Investigators in processing plants are reviewing paperwork and operations in work areas, he said. Their colleagues in the fields are taking soil samples where they see animal tracks and water samples from standing pools and ditches.

A prime suspect in E. coli contamination is any livestock area near a field of greens, because the bacteria can be found in cow manure. A hydrologist from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention is on the ground with the investigative team to size up water-flow patterns into fields.

Acheson said he is optimistic that an exact source will be found because the clues are leading to an ever smaller area. “We started it out nationwide,” he said. “(Tuesday), we got it down to California. (Wednesday), we got it down to three counties. (Today), maybe we'll narrow it down further. Ultimately, the goal is to get it down to a field, if not to a spinach leaf.

“More should have been done because one case of E. coli H:157 is one too many cases,” he said. “But we are going to learn from this.”

Leafy Green Sewage (NYT)

By Nina Planck

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

FARMERS and food safety officials still have much to figure out about the recent spate of E. coli infections linked to raw spinach. So far, no particular stomachache has been traced to any particular farm irrigated by any particular river.

There is also no evidence so far that Natural Selection Foods, the huge shipper implicated in the outbreak that packages salad greens under more than two dozen brands, including Earthbound Farm, O Organic and the Farmer's Market, failed to use proper handling methods.

Indeed, this epidemic, which has infected more than 100 people and resulted in at least one death, probably has little do with the folks who grow and package your greens. The detective trail ultimately leads back to a seemingly unrelated food industry — beef and dairy cattle.

First, some basic facts about this usually harmless bacterium: E. coli is abundant in the digestive systems of healthy cattle and humans, and if your potato salad happened to be carrying the average E. coli, the acid in your gut is usually enough to kill it.

But the villain in this outbreak, E. coli O157:H7, is far scarier, at least for humans. Your stomach juices are not strong enough to kill this acid-loving bacterium, which is why it's more likely than other members of the E. coli family to produce abdominal cramps, diarrhea, fever and, in rare cases, fatal kidney failure.

Where does this particularly virulent strain come from? It's not found in the intestinal tracts of cattle raised on their natural diet of grass, hay and other fibrous forage. No, O157 thrives in a new — that is, recent in the history of animal diets — biological niche: the unnaturally acidic stomachs of beef and dairy cattle fed on grain, the typical ration on most industrial farms. It's the infected manure from these grain-fed cattle that contaminates the groundwater and spreads the bacteria to produce, like spinach, growing on neighboring farms.

In 2003, The Journal of Dairy Science noted that up to 80 percent of dairy cattle carry O157. (Fortunately, food safety measures prevent contaminated fecal matter from getting into most of our food most of the time.) Happily, the journal also provided a remedy based on a simple experiment. When cows were switched from a grain diet to hay for only five days, O157 declined 1,000-fold.

This is good news. In a week, we could choke O157 from its favorite home — even if beef cattle were switched to a forage diet just seven days before slaughter, it would greatly reduce cross-contamination by manure of, say, hamburger in meat-packing plants. Such a measure might have prevented the E. coli outbreak that plagued the Jack in the Box fast food chain in 1993.

Unfortunately, it would take more than a week to reduce the contamination of ground water, flood water and rivers — all irrigation sources on spinach farms — by the E-coli-infected manure from cattle farms.

The United States Department of Agriculture does recognize the threat from these huge lagoons of waste, and so pays 75 percent of the cost for a confinement cattle farmer to make manure pits watertight, either by lining them with concrete or building them above ground. But taxpayers are financing a policy that only treats the symptom, not the disease, and at great expense. There remains only one long-term remedy, and it's still the simplest one: stop feeding grain to cattle.

California's spinach industry is now the financial victim of an outbreak it probably did not cause, and meanwhile, thousands of acres of other produce are still downstream from these lakes of E. coli-ridden cattle manure. So give the spinach growers a break, and direct your attention to the people in our agricultural community who just might be able to solve this deadly problem: the beef and dairy farmers.

Reaching Out Across Cultures (WP)

By Sari Horwitz

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

Don't let an FBI investigation be the reason for your first visit to an Arab home, a U.S. Muslim leader told 500 FBI agents gathered at Quantico yesterday, urging them to reach out to Arab communities.

"You say 'FBI' to the average Yousef out there and they picture a middle-aged white guy talking in their sleeve," said Nawar Shora of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee. "Recent immigrants don't have the comfort level, because in their countries oftentimes the equivalent of the FBI is the secret police."

Shora dispensed his advice to FBI agents from the bureau's second-largest office, the Washington Field Office, as part of an effort by Muslim community leaders and FBI officials to build a more trusting relationship.

Shora and other Muslim leaders met last week over tea and cookies with Joseph Persichini Jr., acting assistant director in charge of the FBI office. The group included representatives from the Council on American Islamic Relations, the Sikh American Legal Defense Education Fund, the Arab America Institute, the Muslim Public Affairs Council and the ADAMS (All Dulles Area Muslim Society) Center.

"We need to reach out and develop better contacts in the Shia community in light of the Lebanon-Israel war," Persichini told the group, gathered around his conference table.

DOJ_NMG_0066898

The FBI helped create the group, called the Arab, Muslim and Sikh Advisory Council, after Sept. 11, 2001. They meet about every two months to discuss a range of issues, including hate crimes and concerns about the Patriot Act.

Persichini said the relationships developed through this committee allow him and Muslim leaders to be in constant touch by phone or electronic message. He said he hopes that inroads into the Muslim community will help the FBI attract much-needed Arab American agents. "We have to recruit better," he said.

When Muslim leaders recently learned that an FBI agent wrote an e-mail insinuating that some area Muslim groups were linked to terrorists, they immediately talked by phone to Persichini and Shora said the controversy was resolved.

Two days ago Persichini heard a radio broadcast about a report released by a national Muslim advocacy organization detailing an increase in hate crimes in the Washington area. The report was news to him. "I fired off a BlackBerry message to Arsalan [Iftikhar from the Council on American Islamic Relations]," Persichini said. "I said, 'Hello? Where did that come from?' "

While the report raised questions about overzealous arrests and interrogation practices, Iftikhar told Persichini that he had praised the FBI Washington Field Office at a news conference about the report for its efforts in trying to combat hate crimes in the area.

Two weeks ago, at a Saturday night family gathering at a mosque, Imam Mohammed Magid of the ADAMS Center presented Persichini and the FBI's Washington office an award for service to the Muslim community.

"We don't always agree," said Shora. "But we've come a long way. Communication and understanding equals trust."

Attorney For Bonds Lashes Out At Investigators (ESPN)

By Mike Fish, ESPN.com

ESPN.com, September 21, 2006

Even as he waits for the Justice Department to ferret out the source of leaks in the BALCO steroids scandal, the lawyer for Barry Bonds claims to have what he calls "fairly compelling evidence" that the source is a federal employee.

For the moment, defensive attorney Michael Rains is content to wait for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles -- handed this chore because the investigation involves employees of the federal prosecutor's office in San Francisco -- to "out" the person or persons who leaked transcripts of secret grand jury testimony and other sealed documents. But Rains threatens to go public with his information if the government indicts Bonds, the San Francisco slugger who is thought to be the target of potential perjury or tax evasion charges.

Even without an indictment, he wants answers about the source, and he promises to use his information if those answers aren't forthcoming.

"I have a pretty damn good idea of who it is," said Rains, though he declined to share his specific evidence. "And I have a pretty damn good idea that it is someone whose paycheck looks a lot like the people who are conducting the grand jury to determine who it is. Meaning, it is somebody who is employed by the federal government. The problem is that I would like to see if the government really is going to ferret out the wrongdoing on their own, even if the wrongdoer turns out to be somebody who is employed by the federal government. And if they do, my faith in their integrity and their resilience and whatnot is restored. But if they don't, then I guess I will. If they try to take a shot at Barry, we'll do it then."

Thom Mrozek, a spokesperson for the U.S. attorney's office in L.A., refused to address Rains' allegation, saying, "We don't react to statements that are made outside of court."

Rains also told ESPN.com that government attorneys will look like "buffoons" if they choose to indict Bonds. While suggesting that the investigation had turned into the "Barry Show," the attorney boasted that a San Francisco jury will "never convict Barry" -- a notion that has strong support from other defense attorneys involved in the BALCO proceedings, who spoke on background.

Bonds' attorney fired his salvos as San Francisco Chronicle reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams prepare to appear in federal court on Thursday in the government's latest attempt to get them to reveal their source of the grand jury transcripts from the BALCO proceedings, which were used to document their co-authored book, "Game of Shadows." The reporters have acknowledged publicly that they obtained the secret testimony of Bonds, Jason and Jeremy Giambi, Benito Santiago, Gary Sheffield, Bobby Estalella, Armando Rios and former sprint world-record-holder Tim Montgomery, as well as details from federal agents' interviews with a handful of coaches and other athletes.

It is illegal to leak grand jury testimony.

So far, the Chronicle's lawyers have argued unsuccessfully that reporters should not be compelled to testify because the public benefit of their reporting outweighs the harm caused by the disclosure of grand jury material. U.S. District Court Judge Jeffrey White is expected to spell out their punishment on Thursday should they remain in contempt of court, though the government has already struck a deal that will allow Fainaru-Wada and Williams to remain out of jail during the appeals process.

Not lost on Rains is that Bonds' personal trainer and boyhood friend, Greg Anderson, has been found in contempt of court twice for refusing to testify and is in jail for a second term. Anderson, who earlier served three months after pleading guilty to steroid distribution and money laundering, has refused to tell the court whether he gave Bonds steroids. At issue is whether Bonds, who owns baseball's single-season home run record and is approaching Hank Aaron's career record, lied under oath when he told a grand jury in 2003 that he never knowingly took steroids.

Anderson's testimony appears to be pivotal to making a successful perjury case against Bonds.

DOJ_NMG_0066899

"They need to be in jail," Rains said of the reporters, whose work further cast Bonds as a steroid-enhanced cheat. "Other media people, of course, take exception with my attitude about that; but I say unless they go to jail, you make a complete mockery of the grand jury system. Since when can anybody declare that the purpose of our dealing with this issue has a larger purpose, and that is to educate the public?

"How can these guys sit there and say, 'Oh, yeah, we've convinced kids in the Central Valley that they shouldn't take steroids. And look at all the good that is coming.' Come on, give me a break. This is all about money. It is all about a newspaper that was having financial problems. It is all about them making dough and how much they can make [from the book]."

In 2004, Fainaru-Wada and Williams began quoting closed-door testimony of Jason Giambi, Montgomery and other high-profile athletes that indicated the athletes had been supplied performance-enhancing drugs by the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative. They also reported that Bonds testified he, too, received substances, though he told the grand jury that he believed them to be flaxseed oil and arthritis balm. Prosecutors suspect the substances were the BALCO-supplied performance-enhancing drugs known as "the clear" and "the cream."

Before the first Chronicle story appeared, a federal judge issued orders in March 2004 that prohibited BALCO defendants as well as government personnel from disclosing grand jury transcripts and other confidential materials to the media. At least three other attorneys for defendants in the BALCO case strongly back Rains' suspicion that the source of the leaks is a government employee.

Only attorneys for the four BALCO defendants (Anderson, BALCO founder and president Victor Conte, vice president James Valente and track coach Remi Korchemny) and the government were privy to the discovery documents. It's difficult, they say, to fathom that a defense attorney would turn over reams of documents at the risk of losing the license to practice law.

They further say that the release of the transcripts benefited none of the four original BALCO defendants, while the disclosures ultimately enhanced the government's ability to make a public case and discredit Bonds and numerous other high-profile athletes. The case would have been viewed as excessively pricey and mundane, they say, without the juicy link to pro athletes, especially in light of the fact that none of the defendants received a prison sentence harsher than the four months served by Conte.

In some circles, Conte has been viewed as a possible source for the grand jury leaks, though recent court filings by the Chronicle seem to make that less likely.

"A lot of the stuff that came out came from [the government]," said one of the defense attorneys, who asked to remain anonymous. "During the case, there was stuff coming out all the time. Some of the stuff, we didn't even have.

"Every time that we turned around, we were getting hit, getting hit. I think [the government] wanted to force a deal with Conte and all those surrounding people, and they weren't cooperating. So why not go ahead and embarrass them? I think the motive was there. The problem is proving the government did it. If the government is investigating the government, how fair is that?"

That's where Rains comes into play.

While he admits he hasn't stumbled upon a smoking gun, Bonds' attorney purports to possess enough evidence to finger the source of the grand jury leaks. He says IRS special agent Jeff Novitzky, who has led the probe of Bonds and BALCO, was one source of information for the reporters, though he stops short of identifying Novitzky as the person who provided the grand jury testimony.

"Novitzky, in particular, has an absolute obsession of taking down Barry," Rains said. "The thinking is, if he has been given unfettered right to do anything he damn well pleases here in this case, then certainly things could happen. From Novitzky's standpoint, he was angry when Barry didn't get indicted to begin with."

Rains acknowledged the feds could indict Bonds any time they desire, but said they know a conviction from a San Francisco jury is a dicey proposition. The moody superstar continues to have a solid fan base in the city and is associated by some with helping to keep Major League Baseball in San Francisco. And with the O.J. Simpson, Michael Jackson and Robert Blake cases as a backdrop, it seems a conviction for a celebrity defendant is an increasingly difficult task.

"They'll never convict Barry," Rains said. "And it makes you wonder why in the world they would want to indict him, if they can't convict him. They're going to be embarrassed. They're going to be ashamed. And they're going to look like fools in the process. They have done too many dirty, underhanded things.

"Their problem is, their forum to convict Barry is San Francisco. And like it or not, a lot of people in San Francisco kind of like Barry. The sports writers don't, but the people do. Two, you got a lot of people in San Francisco -- being the liberal Bay Area community that it is -- that have a certain amount of mistrust of the government. And three, the government has completely played into the theory and belief of mistrust in the way it has behaved in connection with this case against Barry.

"And a San Francisco jury is going to hate the government in this case. And that is not to say maybe they'll even feel … well, there could be some belief or could be some suspicion still that Barry did something and he knew better. But that is not enough to convict. And it is not going to convict him in San Francisco. So the bottom line is, he won't be convicted. They don't have either the evidence, or the talent to present the evidence to convict Barry Bonds."

US Indicts 11 For Selling Prescription Drugs On Internet (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066900

ATLANTA (AP)--Federal authorities have indicted 11 people in three U.S. states and the Central American nation of Belize on fraud and drug charges for selling unapproved prescription drugs over the Internet.

Hi-Tech Pharmaceuticals based in Norcross, Ga., marketed the drugs as Canadian through unsolicited emails, but the pills actually were made in Belize, federal officials said Wednesday.

The indictment named the company itself, as well as its principal owner, Jared Robert Wheat, 32, of Alpharetta, Ga. Others named in the indictment came from Georgia, North Carolina and South Dakota.

At a hearing in Atlanta for four of the defendants, U.S. Magistrate Linda Walker ordered Wheat and two others be held without bond, but lawyers for all three said they plan to appeal the ruling. A fourth defendant, David Watkins, 40, of Norcross, was released on $75,000 bond.

All four pleaded not guilty to the charges.

During the hearing, federal prosecutors showed photographs of Hi-Tech's squalid drug lab in Belize, where pills were stored in large garbage cans marked with "Viagra" and "Lipitor." In the photos, the equipment used to make the pills is covered in dust and dirt and rooms are filled with unorganized boxes and canisters.

Hi-Tech is estimated to be worth $35 million and to have produced more than 30 million pills.

U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias called the case "disturbing."

"Customers thought they were getting legitimate and safe prescription drugs over the Internet from Canada at cheaper prices, when in reality they received adulterated fakes that were crudely made in an unsanitary house in Belize," he said.

Nahmias said the drugs were "not properly produced or regulated. You don't know what you're getting." He said authorities didn't know how many customers were involved, but obviously it was hundreds.

Nahmias said those arrested out of state would have hearings in those states. The only fugitive, he said, was Brad Neal Watkins, 38, of Birmingham, Ala.

"One of the fastest growing drug abuse concerns is prescription drugs," said Sherri Strange, special agent of the Drug Enforcement Administration. "The selling and purchasing of drugs has been facilitated by the wide use of the Internet, the anonymity it provides, and the ease and relative secrecy of the mail and private delivery companies."

The indictment seeks forfeiture of numerous properties, automobiles and bank accounts and seeks a money judgment of not less than $19.8 million.

Nahmias said the defendants are accused of making 24 different drugs that they marketed through so-called "spam" advertisements over the Internet as authentic generic versions of those drugs being imported from Canada.

The drugs included steroids such as oxymethelone and stanazolol, plus unapproved versions of controlled drugs such as Ambien, Valium and Xanax and prescription drugs such as Viagra, Cialis, Lipitor and Vioxx, Nahmias said.

He said from 2002 through 2004, the defendants allegedly ordered enough active ingredients to manufacture millions of pills.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Aaron Danzig said Hi-Tech and its subsidiaries are still operating and breaking the law even though it has been under investigation by federal authorities for a few years. During Wednesday's hearing, he called the company and those involved "snake-oil salesmen."

Those named in the indictment included two citizens of Belize, Michelle Young, 38, and Guillermo Pech, 28.

2 Pinehurst Men Arrested For Internet Drug Sales (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

ATLANTA (AP) — Federal authorities have indicted 11 people in Georgia, North Carolina, South Dakota and Belize on fraud and drug charges for selling unapproved prescription drugs over the Internet.

The operation, which authorities say is based in Alpharetta, Ga., marketed the drugs as Canadian through unsolicited e-mails, but the pills actually were made in Belize, officials said Wednesday.

Named in the indictment are Jared Robert Wheat, 34, of Alpharetta; David Dalton Johnson, 37, of Pinehurst, N.C.; David Alan Brady, 40, of Pinehurst, N.C.; Stephen Douglas Smith, 38, of Duluth, Ga.; Thomas Holda, 43 of Duluth, Ga.; Sergio Ronaldo Oliveira, 46, of Hoschton, Ga.; Brad Neal Watkins, 38, of Birmingham, Ala.; David Watkins, 40, of Norcross, Ga.; Steven Blinder, 42, of Aberdeen, S.D.; and two citizens of Belize, Michelle Young, 38, and Guillermo Pech, 28.

Also named in the indictment was Hi-Tech Pharmaceuticals, a Norcross company of which Wheat was the principal owner.

Wheat, Smith, Oliveira and David Watkins were to appear before U.S. Magistrate Linda Walker in Atlanta later Wednesday where federal prosecutors are expected to reveal more details about the case.

"The indictment's allegations are disturbing because customers thought they were getting legitimate and safe prescription drugs over the Internet from Canada at cheaper prices, when in reality they received adulterated fakes that were crudely made in an unsanitary house in Belize," U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias said.

Nahmias said the drugs were "not properly produced or regulated. You don't know what you're getting." He said authorities did not know how many customers were involved, but obviously it was hundreds.

DOJ_NMG_0066901

Nahmias said those arrested out of state would have hearings in those states. The only fugitive, he said, was Brad Watkins, David's brother.

"One of the fastest growing drug abuse concerns is prescription drugs," said Sherri Strange, special agent of the Drug Enforcement Administration. "The selling and purchasing of drugs has been facilitated by the wide use of the internet, the anonymity it provides, and the ease and relative secrecy of the mail and private delivery companies."

The indictment seeks forfeiture of numerous properties, automobiles and bank accounts, and seeks a money judgment of not less than $19.8 million.

Nahmias said the defendants are accused of making 24 different drugs that they marketed through so-called 'spam' advertisements over the Internet as authentic generic versions of those drugs being imported from Canada.

The drugs included steroids such as oxymethelone and stanazolol, plus unapproved versions of controlled drugs such as Ambien, Valium and Xanax and prescription drugs such as Viagra, Cialis, Lipitor and Vioxx, Nahmias said.

He said from 2002 through 2004, the defendants allegedly ordered enough active ingredients to manufacture millions of pills.

11 Indicted In Internet Prescription Drugs Scam (AJC)

By S.a. Reid, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 20, 2006

A Gwinnett County pharmaceutical company and 11 men allegedly associated with it have been indicted by a federal grand jury on conspiracy and other felony charges in a $20 million Internet scam to sell fake prescription drugs.

Federal authorities say the men peddled adulterated, misbranded medications produced under questionable conditions in Belize for Hi-Tech Pharmaceuticals of Norcross.

From 2002 to 2004, they allegedly marketed the illegally produced pharmaceuticals as cheaper, generic Canadian versions of popular U.S-made brands using Internet "spam" advertising.

The list includes steroids Oxymethelone and Stanazolol, controlled drugs Ambien, Valium and Xanax, and prescription drugs Viagra, Cialis, Lipitor and Vioxx, according to an indictment made public Wednesday by the U.S. Attorney's Office in Atlanta.

Four of the men — Jared R. Wheat of Alpharetta, Stephen D. Smith of Duluth, Sergio R. Oliveira of Hoschton and David Watkins of Norcross — were scheduled to make an initial appearance in U.S. District Court later Wednesday.

Thomas Holda, 43, of Duluth, is in custody on an unrelated charge, authorities said.

Other defendants named in the indictment are in custody in North Carolina, Alabama, South Dakota and Belize.

Brad N. Watkins, 38, of Birmingham, Ala., is considered a fugitive.

All the defendants are charged with felony conspiracy to import controlled substances and to introduce adulterated and misbranded prescription medication, according to the indictment.

Eight have additional charges of mail fraud, distribution of controlled substances and introducing adulterated and misbranded new drugs.

The indictment also charges Wheat, 34, with engaging in a continuous criminal enterprise.

Federal authorities are seeking a financial judgment of at least $19.8 million generated through the scam, plus forfeiture of numerous properties, vehicles and bank accounts.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Food and Drug Administration and other federal, state and local agencies were involved in the investigation of the scam.

Georgia: Arrests In Fake Pills Scheme (NYT)

By Brenda Goodman

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

A company posing as a Canadian pharmacy offering inexpensive versions of generic drugs over the Internet was really a “backyard chemist” that sent millions of fake pills to hundreds of unsuspecting customers, federal agents in Atlanta said. Eleven people have been charged with two felony counts of conspiracy each in connection with the manufacture of 24 unapproved or adulterated drugs that were sold by Hi-Tech Pharmaceuticals, a company based in Norcross, Ga. The drugs were made in an “unsanitary house” in Belize and sold over the Internet through spam e-mail messages and Web sites, drug enforcement agents said. “When you buy drugs over the Internet you don’t know what you’re getting,” said Sherri Strange, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in Atlanta.

Indictments Handed Down In Fake Prescription Drug Scheme (TABC)

The Atlanta Business Chronicle, September 20, 2006

Eleven people and a metro Atlanta company have been indicted by a federal grand jury on multiple felony charges relating to a scheme to sell adulterated and unapproved new drugs over the Internet.

The defendants named in the indictment are: Jared Robert Wheat, 34, of Alpharetta, Ga.; David Dalton Johnson, 37, of Pinehurst, N.C.; David Alan Brady, 40, of Pinehurst; Stephen Douglas Smith, 38, of Duluth, Ga.; Thomas Holda, 43, of Duluth; Sergio Ronaldo

Oliveira, 46, of Hoschton, Ga.; Brad Neal Watkins, 38, of Birmingham, Ala.; David Watkins, 40, of Norcross, Ga.; Steven Blinder, 42, of Aberdeen, S.D.; Michelle Young, 38, a citizen of Belize; and, Guillermo Pech, 28, a citizen of Belize; and Hi-Tech Pharmaceuticals, a company based in Norcross.

All of the defendants are charged with two different conspiracies: conspiring to import controlled substances into the United States and conspiring to violate the wire and mail fraud statute and to introduce into interstate commerce adulterated and misbranded prescription drugs.

The indictment charges each of the defendants, except David Watkins, Brad Watkins and Steven Blinder, with different violations including mail fraud, distribution of controlled substances and introducing adulterated and misbranded new drugs. The indictment also charges the lead defendant, Jared Wheat, with engaging in a continuing criminal enterprise.

The indictment seeks to forfeit numerous properties, automobiles and bank accounts, and seeks a money judgment of not less than $19.8 million.

According to U.S. Attorney David Nahmias, the indictment, search warrants and information presented in court, Wheat, the principal owner of Hi-Tech Pharmaceuticals, and the other defendants opened a drug manufacturing facility in Belize around 2002. The defendants allegedly used Hi-Tech funds and Jared Wheat's own funds to cover the costs of operating the Hi-Tech facility in Belize and would travel to Belize to manufacture various prescription and controlled substances.

The defendants allegedly made approximately 24 different drugs that they marketed through spam advertisements over the Internet as authentic generic versions of those drugs being imported from Canada. The drugs included steroids such as "Oxymethelone" and "Stanazolol," along with unapproved versions of controlled drugs such as "Ambien," "Valium," and "Xanax." The defendants also manufactured versions of prescription drugs such as "Viagra," "Cialis," "Lipitor" and "Vioxx."

From 2002 through 2004, the defendants allegedly ordered enough active ingredients to manufacture millions of pills, many of which were then shipped into the United States to people who bought the drugs after receiving Internet spam and also to various wholesalers of drugs.

"The indictment's allegations are disturbing because customers thought they were getting legitimate and safe prescription drugs over the internet from Canada at cheaper prices, when in reality they received adulterated fakes that were crudely made in an unsanitary house in Belize," Nahmias said

Norcross Drug Company Busted (WXIA)

WXIA-TV, September 20, 2006

Does your e-mail box get cluttered with spam advertisements for prescription drugs? One of the companies that mail those ads has been indicted by a federal grand jury for allegedly peddling fake prescription drugs.

Eleven employees who work for Hi-Tech Pharmaceuticals in Norcross have been indicted for importing controlled substances into the United States.

The lead defendant in the case is the owner of the company, 34-year old Jared Wheat of Alpharetta.

U.S. Attorney David Nahmias says consumers thought they were getting legitimate drugs from Canada at a reduced price from the company.

“In fact they were receiving fake drugs that were crudely made in an unsanitary house in Belize,” Nahmias said.

At a detention hearing in federal court Wednesday, the Government presented evidence in the form of photographs depicting the conditions of where the drugs were manufactured in Belize. Employees of the company traveled to Belize and helped in the manufacturing of the drugs, according to the indictment.

The U.S. Attorney called the conditions in the home “crude.” The indictment alleges various prescription and controlled substances like steroids, Valium, Zanax, Viagra, Cialis, Lipitor and Vioxx were manufactured and packaged in the home.

Sherri Strange, Special Agent in Charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration says this case is an example why prescription drugs should not be purchased illegally over the internet.

“Going on-line and unlawfully purchasing prescription drugs isn't any different from going down to the corner and buying Oxycontin from your local dealer,” Strange said.

Federal search warrants were executed at Hi-Tech Pharmaceuticals' headquarters in Norcross and at the defendant’s homes. The Government seized the suspect’s property and vehicles, which included Ferrari's, Mercedes-Benz and BMW automobiles.

The Government alleges Jared Wheat made $14 million last year. At the detention hearing Wednesday, Wheat was denied bond, while 38-year-old Sergio Oliveira of Hoschton and 38-year old Stephen Smith of Duluth were also denied bond. Brad Watkins, also 38, was granted a $75,000 bond.

Seven other defendants were arrested in North Carolina, South Dakota and Belize.

Senator Kennedy Stars On YouTube (B&C)

Broadcasting & Cable, September 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066903

At press time--10 a.m. Wednesday morning--Senator Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) had gotten 144,342 views to his YouTube pitch for network neutrality. That was about 30,000 more than he had just 12 hours before.

The battle between proponents of strong Internet access anti-discrimination enforcement authority language in a Senate telecommunications bill (Kennedy, Google, Microsoft) and its opponents (telcos, Senate Republicans) has been the debate du jour in D.C., prompting endless studies and rallies and conference calls on both sides. The bill's chances, with or without the language, are now slim thanks to the debate.

In his online pitch, Kennedy says the Internet "allows me and everyone else to communicate directly to you, no matter what your political agenda, no matter what your political party."

Of course, though the message can be controlled, the adjacent message can't. Kennedy's video is right above one where video of his tough talk at the Samuel Alito hearing has been replaced by dialog from Bluto Blutarsku (John Belushi) from Animal House.

CNN made a similar point about the Office of National Drug Control Policy decision to put some of its anti-drug TV PSA's on YouTube given that a search for the term drug gets not only its PSA's but video of people doing drugs.

PSAs Get Lukewarm Reception On YouTube (AP)

By Jake Coyle, Ap Entertainment Writer

AP, September 20, 2006

NEW YORK — As various interests have increasingly converged on YouTube in hopes of some free, viral marketing, it came as little surprise when the White House announced earlier this week that it, too, wanted a piece of Lonelygirl15's spotlight.

The Office of National Drug Control Policy posted a dozen videos at http://www.YouTube.com/ONDCP, mostly of public-service commercials on the dangers of drug use from the "above the influence" campaign, as seen on TV.

As of Wednesday, the ONDCP channel had received a scant 53 subscribers and a total of 14,463 views, a relatively low total. How the youthful, rebellious Web is responding to the ONDCP's efforts is perhaps hinted at by the mirror site, http://www.ondcp.com, which recasts the acronym as "oppressive network drug content propaganda."

It's true, though, that any YouTube viewings are basically gravy to the ONDCP; it costs nothing to post the clips. Still, the campaign's numbers pale in comparison to, for example, the hundreds of thousands that have watched various videos on how to grow marijuana.

A spokesman for YouTube, which generally doesn't regulate its user-posted videos, declined on Wednesday to discuss the site's policy regarding videos that show illegal activity, such as drug use or drug production.

YouTube and the Web clearly present a problem for public-service announcements. On TV and on radio, PSAs typically rely on federally required play or corporations looking to bolster their image. They are inserted between entertainment _ they aren't the entertainment, itself.

On YouTube, there are no regulations and videos make a dent with the public only if they create their own audience, thus making their way up the "most viewed" list. To help grab viewers, the government links its videos with the terms "war on drugs," "peer-pressure," "marijuana," "weed," "ONDCP" and "420" (a reference to marijuana), so anyone searching for those words on YouTube can find them.

The Ad Council, a leading producer of PSAs since 1942, has seen its methods change over the years and has worked to adapt to the Internet _ like asking for donated ad time to play before videos.

"I don't think YouTube has changed the way we approach PSAs, but I think it's just added another dimension and another media niche for a no-cost solution," says Barbara Shimaitis, the senior vice president of interactive services at the Ad Council.

Shimaitis thinks YouTube and other video-sharing sites could propel PSAs to become still more entertaining, and points to the popularity of a dramatic global warming ad of theirs featuring a train (a metaphor for global warming) bearing down on a young girl (a stand-in for future generations).

Some of the most viewed drug-related videos on YouTube are far more persuasively anti-drug than anything produced by the government or the Ad Council. In one video, you can see a real heroin user discuss his fight with addiction.

Over 183,000 people have watched a sadly hysterical 1980 interview with Richard Pryor in which he brags about cocaine he recently purchased. It would be hard to watch the clip of Pryor, who died of a heart attack at the age of 65 in 2005, and not contemplate whether drugs shortened his life.

Still, people generally don't watch YouTube hoping to change their lives. After all, one of the most watched PSAs on YouTube is a clip from the `80s about the dangers of crack cocaine. It's not watched for its message, but for its star: Pee Wee Herman.

Government Can't Kick Bad Anti-drug Campaign (THER)

The Herald, September 20, 2006

The federal government's anti-drug ad campaign is a demonstrated flop. So what's the government going to do? Run the ads on YouTube, a hugely popular Internet video service that is demonstrably not anti-drug.

Flashback to August: The Government Accountability Office reported that the ad campaign has not been proven to deter children from using drugs and recommended that lawmakers consider reducing funding for the program, which has cost $1.2 billion since 1998. (President Bush has requested another $120 million for next year.)

DOJ_NMG_0066904

The GAO's recommendation was based on an independent evaluation of the campaign conducted by Westat Inc. The report, commissioned by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy and the National Institute on Drug Abuse, cost the government $42.7 million. The report found that not only is the campaign not working, it is backfiring.

Westat Inc. found that the scores of television, print and radio ads had no "significant favorable effects" in deterring children from trying marijuana or getting them to stop. Instead, it found that more 121/2- to 13-year-olds and girls were trying the drug after seeing the ads.

In September, the online magazine Slate reported that the agencies that commissioned the report sat on the findings for a year and a half beginning in early 2005 - while spending $220 million on the anti-marijuana ads in fiscal years 2005 and 2006. The GAO confirmed this and added that it encountered serious resistance from the NIDA and the White House when it insisted that it was entitled and mandated by Congress to review the publicly funded Westat report.

The government now says the study was ill-suited to judge the effect of an ad campaign and that the findings have limited relevance because they are more than two years old. Of course, sitting on the findings for a year and a half made them older. Downplaying unfavorable findings is not new. In 1994, the Justice Department rejected a report it had commissioned on the DARE program at schools, because it found that the program had no effect on whether children will try drugs.

Since the government's anti-marjiuana ads are already made, there's no additional cost to run them on YouTube. Millions of dollars aside, what about the cost of ignoring the evidence that more kids are trying pot after seeing the ads?

"If just one teen sees this and decides illegal drug use is not the path for them, it will be a success," a government spokesman said of placing the ads on YouTube.

And if one, or more, decides to try drugs? When will the government just say no?

Feds Post Anti-Drug Videos On YouTube (MP)

Media Daily News, September 20, 2006

FOLLOWING IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF commercial marketers and politicians, the federal government has realized the potential value of YouTube as a platform for disseminating messages to young people. Last week, the White House quietly began posting anti-drug ads from TV on the popular video-sharing site.

But the feds still face some major obstacles, according to media execs who have worked with YouTube on unrelated projects.

So far the government has posted 12 videos, including 9 anti-drug ads and 3 clips from speeches given by Walters on the subject. The most popular ad, centering on an ill-advised encounter with a junkyard dog resulting from intoxication, had received 2,003 views as of Tuesday evening.

"Public institutions must adapt to meet the realities of these promising technologies," President Bush's top drug-policy adviser John Walters said at a press conference Tuesday, explaining the administration's decision to harness YouTube.

Clearly, the ads have stirred interest on YouTube--but it's still unclear whether the videos have real viral appeal, meaning the feds face yet another uphill battle in the war on drugs.

Ian Schafer, CEO of Deep Focus, said the ads are too straightforward to gain much traction on YouTube. "They're not especially jarring, since they're designed for television, so they're not the kind of things that work as viral video," said Schafer, who has worked with YouTube to promote new movies. "They're very professionally produced, and there's nothing subversive about the descriptions, which give away exactly what the clips are."

The ads also face difficulty on YouTube, where new content can easily fall into an anonymous sea of content. Search terms that could lead users to the anti-drug ads are far more likely to lead them to the much larger volume of pro-drug content, Schafer said, including do-it-yourself tutorials in marijuana cultivation and literally hundreds of spoof anti-drug ads. A YouTube search for the term "marijuana," for example, unearthed a satire of a well-known campaign from a few years ago, titled "Marijuana: My Anti-Drug."

Schafer said the most effective way of drawing attention to content in the YouTube universe is creating a YouTube channel and buying ad spots on the site to drive traffic to it--as Deep Focus did recently for a new movie from Dimension Films, "Pulse." Schafer explained: "The challenge historically was how do we take advantage of YouTube, not just as a vehicle for distribution, but for promotion? Now we can put video content on the site, pay for the promotion of it, and hopefully get some viral traction--all without interrupting the user experience, which is really the whole point."

Are Drug Cartels Gaining Upper Hand In Mexico? (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 21, 2006

As violence surges, U.S. officials fear government may be losing control of fight

WASHINGTON – Once encouraged by Mexico's assault on drug traffickers, U.S. officials now worry that the cartels' growing geographic reach and the recent killing of a judge and police officials are signs that the government may be losing control of the drug fight.

The powerful cartels are securing smuggling routes through Central America and are recruiting gunmen from there, say senior U.S. officials in Washington and Mexico City.

DOJ_NMG_0066905

"The concern is growing. There is a dramatic spike in violence," said one senior U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity. The tense presidential succession now under way in Mexico will make the coming months "very dangerous," the official said.

Law enforcement officials from both countries will meet today in the Texas border city of Laredo, in part at the urging of U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza, who last week described lawlessness in Mexico as an urgent problem. The U.S. Embassy issued a new travel advisory to Americans, warning them of a rising level of "brutal violence" throughout Mexico, especially along the border with Texas.

Mexican officials acknowledge the violence but say it is a result of their aggressive law enforcement efforts. They say the U.S. must share responsibility for the problem because of the continuing demand for illegal drugs. Foreign Minister Luis Ernesto Derbez called Mr. Garza's comments "unfortunate."

U.S. officials say there has been an accelerating breakdown of Mexico's rule of law, underscored by a spate of attacks on judicial and law enforcement officials:

• On Sept. 12, Police Chief Enrique Barrera Nevárez, 48, was gunned down in front of his house in Linares, just south of Monterrey in the state of Nuevo León, which borders Texas.

• On Sept. 1, the top police investigator for Nuevo León, Marcelo Garza y Garza, was shot to death in an upscale neighborhood of Monterrey.

• On Aug. 17, Federal Judge Rene Nieto Contreras was shot and killed in broad daylight in Toluca, in the state of Mexico. Judges are rarely attacked in Mexico, and some have begun demanding protection.

• On Aug. 7, assailants gunned down Marcos Arturo Nazar Contreras, chief of the Chihuahua State Agency for Investigations, in Ciudad Juárez, firing more than 30 bullets into his vehicle. Juárez is across the border from El Paso.

"This wave of killings is very unusual, rare and very strange," said José Arturo Yáñez Romero, a professor at Mexico's National Institute for Criminal Law. "These people were not targeted before, and that's what's so worrisome, especially when there's no accountability."

Colombia comparisons

The attacks against public officials have led some U.S. officials to compare the situation in Mexico to Colombia in the 1980s and '90s, when drug cartels declared war on the government and targeted police, judges and even politicians.

"It's a practice, a pattern of terrorism in that they are trying to influence public opinion about who's really in charge and what their capability is and to silence those who may want to come forward and help both of our governments," said a senior U.S. anti-narcotics official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

"Mexico is waking up to a new era of brutality. Anyone who gets in the way, including law enforcement, pays the price. They're turning it into this public spectacle. That's alarming."

Most of the victims of drug violence continue to be members of the drug-trafficking organizations, which are battling for control of turf and trading routes, officials say. More than 1,500 people have been killed this year in drug-related violence, and the violence has taken a brutal turn, with 13 beheadings in recent weeks.

Last week, authorities in the central state of Michoacán arrested three Guatemalan men, two of whom identified themselves as former soldiers. The men had 12 military-style assault rifles and nearly 3,000 bullets. Investigators said that they may have belonged to a brutal anti-insurgency battalion in Guatemala known as Kaibiles and that they may have participated in six beheadings this month in Uruapan, Michoacán.

Prosecutors said the men testified that there are more former Guatemalan soldiers in the state, fighting a fierce turf war between the Gulf cartel, based in Nuevo Laredo, and the local Milenio organization.

Current and former U.S. law enforcement officials say the brutal tactics, if not halted, may travel beyond the U.S.-Mexico border and into the United States.

"If these beheadings and other types of violence aren't curtailed in the killing fields of Mexico, don't be surprised that soon they will find their way to El Paso, Laredo or the Dallas metroplex," said Phil Jordan, former U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration chief in Dallas. "Narcoterrorism knows no boundaries."

Fighting corruption

U.S. officials are urging the incoming government of President-elect Felipe Calderón to deepen cooperation and to carry out, in the words of one, "the mother of all wars" against widening corruption, sometimes of entire police forces.

"We need to get to the point where we trust one another, where we don't feel like we're compromising our operation because we're working together and sharing intelligence," the senior U.S. official said.

Aides to Mr. Calderón, who has defined public security as one of his three priorities, said they would use aggressive money-laundering enforcement to seek to cut off the cash that fuels cartel violence and empower the military to take a more active role in anti-drug operations. Technically, the military cannot now enforce civilian law.

A new study by Mr. Yáñez found that 3,502 federal investigators of the attorney general's office have been investigated for corruption since 2001, and hundreds more for other crimes. The attorney general's office has 12,000 employees.

DOJ_NMG_0066906

In a presentation this month at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, Mr. Yáñez said that 400 members of the military have been killed in the battle against drug traffickers since 2000. More than 60 federal investigators have been killed in that period, along with hundreds from state and municipal police forces.

One of the issues troubling U.S. officials is the lack of response from Mexican law enforcement authorities in going after criminals who've assassinated government officials – setting a dangerous precedent for fellow police authorities and elected officials.

The recent killings of the judge and the police officials are examples of "where a line must be drawn and not allowed to cross," said the senior U.S. anti-narcotics official. "What we saw happening 10 to 15 years ago in Colombia is now very, very alive and well in Mexico.

"The dynamics between Mexico and Colombia are different, but the challenges are the same," the official said. "Mexico is waking up to a new era of violence never seen before."

Police under fire

In Villa Madero, Michoacán, the entire 32-member police force resigned or failed to show up for work this week after being threatened by drug traffickers, local authorities said. Members of the force complained about a lack of arms and communications equipment to protect themselves. The town is near the state capital of Morelia.

Mexican officials reject the comparison to Colombia. "How do you measure that?" said a senior Mexican official, speaking on condition of anonymity. The official, who helps oversee his country's anti-drug policy, added that the issue of drug trafficking is a shared problem with the U.S. and said that "blaming one side does more to hurt than help the fight."

U.S. authorities agree that drug trafficking is a shared responsibility and have praised the government of President Vicente Fox, insisting that cooperation has never been better and citing the extradition last week of drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Félix.

"While I'm the first to point out those instances where more can be done, particularly along the border, I've also got to say that this administration has been aggressive about extraditions and committed to doing what they can, when they can," Mr. Garza said. "President Fox has been unwavering in that regard, and I recognize and appreciate both his conviction and courage."

NATO To Provide More Afghanistan Troops (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- After weeks of prodding, European nations have agreed to provide more troops for the alliance in Afghanistan, where violence has surged and efforts to eradicate the opium crops are floundering, NATO's top commander said Wednesday.

U.S. Gen. James L. Jones said that requests for additional military aircraft have not yet been nailed down, but he is optimistic he will get the aircraft he needs. Jones said he is still looking for a commitment to send some helicopters.

Earlier this month Jones met with other military leaders, asking for about 2,500 troops to augment NATO forces in Afghanistan. On Wednesday, he said that Romania has agreed to send a battalion in October, and the United Kingdom and Canada are adding to their forces. Poland had previously said it would send a battalion and some special operations forces in January.

Those agreements, Jones said, would nearly meet the full troop requirements. There are currently about 20,000 NATO troops there, and another 21,000 U.S. troops.

Jones offered a mixed view of progress in Afghanistan. He said officials are not making headway on the opium problem, but recent military operations in the southern part of the country killed 1,000-1,500 Taliban, and forced others to retreat.

Violence has increased in the south because it is the center of the drug trade and the home of the Taliban, he said.

"We have disturbed a hornet's nest, and the hornets are swarming," he said. "We need to make them understand that that nest is not going to be there for them anymore in that particular region."

At any one time, he said, there are 3,000-4,000 Taliban in the country, but it is difficult to tell how quickly they can recruit more to replace those that were lost. And he said that some of the Taliban who retreated went to the western section of the country, where there may now be an increase in violence.

His assessment of the drug problems was bleaker.

"Narcotics is at the core of everything that can go wrong in Afghanistan if it's not properly tackled," said Jones, adding that, "we're not making progress; we're losing ground."

Officials have said opium production jumped 59 percent this year in Afghanistan, to a record 6,100 tons of opium -- a full 92 percent of the world's supply. The crop is used to fund terrorist groups. Jones said Wednesday that the Afghan government needs to commit more resources to the drug war and "start putting some big fish in jail."

NATO troops' role in the drug fight, he said, is limited to a supporting role of providing intelligence, making assessments and protecting those involved in counternarcotics operations.

"I'm in accord with those who say that it's not a military mission," said Jones. "Having NATO troops out there burning crops, for example, is not going to significantly contribute to the war on drugs. It's much more sophisticated and complex than that."

But the U.N.'s top counternarcorics official told Congress Wednesday that NATO forces in Afghanistan must help the Afghan Army to fight the opium trade there by destroying heroin labs, disbanding opium bazaars and attacking opium convoys.

DOJ_NMG_0066907

Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of the U.N.'s office on drugs and crime, warned that Afghanistan is "in danger of becoming a narco-state, where drugs determine power, rot society and fund terrorism."

Hearing that, members of the House International Relations Committee expressed alarm over the resurgence of the Taliban and the skyrocketing opium poppy production.

Afghanistan has been suffering its heaviest insurgent attacks since the Taliban regime was toppled in late 2001. Clashes and bombings left up to 34 Taliban fighters and one policeman dead in five separate incidents Tuesday in central and southern Afghanistan. On Monday three bombings killed 19 people, including four Canadian soldiers.

UN Official: NATO Must Help Fight Afghan Opium Trade (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP)--The U.N.'s top counternarcorics official said Wednesday that NATO forces in Afghanistan must help the Afghan Army to fight the opium trade there by destroying heroin labs, disbanding opium bazaars and attacking opium convoys.

Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of the U.N.'s office on drugs and crime, warned that Afghanistan is "in danger of becoming a narco-state, where drugs determine power, rot society and fund terrorism."

Costa's comments were prepared for delivery to a U.S. House International Relations Committee hearing that featured expressions of alarm by both Republicans and Democrats over the resurgence of the Taliban and the skyrocketing opium poppy production.

The hearing was convened to assess the situation in Afghanistan five years after Sept. 11.

Committee chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill., said "the window of opportunity in Afghanistan is imperiled."

He said that despite an upsurge in violence, "NATO has failed to respond" to a recent U.S. request for an increase in the deployment of troops from the 26-member alliance.

Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., underscoring Hyde's point, said Poland is the only NATO country to offer additional troops to Afghanistan - 900 soldiers by February. "We are witnessing the unraveling of NATO," he said. He added that the post-Taliban government in Afghanistan is "too weak, too poor and riddled with corruption" to provide basic services.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said the administration deserves a "failing grade" on Afghanistan, especially on the drug issue.

Costa noted that the opium yield this year in Afghanistan is up 59% "to a staggering 165,000 hectares." He estimated that Afghan heroin will have a street value of $50 billion.

"That's a massive windfall for organized crime, insurgents and terrorists," Costa said.

Members from both parties lambasted the administration for declining to send an official to the hearing to defend White House policy. U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann had been scheduled to speak to an afternoon session of the committee but sent word that he would not attend.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., was one of the few members to stand up for the administration on Afghanistan. While problems persist, he called the administration's effort there "a job well done."

Illegal Immigrant Gang Members Arrested (AP)

AP, September 21, 2006

Seven illegal immigrant gang members were arrested Tuesday night in Aurora as part of a joint operation by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and Aurora police, according to a release. All face criminal charges and/or deportation.

One of those arrested, Manuel Parra-Torres, 18, was found to have a shotgun and shells, ammunition and a police scanner in his Aurora residence, according to the release from ICE. He will face criminal charges of illegal alien in possession of a firearm, the release said.

Also arrested were Braulio Gutierrez-Montes, 18; Carlos Perez-Monarrez, 27; Juan Ibarra-Garcia, 35; Ricardo Herrera, 21; Luis Alberto Parra-Torres, 18; and Armando Rodriguez, 27, according to the release. All had been living in Aurora at the time of the arrest, according to Aurora police spokesman Dan Ferrelli.

All seven are Mexican nationals and documented members of the Latin Kings and Insane Deuces street gangs, the release said. All have past criminal records, including convictions for voluntary manslaughter, burglary, drunken driving and illegally possessing a firearm, according to the release.

Five are being held in ICE custody pending deportation, while two others will face possible criminal prosecution for re-entry after deportation, and an illegal alien possessing a firearm, the release said. They would then face deportation upon release.

The arrests were made by the ATF West Suburban Gang Violence Task Force, organized to combat the spread of gangs and gang-related violence in the western suburbs, the release said. ICE agents participated as part of "Operation Community Shield," a national initiative launched in February 2005 to dismantle violent street gangs with foreign-born members.

Since its inception, Operation Community Shield has resulted in arresting more than 3,400 gang members nationwide, representing 370 gangs, the release said. ICE agents in Chicago have arrested more than 175 gang members.

7 Alleged Gang Members Face Deportation (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, September 21, 2006

Seven men were arrested in Aurora Tuesday night, accused of being gang members and illegal immigrants from Mexico. All will face deportation, authorities said.

Two of the men also may be charged in a U.S. court for allegedly re-entering the country after being deported in the past.

One had a shotgun, shotgun shells and a police scanner when he was arrested in his Aurora home, authorities said.

One other alleged gang member and illegal immigrant allegedly had about 2.5 grams of marijuana in his possession, said Gail Montenegro, a spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, or ICE.

Four men are alleged to be Mexican nationals and will face deportation proceedings, authorities said.

All seven were accused of being members of either the Latin Kings or the Insane Deuces gangs and were handed over to immigration officials.

The arrests were the culmination of an investigation by three agencies—the ICE, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the Aurora Police Department—through the ATF's West Suburban Gang Violence Task Force.

2 Brothers To Plead No Contest In R.I. Fire (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

BOSTON, Sept. 20 — Two brothers who owned a Rhode Island nightclub where pyrotechnics ignited a fire that killed 100 people in 2003 will plead no contest to charges of involuntary manslaughter. One of them will not serve any prison time.

Under the plea agreement, announced Wednesday in a letter to victims' families by Rhode Island's attorney general, one of the men, Michael Derderian, will be sentenced to serve four years in a minimum security prison. His brother, Jeffrey Derderian, will be sentenced to three years of probation and 500 hours of community service.

The agreement, which came as jury selection was under way for the trial of Michael Derderian, resolves all criminal charges that stemmed from the horrific fire.

In February, Daniel Biechele, the manager of the band Great White, who had set off the pyrotechnics, pleaded guilty to 100 counts of involuntary manslaughter. He was sentenced to four years in prison.

In his letter Wednesday, the attorney general, Patrick C. Lynch, wrote, "Despite their desire to admit to the charges against them, I was unwilling to recommend or agree to the sentences that I have been advised the court will impose."

He added, "Most significantly, I strongly disagree with the court's intention to sentence Jeffrey Derderian to less than jail."

Jeffrey Derderian was in the club, called the Station in West Warwick, the night of the fire, but the authorities have said Michael Derderian played a greater role in buying and installing highly flammable sound-insulating foam around the stage that was almost instantly ignited by the pyrotechnics. Kathleen Hagerty, a lawyer for Michael Derderian, said the brothers agreed to the plea because "after learning what the effects on the people testifying were going to be, they didn't want to put them through it."

DOJ_NMG_0066909

The plea deal angered many relatives of the victims, as well as some of the 200 people who were injured in the blaze. Several said they would attend the Sept. 29 sentencing before Associate Justice Francis J. Darigan Jr. of Superior Court, who will hear from some of the victims and relatives.

"As far as I'm concerned, these guys are getting away with murder," said Charles Sweet of Pembroke, Mass., who lost his son Shawn, 28, an assistant grocery store manager, and Shawn's girlfriend, Laura Gillette. "I really thought that these two guys would be facing some serious jail time. I mean, they had 440 people inside that club, and the capacity was 300. My wife and I are devastated."

Anna Gruttadauria, whose daughter Pam, 33, the 100th victim, died after being hospitalized for two and a half months after the fire, said, "I think it's awful."

She said that many victims and relatives wanted to see the Derderians face trial, especially Michael. "I just wanted to see his face," she said. "I just wanted to see him go through something the way we did with our daughter. After four years he'll be walking free. My daughter is six feet under. I'll never see her face again."

IMMIGRATION:

Task Force On Immigration Fraud Becomes A Model (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria zeroed in on what seemed like an obvious target: immigrant-document and identity fraud.

Seven of the 19 hijackers had obtained fraudulent Virginia identity cards, taking advantage of a loophole in the state's rules for issuing driver's licenses and state identification cards. Northern Virginia, authorities believed, had become a hub for criminal rings that produced such documents.

"There was a combination of shock and urgency out of the notion that the 9/11 hijackers were right in our midst, that there was a sleeper cell that was operating in significant part in and around Northern Virginia," said Paul J. McNulty, then the U.S. attorney in Alexandria. "We knew we had a problem."

So McNulty started the nation's first document- and benefit-fraud task force, blending a unique combination of federal and state agencies. This month, the Alexandria-based task force broke one of its biggest cases: a marriage fraud ring that authorities said arranged scores of phony marriages, mostly in Arlington, to help illegal immigrants speed their route to U.S. citizenship.

And the crackdown that began on the edge of Old Town is now a model for the nation: Identical task forces recently opened in 10 cities across the country, and federal officials hope to blanket the nation with them by the end of next year.

"Many people don't view it as very glamorous, but our mandate is to work to regain the integrity of the immigration system, and this really does go to the heart of it," said Matthew Allen, deputy assistant director of the smuggling and public safety unit for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Law enforcement officials said that approaching immigration cases through a task force is more effective because it provides more agents and a broader perspective on what charges can be brought. In the past, ICE or its predecessor, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, investigated cases alone or with the help of one or two other agencies.

"It's more bodies and more law," McNulty, now U.S. deputy attorney general, said in an interview last week. "Task forces, pure and simple, allow you to get more done."

The task forces on document and benefit fraud bring together a variety of agencies in a collaboration that federal officials said is extraordinary. The regular members of the Alexandria-based unit, which began operations in January 2002, include the U.S. attorney's office, ICE, the Department of Labor, the Social Security Administration, the State Department, the IRS, the U.S. Postal Service, the Virginia Department of Motor Vehicles and the Fairfax County Police Department.

Other Northern Virginia police departments, primarily Arlington, participate on a case-by-case basis. Fairfax is a regular member because the immigration office for Northern Virginia is located there.

Officials said the benefits became clear as they worked on what became the task force's first big case: the conviction of Samuel G. Kooritzky, an Arlington lawyer sentenced to 10 years in prison in 2003 for a massive labor-certification fraud scheme that targeted immigrants. More than $6 million in seized funds and assets was eventually forfeited to the federal government in that case, including more than $4.6 million in restitution for Kooritzky's victims.

"Every agency brought something different to the table," said James Spero, unit chief of ICE's identity and benefit fraud unit. "The IRS helped us focus on money-laundering charges, because, prior to that, we were just kind of learning how to do money-laundering-style cases. Labor brought their expertise in the labor fraud itself. Citizenship and immigration services helped us analyze and collect the data found in the immigration files."

The task-force approach has also proved beneficial because it gets prosecutors involved from the start of each investigation, officials said, unlike in many cases in which they are brought in toward the end. "Instead of being reactionary to the cases themselves, this is more of a proactive approach, where we can actually analyze and discuss how to attack the vulnerabilities and shore up loopholes in the system," Spero said.

In the marriage-fraud case, 22 people were charged in U.S. District Court in Alexandria in what authorities called a scheme that may have arranged as many as 1,000 phony marriages, mostly in Arlington but also in Alexandria, Fairfax County, Manassas, the District and Maryland. According to the charges, illegal immigrants, mostly from West Africa, would pay as much as $6,000 to be introduced to their "spouse," usually on the day of the marriage. They would then be coached on how to lie to immigration inspectors to gain citizenship faster, according to the charges.

Immigrants who marry U.S. citizens can immediately get a visa to stay in the country, instead of having to wait years, and can shave several years off gaining citizenship.

Attorneys for several of the defendants declined to comment on the case after a recent court hearing.

In April, ICE and the Justice Department launched task forces using the Alexandria model in Atlanta, Boston, Dallas, Denver, Detroit, Los Angeles, New York, Newark, Philadelphia and St. Paul, Minn. Several more are being launched in the coming months, and ICE officials said they hope by the end of next year to have task forces operating in all 26 ICE field offices, which would cover the entire country.

"It's working extremely well," said Tony Rouco, ICE's supervisory special agent in Denver, where authorities said immigration-document fraud has been a major problem. "The flow of information is a lot easier."

Congress Debates Immigration Bills (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams

AP, September 21, 2006

Congress took up legislation to require voters to show proof of citizenship and to build a 700 mile fence along the Mexican border as Republicans sharpened their attacks on illegal immigration seven weeks before the midterm elections.

The House of Representatives debate on a new photo ID plan for voters, and Senate action on the fence, were part of a get-tough policy on illegal immigrants that Republicans have taken in the wake of failure to agree on broader legislation that would set a path for undocumented workers to attain U.S. citizenship.

House Republican leaders have insisted that tighter borders and tougher laws must precede immigration reform. The House passed the fence bill last week and plans to vote on Thursday on bills that will increase penalties for those building tunnels under the border, make it easier to detain and deport immigrant gang members and criminals, and clarify the ability of state and local law enforcement officers to detain illegal immigrants.

Republican sponsors of the voter identification bill insisted that it was a common sense way to stop fraud at the polls. People need photo IDs to board planes, buy alcohol or cash checks, said Rep. Vernon Ehlers, chairman of the House Administration Committee. "This is not a new concept."

But opposition Democrats assailed the legislation, saying it would affect minorities, the poor and the elderly — groups that tend to vote Democratic — who might have trouble producing a photo identification.

"This bill is tantamount to a 21st century poll tax," said Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer, D-Md. "It will disenfranchise large number of legal voters."

The bill would require individuals to present a photo ID before voting in federal elections by 2008. By 2010 voters must have a photo ID that certifies they are citizens. In response to criticisms that this would be a burden for poor citizens, the bill stipulates that states must provide those identification cards free of charge to those who can't afford them.

The Senate, meanwhile, voted to take up a bill that would build a fence along one-third of the U.S. Mexican border.

Action on the fence, which could cost billions of dollars, comes four months after the Senate approved legislation that, along with tightening border security, created a guest worker program and outlined how people in the country illegally could work toward legal status and eventual citizenship. President Bush has supported this broader approach, but it met strong resistance in the House, where opponents said it was tantamount to amnesty for illegal immigrants.

"While I've made it clear that I prefer a comprehensive solution, I have always said we need an enforcement-first approach to immigration reform," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Fris. "Not enforcement only, but enforcement first."

But Democratic leader Harry Reid countered that "we can build the tallest fence in the world and it won't fix our broken immigration system." To do that, he said, "we need the kind of comprehensive reform that the Senate passed earlier this year."

The bill would not provide funding to cover costs of the fencing and other barriers aimed at preventing illegal entry. About $1 billion for the fencing is likely to be included in a bill funding the Department of Homeland Security that Congress is expected to approve before its scheduled adjournment next week for the Nov. 7 elections.

GOP Advances Enforcement-First Approach For Border (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066911

WASHINGTON — Republicans pushing for tougher means to stem illegal immigration got a boost Wednesday when the Senate agreed to consider a bill that would build a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border and the House approved a measure that would require voters to show photo identification at the polls.

Republicans in both chambers said the steps were necessary to protect the United States from illegal immigrants entering the country or trying to corrupt the voting process.

Democrats dismissed the moves as political ploys aimed at the November midterm elections, in which many Republicans are making immigration a key issue.

"What we are doing here today is about November," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), in reference to the fence bill.

In fiery debate on the House voting bill, Democrats argued that there were no data to show that illegal immigrants voted, and that the bill would disenfranchise poor, elderly and minority citizens who tended to support the Democratic Party.

Republicans countered that the voting measure was necessary.

"We have 12 million illegal aliens in this country. Many of them, we believe, have been voting illegally," said Rep. Dan Burton (R-Ind.). "Every illegal vote takes away the right of one American's vote."

The voter identification bill is unlikely to become law anytime soon because the Senate is not expected to consider the bill this session.

Since the House and Senate failed this summer to agree on a compromise to overhaul immigration laws, House Republicans have insisted on the need to pass enforcement measures before broader changes are made.

The enforcement-first approach appears to have won out, with some Senate Republicans who backed broader reform now echoing their House colleagues on the need to take up enforcement first and pass the fence bill, which cleared the House on Sept. 14.

"The Secure Fence Act will have a significant impact on our security," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said. He emphasized that "this is not enforcement only; this is enforcement first."

But Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), who helped write parts of the Senate bill, said pursuing enforcement first could undermine support for a broader reorganization of the immigration system. "For those who think there's no need to do more, there would be little impetus" to consider broader reform, he said.

House leaders are expected to introduce three other immigration bills today that emphasize other aspects of enforcement.

One would affirm the "inherent authority" of state and local law enforcement to help enforce immigration laws. A second bill would allow the government to indefinitely detain immigrants who had served a jail sentence but who could not be deported. It would also let authorities deport or forbid entry to anyone they had reason to think belonged to a gang, whether the person had committed a crime or not. A third bill would make it a crime to build cross-border tunnels.

On the fence bill, the Senate voted 94 to 0 to consider a debate on the measure. The bill would require stretches of double-layered fencing, vehicle barriers and ground sensors covering one-third of the 2,000-mile border with Mexico. It would also require the Department of Homeland Security to certify that the border was secure within 18 months of implementation.

Frist said that he would like to begin debate on the fence measure today, and that he hadn't decided whether to allow senators the chance to add amendments to the bill.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said she would like to amend the bill to add an agricultural guest worker program to help California farmers, who were having difficulty finding the manpower to harvest crops.

House debate on the photo identification measure was intense before it was approved 228 to 196. The California delegation voted along party lines.

Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-San Jose) ridiculed the suggestion that illegal immigrants voted. "Illegal aliens are sneaking across the border for a job, not to vote," she said, arguing that requirements for photo identification were so expensive that they could keep the poor and some minorities from the polls.

But Rep. Charlie Norwood, a Georgia Republican, said that the issue "could likely determine the long-term fate of our republic. Tamper-proof ID is the only way to stop the influx of illegal voters into our system."

Democrats said there were no data to show whether voting by illegal immigrants was a problem. Norwood countered: "How the heck do we know we don't have any? We don't check."

G.O.P. In Senate Narrows Immigration Focus To 700-Mile Fence (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — Senate Republicans formally put aside a broad immigration overhaul sought by President Bush on Wednesday and decided instead to press ahead with narrower bills to require building 700 miles of fence on the southwestern border.

Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, said the fate of millions of illegal immigrants already in the United States had become a “fundamental sticking point” in trying to reach agreement with the House on a broad bill.

Mr. Frist said the fence proposal, which the House has passed, was the best alternative if lawmakers wanted to salvage some immigration changes before the Nov. 7 elections.

DOJ_NMG_0066912

"Let's focus on a problem the American people understand," the senator said, "and that is, we have hundreds of thousands of people coming across our border every year into our country."

He added that the broad measure could be considered when Congress returned in mid-November or next year.

The Senate voted, 94 to 0, to debate the measure on fencing and other border barriers at the cost of billions of dollars. But the fate of even that measure is unclear, because members of both parties have reservations, and Mr. Frist may need to block any amendments if he wants to deliver it to Mr. Bush before Congress adjourns next week.

The fence represents one element of the broad bipartisan measure that the Senate approved in May after Mr. Bush had delivered a prime-time address calling for sweeping changes in immigration law, including allowing some illegal immigrants to earn citizenship. House Republicans, fearing a backlash from the right, refused to consider any bill that could be called amnesty for illegal immigrants.

The two chambers never formally opened negotiations to reconcile the Senate bill with a strict border enforcement measure that the House approved in December.

Republican backers of the broad Senate approach suggested that the party could be penalized at the polls for not pursuing a comprehensive solution.

"It is one of the greatest problems facing the country today," Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said. "For the Republicans not to produce is not good. Perhaps we will find a little better mood in the lame-duck session."

Other Republicans said constituents were demanding that the government do a much better job of sealing borders before considering other aspects of an immigration overhaul like a temporary-worker program, new penalties for businesses that employ illegal immigrants and possible citizenship.

"This is putting the horse before the cart," Senator Rick Santorum, Republican of Pennsylvania, said about moving ahead with just the fence proposal.

The House passed its fence bill last week and is considering other enforcement measures this week in an effort to show that lawmakers are making progress on immigration. On Wednesday, the House voted, 228 to 196, to require voters to show proof of citizenship, a step that Republicans said would limit illegal immigrants' voting.

Democratic critics said requiring government-issued identification would amount to a modern poll tax that would discourage minorities and older Americans from voting. The House and Senate have previously voted in favor of building barriers along the border with Mexico. The proposal calls for two strips of concrete separated by a road along with cameras and other surveillance equipment at five locations. "I'm convinced that physical barriers at the border, fencing in particular, are important," said Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama.

Mr. Sessions said he was worried that Congress might approve the fence but not provide the money to build it. The Senate had previously added $1.8 billion to a Pentagon spending measure for the fence, a bill that is pending.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said the fence could cost $7 billion or more.

"We can build the tallest fence in the world, and it won't fix our broken immigration system," Mr. Reid said. "To do that, we need the kind of comprehensive reform that the Senate passed earlier this year."

The fence measure, which may not come to a vote in the Senate until next week, is drawing scrutiny from some border-state Republicans who worry that it would impose too many requirements on local governments involving locating the fence.

Senator Larry E. Craig, Republican of Idaho, is considering offering a plan to allow more agricultural workers to enter the country. Mr. Craig said a continuing crackdown on illegal immigrants along the Mexican border was leaving growers in the West short of workers.

"Fruit is not being picked; vegetables are not being harvested," Mr. Craig said.

A bipartisan group recommended on Wednesday overhauling the immigration system to make it more responsive to the demands of the labor market. After more than a year of research, the group recommended creating expedited visas for workers of all skill levels who have legal employment offers.

The group was led by former Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham, a Republican who is also a former senator from Michigan, and former Representative Lee H. Hamilton, the Indiana Democrat who was vice chairman of the Sept. 11 Commission.

The director of the bipartisan group was Doris M. Meissner, who was commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service under President Bill Clinton.

Throwing its support behind proposals passed by the Senate, the group called for "an earned path to permanent legal status" for an estimated 12 million illegal immigrants now living in the United States as "an essential element" of reform.

The panel called for federal aid to states to allay the costs of the legalization program, and it called on the White House to name an immigration coordinator and to focus on disrupting terrorists' travel with the same vigor it had brought to tracking terrorists' communications and finances.

Congress Resumes Immigration Efforts (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066913

The House and the Senate moved yesterday toward a piecemeal crackdown on illegal immigration, pushing forward separate bills to require photo identification to vote, build vast fences on the U.S.-Mexico border and speed the deportation of undocumented workers. The measures would take the place of President Bush's far broader rewrite of the nation's immigration laws.

Voting almost completely along party lines, the House voted 228 to 196 for a bill that would require all who register to vote in federal elections to show photo identification that proves they are U.S. citizens. The Senate, meanwhile, voted 94 to 0 to take up a measure passed by the House last week to build 700 miles of double-layered fencing on the U.S.-Mexico border, with a final vote to come as early as Monday.

Today, the House will take up bills to speed the deportation of undocumented workers, ratchet up penalties for immigrant gang members and human smugglers, end an exemption for Salvadoran illegal immigrants from rapid deportation, criminalize tunneling under the border, and overtly deputize state and local police officers to enforce federal immigration laws.

In an interview on CNN, President Bush said he would sign the measures, even though they do not embrace a more comprehensive approach -- including a guest-worker program -- that he has backed.

"Yes, I'll sign it into law," Bush said. "I would view this as an interim step. I don't view this as a final product."

Passage of the measures would permit leaders of the Republican-controlled Congress to claim they have taken steps to deal with the flood of illegal immigrants. It is an issue that has rent the party, spawned huge demonstrations in many cities last spring, and called into question the Republicans' ability to face tough issues. GOP leaders also believe that the hardening of legislative lines on illegal immigration and border security will bolster the party's conservative political support ahead of the midterm elections.

"Border security is national security," declared House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.), with House GOP leaders by his side. "We're going to try our doggonedest to enact as many of these bills as we can."

With little more than a week left before the Sept. 29 start of Congress's scheduled recess, GOP leaders are considering appending some or all of the bills to must-pass spending measures before they leave town. But Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) appeared to close off that avenue last night, saying he will not add any legislative language onto the spending bills that could slow their progress in the final days before the coming recess.

The sudden rush of activity startled immigrant and civil rights groups, which had largely thought a legislative response on immigration was dead for the year. The National Immigration Law Center sent out an "urgent" notice to allies to prod them into action, noting: "In recent days, there has been a serious deterioration of the position of pro-immigrant forces in Congress."

The lawmakers' embrace of a piecemeal approach came as members of a private task force on immigration reiterated their belief that a comprehensive solution is necessary to solve the nation's immigration problems. The task force's plan includes strong border enforcement and a program that allows undocumented workers currently in the country to remain by paying a stiff fine.

But it also proposes that the president and Congress establish two federal organizations that would regulate the flow of immigrants and help them assimilate into society. Former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), who co-chaired the Migration Policy Institute task force with former senator Spencer Abraham (R-Mich.), said the House's approach is draconian to immigrants, while a Senate bill approved in May is too complex.

Most of the provisions in the bills the lawmakers are now considering were plucked from the House's border security and anti-illegal-immigration bill that passed in December, then sparked protests this spring that brought millions of immigrants into the streets. But Republicans believe the politics of the immigration issue have shifted in favor of their get-tough approach. Even some Republicans who have backed Bush's approach, such as Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), said yesterday that the shift among voters in favor of "enforcement first" is palpable.

"While I've made it clear that I prefer a comprehensive solution, I have always said we need an enforcement-first approach to immigration reform," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), who surprised many immigration rights activists when he took up the House border-fencing bill.

Cecilia MuÃ±oz, vice president of the National Council of La Raza, warned that Republicans "are politically playing with fire" with Latino voters, who gave 40 percent of their vote to Bush in 2004.

The rhetoric in the House yesterday was particularly heated, with a stream of African American and Latino Democrats taking to the floor to denounce a voter ID bill that they called a "modern-day poll tax" designed to disenfranchise minority, elderly and disabled voters who lean Democratic.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) called the bill "a tawdry attempt by Republicans to suppress the votes of millions of Americans."

Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.), a soft-spoken moderate who helped craft the legislation, angrily called the charges nonsense, saying the bill authorizes funds to help state and local governments cover the costs of helping the poor obtain identification cards.

Under the bill, all states would be required to check photo identification by the November 2008 elections. By the 2010 elections, states could accept only identification that shows proof of citizenship, a passport or a new federal "Real ID" card authorized by Congress but not yet implemented.

DOJ_NMG_0066914

The bill coming before the Senate would authorize the construction, on the southern border, of 700 miles of double-layered fencing -- at an estimated cost of at least $3 million a mile -- and a "virtual fence" of cameras, sensors and unmanned aerial vehicles. That is nearly double the size of the fence approved by the Senate in May as part of its comprehensive immigration bill.

Task Force Rejects Push To Fence Border (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — As congressional Republicans pushed before the fall elections to extend fencing along the U.S.-Mexican border, leaders of a bipartisan task force Wednesday dismissed such an effort as a “piecemeal” approach that won't curb illegal immigration.

“We view this as much more than building fences,” said task force co-chairman Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman and vice chairman of the 9/11 Commission.

The move in Congress runs counter to what President Bush wants. Bills before the House of Representatives and Senate this week aim to make it harder for immigrants to cross the border illegally and easier to punish those who do.

The legislation does not address what to do about employers who hire illegal immigrants or with the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already living and working here.

Bush has said any immigration bill must be comprehensive and deal with a host of issues. That view was endorsed by task force leaders Hamilton and Spencer Abraham, a former Republican senator and Bush Cabinet member.

The House and Senate have been deadlocked for months on immigration.

Backers of the tough border enforcement bills say they will make the country safer.

“Border security is national security,” said Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif.

The Senate continues debate today on a bill to construct 700 miles of fence along the U.S.-Mexican border. The House passed the bill last week. Today in the House, lawmakers will consider three measures to increase penalties on illegal immigrants and speed deportations.

Some Republicans expressed concern that passing the border enforcement bills now will slow momentum for broader immigration legislation, which the Senate passed in May. The House passed a bill emphasizing border security in December. Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, who favors expanding opportunities for foreign agricultural workers, said crops are rotting in the field “because we in Congress haven't gotten our act together.”

For Democrats, the legislation presents a political dilemma. They must either support legislation that many consider inadequate or cast a vote that could be portrayed during fall campaigns as anti-border security. Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the deputy Democratic leader, said his party members haven't decided how they will vote on the border fence bill. “We'll wait and see how this unfolds.”

The immigration task force was convened by the Migration Policy Institute, a think tank that tracks immigration, and included participants from liberal immigrant-rights groups such as the National Council of La Raza and conservative groups such as the Manhattan Institute.

Most of the task force's 16 recommendations are not included in the immigration bills that have already passed the House or Senate. They include:

•Creating a biometric Social Security card that could be used to verify the legal employment status of job applicants.

•Giving illegal immigrants now living in the USA a chance to become citizens, as the Senate's comprehensive measure now does.

•Collapsing a system of dozens of entry visas into three groups of immigrants: permanent, provisional (for workers who might end up staying permanently) and temporary (for seasonal or part-time workers).

•Setting new legal immigration levels at 1.5 million people a year and establishing a commission to adjust levels up or down according to labor needs.

•Giving priority to immigrants with job skills the USA needs, such as farmworkers and engineers, which could reduce the number of visas available to family members of people now in the USA.

•Streamlining the labor certification system to allow employers to more easily hire foreign workers.

Abraham and Hamilton, who presented their proposals to White House aides and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., don't believe Congress will act quickly. “Our proposal is more long-term,” said Hamilton. “The politics of this are very tough.”

High-tech Plan Pitched To Fight Illegal Crossings (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Homeland Security Department is preparing to have hundreds of new camera towers installed along the nation's porous land borders as part of a multiyear effort to tighten security and dramatically slow illegal migration across the southern border.

DOJ_NMG_0066915

Secretary Michael Chertoff plans to announce today that the government will pay private contractors, including Boeing, tens of millions of dollars to set up high-tech towers to hold cameras and sensors that will help Border Patrol agents catch people crossing illegally. The contract also will include some unmanned aerial vehicles and ground-based radar systems.

Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., chairman of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Homeland Security, praised Chertoff for asking businesses to submit proposals for securing the border and said Congress will approve the money to pay for the new program.

“Is this the right plan?” Gregg said of the primarily cameras-and-sensors approach. “Is it going to work? Obviously the jury's out.”

He noted that a previous effort to install cameras along the border failed when the equipment didn't work well. “Hopefully, we learned some lessons,” Gregg said. “You've got to make sure you're on top of the contractors.”

T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, the union that represents border agents, is skeptical of any plan that relies on technology.

“They're applying the wrong solution to the problem,” said Bonner, adding that Congress needs to pass legislation to “stop the employment magnet.”

Immigration legislation promoted by President Bush that would create a “guest worker” program died amid political battles over a host of issues, including whether immigrants should be offered a path to citizenship.

The new technology is one piece of a multiyear Secure Border Initiative that Chertoff announced in 2005. Homeland Security is a third of the way toward doubling the number of border agents — from 9,000 in 2001 to 18,000 by the end of 2008. In the meantime, the effort to boost the number of so-called boots on the ground is now being aided by up to 6,000 National Guard troops.

The department also has ended a “catch-and-release” policy of allowing illegal immigrants to stay in the country, on their own, pending a court date. Many offenders simply never showed up in court and stayed in the country illegally. Now, those who are caught are sent home or held in detention centers pending court dates.

Maine Sen. Susan Collins, chairwoman of the Senate homeland security committee, said the new technology, which will initially be set up along the border in Arizona, “should greatly improve situational awareness of Border Patrol agents.”

Bonner said, however, that there still aren't enough agents and more cameras won't change that. “None of this technology catches people,” he said. “The cameras don't swoop down off the towers and grab people by the ankles until Border Patrol agents show up.”

He said he's disappointed that the only thing Congress can agree on is building 700 more miles of fencing. “As long as employers hire them (illegal migrants) in this country,” he said, “they're going to come by the millions.”

Plenty Of Holes Seen In A 'Virtual Fence' (WP)

Border Sensors Not Enough, Experts Say

The selection of Boeing Co. to erect a "virtual fence" along 6,000 miles of U.S. border marks a potential turning point in the government's long quest to stop illegal immigration, but its success hinges on overcoming obstacles that doomed past efforts, funding shortages and other problems with the country's immigration controls, according to experts and former U.S. officials.

Congress and the Department of Homeland Security must focus on overcoming technology and management problems that have derailed similar remote-sensing networks set up over the decades by the military and border agencies from Vietnam to Iraq to the southwestern United States, they said.

They also must acknowledge that as much as half of the illegal-immigration problem is driven by the hiring of people who enter the United States through official border points but use fraudulent documents or overstay visas to become part of the estimated population of 11 million illegal immigrants in the United States, former immigration officials and members of Congress said.

Surveillance by the government's $2.5 billion Secure Border Initiative Network, or SBInet, "makes some sense and is part of the solution," said former Indiana congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D), vice chairman of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. "It's also insufficient, I believe."

C. Stewart Verdery Jr., a former Bush administration assistant secretary for border policy, agreed that a "smart border" buildup alone is doomed to fail, given the government's track record and the labor needs of U.S. employers.

"Boeing and its subcontractors should be pushing the hardest for a comprehensive immigration solution," Verdery said.

Boeing proposes to construct a necklace of 1,800 towers equipped with cameras, sensors and links to sophisticated computers along the nation's vast frontiers with Mexico and Canada. The Department of Homeland Security is scheduled to announce Boeing as the winner of the competition today.

Boeing's plan rests heavily on adapting military technology from the battlefield to the border. The company has suggested, for instance, flying a camera-equipped, truck-mounted, 10-pound drone called the Skylark that Israeli and Australian forces have used to track suspects for as long as 90 minutes at a range of six miles.

Boeing also proposed a variety of ground-based sensors, including underground seismic sensors and tower-mounted motion and heat detectors that have been used to thwart insurgents in Iraq and Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0066916

Congressional backers and military experts are confident that technologies devised to detect troop movements and tank formations can be adapted for homeland security and, by extension, individual border crossers.

But scientists warn of bedeviling details, and analysts cite political pressures that have led to lavish spending on borders, technology and guards with few results.

Gervasio Prado, founder of SenTech Inc., a sensor maker that was part of two unsuccessful bid teams, said SBINet is good for his industry but is not likely to work.

"I don't think you'll make a dent really," because of the difficulty of managing information from 6,000 miles of sensors and the economic incentives for illegal migrants and their smugglers, he said. "I'd love to say that if you put thousands of sensors in that you could really solve the problem. But I think the help is going to be minimal."

Since 1995, spending on border security has increased tenfold, from $1.2 billion to $12.7 billion, and the number of Border Patrol agents has more than doubled, from 5,000 to 12,319, according to the House Appropriations Committee. Yet the number of illegal immigrants in the United States has jumped from 5 million to more than 11 million.

In addition, several experts said, tighter borders could discourage illegal immigrants already living here from attempting to leave for fear that they won't be able to reenter the country.

The Department of Homeland Security and the former Immigration and Naturalization Service spent $429 million since 1998 on video and remote surveillance on the borders. But nearly half of 489 planned cameras were never installed, 60 percent of sensor alerts are never investigated, 90 percent of the rest are false alarms, and only 1 percent overall resulted in arrests, the Homeland Security inspector general reported in December.

On April 25, the Border Patrol's first and only Predator 2 unmanned aerial vehicle crashed outside Tubac, Ariz., seven months after the $6.5 million craft began flights.

"There has been a huge amount of money poured into the border . . . but the track record of the performance of these technologies is disappointing," said Doris Meissner, former INS commissioner.

James Jay Carafano, senior research fellow at the Heritage Foundation, noted that Congress is moving to build 700 miles of border fence, at a cost of more than $2 billion, and adding about 2,500 border agents, at a cost of about $500 million a year, with an eye on this fall's elections.

By comparison, SBINet is funded at less than $130 million next year by the House and Senate, Carafano said. "If Congress is mandating all this money to go to guards and fences," he said, "my concern is there won't be enough money to put into place SBINet."

Other priorities that could lose the competition for funding are big-ticket programs to process and return illegal immigrants, develop computer systems to verify legal workers for U.S. companies, monitor visa compliance and tighten legal ports of entry, which will cost well over $10 billion, said Meissner and Steven A. Camarota, research director at the Center for Immigration Studies.

Boeing's record at delivering major technology is mixed. The company pointed to its success deploying baggage-screening devices to more than 400 airports in less than six months after the terrorist attacks. But the company's machines were criticized for being too large and having high false-alarm rates.

The inspector general's office has also found fault with the work of L-3 Communications, a Boeing subcontractor on SBInet. In December, investigators reported that cameras L-3 deployed for border security as part of the Integrated Surveillance Intelligence System malfunctioned when exposed to severe cold or heat.

Homeland Security officials want contractors to fully deploy their equipment in four years, and Boeing has said it can do it in three.

Gregory J. Pottie, a UCLA engineering professor who specializes in sensor technology, testified to the House last week that "if we want to solve this in three years, it could cost us a fortune and we're going to make a lot of mistakes."

The Great Wall Of America (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

It wasn't so long ago, during the Reagan era, that Republicans sought to tear down walls, not erect them. But last week House Republicans passed a bill to construct a 700-mile, double-layered fence along the Mexican border while also approving a study on building a similar wall-like structure along the Canadian border. Price tag for the Mexican portion: $7 billion.

Sixty-four Democrats joined all but six Republicans in voting for the measure, and the Senate GOP may also now vote to build this Great Wall of America. Later this week the House will vote on legislation that would deputize local police forces as agents of the border patrol. This will further burden local law enforcement that already has enough work handling bona fide felons. What we have here is panicked Republicans engaging in pre-election theatrics as they seek to remind voters that they're tough on the illegal immigration problem they've done nothing to actually solve.

Here's one example of how tough they are. Steve King of Iowa suggested in front of the C-SPAN cameras that at the top of this new fence "we electrify this wire with the kind of current that would not kill somebody, but it would be a discouragement for them to be fooling around with it." Then he added: "We do this with livestock all the time." Equating people with cattle: There's an inclusive political message for you.

Few really believe that a fence will do much to keep out those who threaten our safety, such as smugglers, drug runners or terrorists. None of the 9/11 terrorists snuck across the Mexican border illegally; they entered the U.S. with lawful visas. Nor will a wall deter illegal workers, who are drawn here by the powerful magnetic pull of economic opportunity and plentiful jobs.

Democratic Governor Janet Napolitano of Arizona wasn't much off the mark when she once said that "You show me a 50-foot wall and I'll show you a 51-foot ladder at the border" to get over it. These migrant workers are resourceful people, which is one reason they meld so productively into the U.S. labor force. As the U.S. becomes more commercially integrated with Mexico and Canada, the restrictionists' strange utopia of a sealed border becomes even more impossible.

Nor is a "sealed border" desirable, even if it could be achieved. More than nine of 10 of the three million net new jobs created from 2000-05 have been filled by immigrants, according to Census Bureau data. With many regions of the country now suffering from a shortage of workers, not even Pat Buchanan could argue with a straight face that immigrants are stealing jobs from Americans. The fence itself will probably have to be built by immigrants.

The refrain on immigration from Republican lawmakers is that "we support legal, but not illegal, immigration." That sounds fine -- except that for six years the Republicans have done virtually nothing to allow more immigrants to enter the U.S. legally even as the demand for their services has soared. The quotas for skill-based high tech workers, the so-called H1-B visas, have been reduced by almost half -- to America's own economic detriment. Nor has the House lifted a finger this year to deal with a critical shortage of nurses and agriculture workers. That's a big reason one-half to two-thirds of the crop pickers in America are here illegally.

Republicans cite polls indicating that Americans want a secure border, but the political appeal of walls and fences is exaggerated. Just last week Don Goldwater, the man who held a press conference at the border urging, "Mr. Bush, build this wall now," was defeated in a GOP primary for Governor of Arizona -- in the very border state where these policies were thought to be most popular. The Arizona Republican who won a Congressional primary on immigration in the Tucson district is expected to lose in November.

The only real way to reduce the flow of illegal Mexican immigration is to provide a legal, orderly process to match open American jobs with workers who want to fill them. Mr. Bush is for that, and so is the Senate, but House Republicans have concluded that they're better off building fences. When Ronald Reagan spoke of America being a "shining city on a hill," he wasn't thinking of one surrounded by electrified barbed-wire fences.

Tear Down This Wall Bill (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

PICTURE A WALL ALONG the entire border with Mexico. The problem with the United States' current immigration policies, as we have previously illustrated in this space, is that there would be two contradictory signs posted on such a wall — one reading "Do Not Trespass," the other reading "Help Wanted: Inquire Within."

Building an actual wall won't resolve the schizophrenia underlying our approach to immigration. That's why it's so disappointing to watch the U.S. Senate, which passed comprehensive immigration reform earlier in the year, considering following the path of the more shortsighted House by taking up a simplistic, enforcement-only measure — to build, you guessed it, a fence along the border. Senators should vote "no" on the Secure Fence Act.

The bill would authorize the construction of 700 miles of at least double-layer fencing with all the fixings — more patrols, unmanned aerial craft, sensors, satellites, radar, lighting and cameras — along select parts of the nearly 2,000-mile southern U.S. border. The bill is before the Senate, which could vote on it as early as Monday.

Given that the Senate passed comprehensive reform only four months ago and appropriated some money for the fence last month, it should know that sound immigration reform requires addressing all three parts of the immigration puzzle at once: border security, the undocumented immigrants in the country and the visa system. A wall is fine, but not by itself. Addressing border security alone won't fulfill the economy's need for a legal supply of labor, and it will leave millions of illegal immigrants already here hidden in a vast underground. And fence or no fence, the 45% of illegal immigrants who overstay legal visas instead of returning across the border would continue to do so.

The visa system — which offers a laughably insufficient number of work visas each year for low-skilled workers — would still be backlogged and wouldn't be able to address the country's economic needs in the way a guest worker program and increased visas for low- and high-skilled workers would.

Members of the Senate who support comprehensive reform but who advocate the Secure Fence Act — like Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist — say other elements of comprehensive reform can come after November. Even if comprehensive reform were taken up at the start of the new Congress, however, elements such as a guest worker program need time to work properly. Waiting on a guest worker program would make the delays worse and would harm the economy.

If the Senate passes piecemeal enforcement measures, it will erode its ability to negotiate a more comprehensive approach with House leaders who myopically insist on treating immigration solely as a law enforcement issue.

Providence Man Agrees To Stop Alleged Tax Fraud Scheme (AP)

AP, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - A Providence man has agreed to stop marketing an alleged tax fraud scheme under a federal court order.

Officials from the Justice Department say Eric Messier falsely advised customers that they could avoid paying federal income taxes by treating their assets and income as a "corporation sole" -- a church or charity organization with tax benefits in some states.

A government's complaint filed in the U-S District Court in Rhode Island says customers paid Messier between 25-hundred dollars and 10-thousand dollars to participate in the scheme.

The court order gives Messier 15 days to remove from his Web site all information advertising the scheme and to give the government a list of his customer's names and other personal

Federal Judge Denies KPMG Request For Jury Trial On Defense Fees (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 21, 2006

A federal judge Monday denied accounting firm KPMG's request for a jury trial over the issue of whether it should advance defense costs to its former employees who are now facing criminal tax fraud charges.

Southern District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan, in United States v. Jeffrey Stein, S1 05 Crim. 0888, ruled that the employee claim was for specific performance of a contract. Thus, he said that it was equitable in nature and did not require a jury trial.

As a result of the ruling, Kaplan will decide whether the employees are entitled to legal fees. He had already refused to dismiss the employees' claim and compel arbitration of the issue. KPMG filed a notice Monday asking the 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals to reverse the decision.

Attorneys for KPMG had argued in their memorandum of law in opposition to the former employees' motion to strike KPMG's jury demand that the former employees' breach of contract claim is an "action at law" and one for which KPMG is entitled to a trial by jury.

Kaplan, however, said that the monetary relief the former KPMG executives seek would be "exactly the type of monetary relief that courts, and the Restatement [of Contracts], envision as equitable relief; they are incidental to the grant of equitable relief, yet are necessary to afford complete relief."

In reaching this decision, Kaplan quoted the 6th Circuit in its decision in Golden v. Kelsey-Hayes Co., 73 F.3d 648.

Kaplan's ruling on the jury issue was released on the same day that KPMG filed its answer to the civil complaint filed against it by its former employees. The company argued as an affirmative defense that the complaint is barred in whole or in part because the former employees, through their conduct, "have unclean hands and are at fault in bringing about any loss and harm they might suffer."

KPMG also argued that forcing it to pony up what could amount to millions of dollars in legal fees would amount to an unconstitutional taking in violation of its due process rights.

Attorneys for KPMG singled out former executive David Greenberg, and former employee Robert Pfaff in their answer. KPMG accused Greenberg of embezzlement and fraud, saying Greenberg intentionally concealed his illegal conduct from KPMG and the government. It said Pfaff received compensation in the form of "side fees" from tax shelter promoters while he was a KPMG partner.

"KPMG suffered actual injury and damages as a result of this conduct, by [Mr.] Pfaff," KPMG said.

The company accused Jeffrey Stein, a former vice chairman of the company, and former Chief Financial Officer Richard Rosenthal of breaching their fiduciary duty to the company.

Richard Smith, KPMG's former chairman of tax services, was also accused of breach of fiduciary duty.

Charles A. Stillman, a partner at Stillman, Friedman & Shechtman, and Robert S. Bennett and Sheila L. Birnbaum, partners at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, represent KPMG. Bennett declined to comment, as did Stillman.

David Spears, a partner at Spears & Imes who represents Stein, did not return calls to comment on the latest claims against his client.

Susan R. Necheles, a partner at Hafetz & Necheles who represents Rosenthal, and David C. Scheper, a partner at Overland Borenstein Scheper & Kim who represents Pfaff, also did not return calls for comment.

Robert S. Fink, a partner at Kostelanetz & Fink who represents Smith, declined to comment, as did Leonard F. Lesser, a partner at Simon Lesser who represents Greenberg.

Inquiry Of Bank Expands To KPMG Austria's Staff (WSJ)

By David Crawford In Berlin And Carrick Mollenkamp In London

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066919

The investigation by Austrian prosecutors of more than $2 billion in losses at Bawag P.S.K. Group, the Vienna bank at the center of the Refco Inc. scandal, has expanded to the roles played by employees of the bank's auditor, KPMG Austria GmbH, according to people familiar with the matter.

Refco, a huge commodities brokerage firm, last year disclosed that its chief executive officer allegedly had helped to hide bad debt. That revelation ultimately led Refco to file for bankruptcy-law protection and to the discovery that Bawag had played a key role in the alleged debt scheme. The CEO, Phillip R. Bennett, who faces criminal charges, has denied the allegations.

More recently, prosecutors have focused on how Bawag reported assets and losses. At the center of the investigation are the KPMG audits of the bank between 1994 and 2005 that failed to reveal misreporting of bank assets and losses. Witnesses have told prosecutors that Robert Reiter, a former partner and head of the accounting firm's auditing subsidiary in Vienna, KPMG Alpen-Treuhand GmbH, advised the bank on how to book hundreds of millions of dollars in losses so they wouldn't be visible to public scrutiny, according to the witnesses' statements.

A KPMG Austria spokeswoman yesterday said the auditing firm itself isn't under investigation. At the time the matters under investigation allegedly took place, there was no law in Austria that allowed for the criminal investigation of companies. She added that the firm has full confidence in Mr. Reiter's integrity. "KPMG is convinced it was proper to give our unrestricted confirmation of Bawag's annual reports," the spokeswoman said.

Mr. Reiter couldn't be reached for comment.

KPMG Austria is the local affiliate of KPMG's global network. While firms within the network share the KPMG name, they operate as legally independent partnerships. Such arrangements are designed to prevent problems at one firm from affecting others in the network. As a result, any potential problems tied to Bawag could be contained to employees at KPMG's Austrian unit and not impact firms in other countries.

Austrian authorities have interviewed key bank figures. Earlier this year, in a statement to investigators, former Bawag CEO Helmut Elsner said Mr. Reiter attended an emergency Bawag management-board meeting in 2000. That meeting was called after Austrian businessman Wolfgang Flottl revealed he had lost €433 million, or $549 million at current exchange rates, from bad bets on the pricing of the yen. Mr. Flottl is the son of the former head of the bank. After the meeting, a KPMG representative agreed not to mention the loss in KPMG's statement in the bank's annual report if the Austrian Trade Union Federation, Bawag's majority shareholder, gave a guarantee to cover the loss, according to an Austrian National Bank audit.

The KPMG audit for Bawag's 2000 results said, "We are convinced the said transactions have been properly booked and evaluated, particularly in the field of derivatives," according to an Austrian Finance Ministry report.

Mr. Reiter was the lead auditor of Bawag for KPMG. Mr. Elsner was arrested last week at his home in France. Neither Mr. Elsner nor his lawyer could be reached for comment. Mr. Flottl has denied any wrongdoing. A spokesman for the Vienna prosecutor's office declined to comment.

This summer, Bawag reached a settlement with U.S. authorities, including the Justice Department, and Refco creditors. That settlement potentially could total $675 million.

IRS Investigates Calif. Church (AP-Y)

By Gillian Flaccus

AP, September 21, 2006

With the campaign season in full swing, a liberal church is locked in an escalating dispute with the IRS over an anti-war sermon — delivered two days before the 2004 presidential election — that could cost the congregation its tax-exempt status.

Religious leaders on both the right and left are watching closely, afraid the confrontation at All Saints Church in this Los Angeles suburb will compromise their ability to speak out on issues of moral importance such as abortion and gay marriage during the midterm elections.

Under federal tax law, church officials can legally discuss politics, but to retain tax-exempt status, they cannot endorse candidates or parties. Most who do so receive a warning.

According to the IRS, the only church ever to be stripped of its tax-exempt status for partisan politicking was the Church at Pierce Creek near Binghamton, N.Y., which was penalized in 1995 after running full-page ads against President Clinton in USA Today and The Washington Times in 1992 during election season.

Before this fall's congressional races, the IRS warned that it would be scrutinizing churches and charities — important platforms, particularly for Republicans — for unlawful political activity.

All Saints is an Episcopalian church of about 3,500 — the largest west of the Mississippi — and has long had a reputation for liberal social activism among its largely affluent, Democratic-leaning membership. During World War II, its rector spoke out against the internment of Japanese Americans. The Rev. George Regas, who headed the church for 28 years before retiring in 1995, was well known for opposing the Vietnam War, championing female clergy and supporting gays in the church.

The dispute centers on a sermon titled "If Jesus Debated Senator Kerry and President Bush" that Regas delivered as a guest pastor. Though he did not endorse a candidate, he said Jesus would condemn the Iraq war and Bush's doctrine of pre-emptive war.

DOJ_NMG_0066920

"I believe Jesus would say to Bush and Kerry: `War is itself the most extreme form of terrorism. President Bush, you have not made dramatically clear what have been the human consequences of the war in Iraq,'" Regas said, according to a transcript.

The IRS reprimanded the church in June 2005 and asked that it promise to be more careful. Church officials refused.

Last week, the IRS demanded documents and an interview with the rector by the end of the month. Church officials will probably fight the action, said the rector, the Rev. Ed Bacon. That would mean the IRS would have to ask for a hearing before a judge.

"You can't talk about the love of the neighbor without talking about public policy," Bacon said.

Pastors elsewhere echoed those sentiments.

In South Dakota, where citizens in November will vote on the nation's most restrictive abortion law, preachers have taken classes to avoid breaking federal law.

"I would think that that speech should not be censored and neither should ours," said the Rev. Ron Traub of the Pasadena case.

Traub, senior pastor at the First Assembly of God in Sioux Falls, S.D., said he never mentions candidates by name but tells his congregation to vote for the abortion ban and for politicians who espouse the church's values.

"When the IRS comes into my pulpit and tells me I cannot speak on issues, on spiritual and moral issues, I believe my congregation will be willing to stand with me and say, `If you want to take away our IRS status, go ahead,'" he said. "The only approval that we need is the approval of God."

Steve Miller, commissioner of the IRS tax-exempt and government entities division, would not comment on the specifics of the investigation but denied the agency had any partisan agenda.

"It's a delicate area, there's no question," Miller said. "But we are not trying to curtail people's right to speak."

Miller said the agency completed investigations of 90 tax-exempt churches and charities in 2004 and found wrongdoing in 70 percent of the cases. Four — none of them churches — lost their tax-exempt status. In 2005, the agency began audits of 70 churches and charities and has 40 cases pending so far this year.

Earlier this year, IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson promised more robust enforcement.

In recent years, Republicans in particular have teamed with conservative evangelical leaders to motivate would-be voters, a strategy credited with helping President Bush win re-election. Intensified IRS enforcement could erode the relationship between religious and political leaders, according to some political strategists.

"The IRS action will hinder the ability of some of the churches to make their lists available, to make their pulpits available, to make their sanctuaries available," said Democratic strategist Donna Brazile.

Others say the All Saints case will barely affect politicians' use of churches.

All Saints has been known as "a headquarters for political activity" since the 1970s, said Steve Frank, a GOP consultant who organizes churches for political campaigns. The IRS is probably using the sermon as an excuse to investigate the church's expenditures, Frank said.

"It's not a question of the IRS going after one ideology. They're going after anybody that violates the law," he said. "The reality is it doesn't stop a minister from teaching ... what they believe is the truth within the Bible."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Panel Backs Bush's FDA Nominee (AP-Y)

AP, September 21, 2006

A Senate committee Wednesday approved President Bush's nominee to head the Food and Drug Administration, but a full Senate vote to confirm Dr. Andrew von Eschenbach was in doubt.

Von Eschenbach overcame earlier stalling tactics by two Democratic senators pending an agency decision to allow nonprescription sales of the morning-after pill. But now two Republican senators have pledged to block his confirmation, each for separate reasons.

Sen. Jim DeMint of South Carolina, wants von Eschenbach to suspend sales of the abortion pill RU-486 and investigate whether it increases the likelihood of infection by a rare but deadly bacterium. Louisiana Sen. David Vitter wants the FDA to legalize the importation of some prescription drugs from Canada.

Von Eschenbach has headed the FDA on an acting basis for the past year. The agency has been without a permanent head for all but 18 months of the Bush administration.

"We need a strong leader at the FDA right now, one who has a mandate to act," said Sen. Mike Enzi, R-Wyo. "There are many items before the FDA that require the immediate attention of an FDA commissioner vested with full authority. It is time (for) the Senate to move forward with this nomination."

Enzi is chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, which approved von Eschenbach's nomination by voice vote Wednesday.

The nominee hopes to be confirmed and "looks forward to working with Congress on the FDA's broad and ambitious public health agenda," FDA spokeswoman Susan Bro said in a statement.

F.D.A. Nominee Advances; Hurdles Linger (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — A Senate committee voted on Wednesday to approve Andrew von Eschenbach to head the Food and Drug Administration, but hurdles to his confirmation remain.

Dr. von Eschenbach has been acting commissioner for a year. Action on his nomination was held up for six months because of objections from two Democratic senators, and now two Republicans have promised to delay a confirmation vote for entirely different reasons.

All of which left Senator Michael B. Enzi, the chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, uncharacteristically testy on Wednesday.

"The F.D.A. commissioner has to be the toughest thing outside of a Supreme Court justice to get passed around here," Mr. Enzi, a Wyoming Republican, said after the hearing.

Mr. Enzi said he and Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, the senior Democrat on the panel, would work to persuade their colleagues to approve Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination "virtually full time" until the Senate convenes next week.

But with each passing day, the chances narrow that Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination will be approved. As it was on Wednesday, the committee had trouble assembling a quorum. Its hearing was delayed, and then it moved to a small reception room in the Capitol that barely fit the more than 50 staff members, reporters and senators who crammed into it.

When enough senators finally filtered in, Mr. Enzi read through the bills and nominations before the committee like an auctioneer fearing rain. Only Senator Barbara A. Mikulski, Democrat of Maryland, managed to get in a word edgewise.

"As you know, the F.D.A. is located in my state," Ms. Mikulski said, as the crush of reporters and staff towered above her. "There is a crisis of morale at the F.D.A., and I take him at his word that he will deal appropriately with this."

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, started to speak next. "Mr. Chairman, I — — " was as far as she got. Mr. Enzi raised his hand.

"We'll keep the record open for the rest of the day to reflect any members' statements," he said, and glanced at Mrs. Clinton, who nodded in return. He asked for a vote. It was unanimous.

And that was it.

Senator David Vitter, Republican of Louisiana, has promised to hold up Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination until the Bush administration agrees to legalize imports of cheaper drugs from abroad. And Senator Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, said he would not allow the nomination to proceed until Dr. von Eschenbach took action to suspend sales of RU-486, the abortion drug. The F.D.A is not expected to take any such action soon.

Any senator can place a "hold" on a presidential nomination, preventing the full Senate from voting on it.

With so little time left in the current session, even a brief delay in voting on Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination would probably end his chances of being confirmed until December at the earliest. If the Senate fails to act before January, President Bush would have to renominate him.

The F.D.A. has been without a confirmed commissioner for all but 18 months of the Bush administration.

Previously, Mrs. Clinton and Senator Patty Murray, Democrat of Washington, had held up Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination as a protest against the agency's three-year delay in deciding whether to allow over-the-counter sales of the emergency contraceptive Plan B. Last month, Dr. von Eschenbach approved the Plan B application, removing the Democrats' objections.

Mr. Enzi noted that he and Mr. Kennedy had written a bill that proposes overhauling the way the F.D.A. monitors the safety of marketed drugs.

"It's hard to do those kinds of reforms without a confirmed commissioner," Mr. Enzi said.

Chris Dodd, U.N. Ambassadors Blocking Bolton's Confirmation (NHUL)

By Robert Novak

New Hampshire Union Leader, September 21, 2006

THE FOCUS temporarily is on Sen. Lincoln Chafee, a frequently unfathomable maverick Republican, as the days dwindle down for this Congress to permit John Bolton to continue as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. But Bolton's two-year struggle to get confirmed can be directly traced to a determined Democratic senator and the vengeful U.N. secretariat.

Senate Republican Whip Mitch McConnell sat down Tuesday for a heart-to-heart talk with Chafee, pleading with him to permit Bolton's nomination to reach the Senate floor. The reason Chafee is in this pivotal position can be attributed to Sen. Christopher Dodd's fierce open opposition to Bolton, and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan's stealthy sabotage, executed by his deputy, Mark Malloch Brown.

Bolton's ordeal provides a cautionary tale for any foreign policy conservative who wants to serve his country in Washington.

Indeed, some of Bolton's colleagues in the State Department (where he was an under secretary in George W. Bush's first term) were backstabbing when the President named him U.N. envoy. Bolton's overriding defect was his anti-Castro views, which collided with

DOJ_NMG_0066922

Dodd's goal of "normalizing" relations with Communist Cuba. Dodd was able to mobilize Democratic colleagues in a deadlock -- creating demand for executive branch documents involving Bolton.

Republican Sen. George Voinovich did not like Bolton's blunt answers to his Democratic antagonists in last year's Foreign Relations Committee hearings. He unexpectedly voted against Bolton but permitted the nomination to reach the floor without recommendation. That did not help find the 60-vote supermajority to cut off a Dodd-managed filibuster.

Bolton's vigorous U.N. performance under a recess appointment made Aug. 5, 2005, when the Senate was not in session, convinced the fair-minded Voinovich to change his position.

Bolton was set for a favorable committee roll call on Sept. 7 when it became clear that the White House had misread Chafee in believing it had his vote for Bolton. The President's political team had gone all out for Chafee, who was fighting for his political life in the Sept. 12 Rhode Island Republican primary. Nevertheless, Chafee informed Chairman Richard Lugar he could not support Bolton, and Lugar cancelled the committee meeting.

Chafee's avowed complaint, laid out in a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, had nothing to do with Bolton's performance at the U.N. Chafee complained that U.S. Middle East policy under Bush tilted too much toward Israel, and demanded an answer before he would discuss Bolton's nomination.

Although the Bush administration generally answers letters from Capitol Hill with glacial speed, Rice immediately responded to Chafee. The senator, however, was in no hurry to get back to Washington from Rhode Island after his renomination. Thus, McConnell waited a week before pressing Chafee Tuesday to support Bolton (as he did last year) or at least permit the nomination to go to the Senate floor. The outcome of the meeting was not divulged.

Dodd still lies in wait, hoping to filibuster Bolton again, but he does not appear to have the votes this time. AIPAC, the pro-Israel lobby, now backs Bolton, and the usually partisan Democrat Sen. Charles Schumer has indicated he will change his vote from last year and vote for cloture to end debate.

Bolton's confirmation for another two years at the U.N. would be bad news for the secretariat. According to U.N. sources, Malloch Brown has been stirring up anti-Bolton sentiment with his fellow ambassadors, who in turn have contacted senators. Bolton has demanded reform at the U.N., and that has not made him popular with the world organization's bureaucrats. They would like nothing better than to give this conservative diplomat his comeuppance.

Nomination On Hold For Public Broadcasting Post (LAT)

By Matea Gold

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

NEW YORK — Television sitcom producer Warren Bell's appointment to the board of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting appears in jeopardy after the Senate Commerce Committee on Wednesday abruptly pulled him from a nomination hearing scheduled for today.

A spokesman for Republican Sen. Ted Stevens of Alaska, the committee chairman, said Bell was removed from the agenda because several senators on the panel had concerns about his nomination. Hearings for two other CPB nominees — former Arkansas Sen. David H. Pryor and Chris Boskin, a board member of San Francisco's public broadcasting TV station KQED — are still going forward today.

Bell, executive producer and show-runner of ABC's "According to Jim," was tapped by President Bush in June to serve on the board of the private, nonprofit corporation that distributes federal funds to local public television and radio stations.

The selection of the outspoken conservative disquieted many public broadcasting officials, who were troubled by partisan comments Bell has posted on the website of the conservative National Review magazine. His sharp opinions caused some broadcasters to fear that Bell would rekindle the fierce political debate that engulfed the corporation last year under the leadership of former Chairman Kenneth Y. Tomlinson.

Bell — who described himself in a May 2005 column as "thoroughly conservative in ways that strike horror into the hearts of my Hollywood colleagues" — said in an interview in July that he would set aside his politics as a CPB board member.

"My intent for my service with CPB is to ensure a strong, healthy, vibrant public broadcasting system for everyone to be proud of," he said.

The White House said Wednesday that Bush had not withdrawn Bell's name.

"President Bush continues to support his nomination," said Emily Lawrimore, a White House spokeswoman.

But committee sources said it remained unclear whether Bell's hearing would be rescheduled or whether the panel would ask Bush to submit someone else.

"This is an indication that a critical mass of the Senate Commerce Committee, including the leadership, shares with us some pretty serious reservations about the credentials of Mr. Bell," said John Lawson, president of the Assn. of Public Television Stations.

Bell said he had no comment on the committee's move.

DOJ_NMG_0066923

The panel's wariness about his nomination underscores the desire among many lawmakers to avoid the politicization that occurred during Tomlinson's tenure, when his efforts to promote more conservatives within public broadcasting stirred controversy. He resigned after an internal investigation found that he had broken federal law.

In recent days, the debate over Bell's nomination intensified as former and current colleagues of the veteran producer came forward with conflicting accounts of his philosophy about public broadcasting.

In a letter sent Tuesday to the committee's ranking members, a married writing-and-producing team that worked with Bell for two years on "According to Jim" stated that they often heard him say that federal money should not be "wasted" on programs like public broadcasting.

Jeffrey B. Hodes and Nastaran Dibai said the topic came up during political discussions that frequently arose in the show's Studio City production offices. They served as executive producers on the ABC comedy before leaving in 2005.

At one point, "We said to him, 'How would you change CPB?' " Hodes said in an interview. "He said, 'I would dismantle it.' "

Another former writer on "According to Jim," who declined to be named out of fear his comments could jeopardize his employment in the industry, said he also heard Bell make a similar remark.

Bell rejected their accounts.

"I wholeheartedly support federal funding for public broadcasting, and I always have," he wrote in an e-mail Wednesday.

Many of his staff have come forward to back him.

Ron Hart, an executive producer on "According to Jim" who has worked with Bell for three years, said he never heard him express a desire to eliminate funding for public broadcasting.

"He was worried people were going to go after him because there's a perception that conservatives want to get rid of it, but he didn't have that opinion," said Hart, who described himself as liberal.

In addition, 16 current and former colleagues of Bell voiced support for his nomination in a letter to the committee's ranking members, stating that while many of them did not share his political views, they believed he would be good for CPB.

"He's a smart, intelligent, creative guy," said Chris Nowak, a writer on "According to Jim" who drafted the letter. While Bell is his boss, he said he was supporting him on his own volition.

All of Bell's colleagues agreed that he was vocal about his conservative politics, an outlook that made him stand out among the show's largely liberal staff. Political subjects spark banter and debate in the writing room, but "Warren is a reasonable dude," said Nowak, adding that he shared some of Bell's viewpoints.

However, Bell's contributions to the National Review Online — including a piece in which he said he would hug House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), except "that sort of thing leaves a stain" — disturbed public broadcasting officials. (Bell has said that the comment was a joke.)

Some broadcasters also questioned Bell's credentials for the post. While he has worked for 17 years on sitcoms such as "Life's Work," "Ellen" and "Coach," he does not have any public broadcasting experience.

Bell said in July that he was surprised by the nomination, but added that he viewed it as an opportunity use his expertise in scripted programming to help PBS develop a stronger schedule.

Senators, Judges Face Off Over Breaking Up 9th Circuit (AP)

By Erica Werner, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Senators, judges and a Bush administration official clashed Wednesday over splitting up a San Francisco-based federal appeals court, with Democrats charging political motives by Republicans fed up with the court's left-leaning rulings.

Not so, said Republicans. They contended the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, by far the nation's largest federal circuit, has gotten too big to be effective and would operate better if split in two.

"At what point is it unmanageable?" Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., asked at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing.

The 9th Circuit covers nine states with about 54 million people and the appeals court has 28 judgeships.

It's so big the judges don't all hear cases together as they do in other circuits. Critics, including the Bush Justice Department, argue there are inconsistencies from one ruling by the court to another.

The court has also issued a series of rulings that outraged Republicans - for example, a 2002 opinion that declared the Pledge of Allegiance unconstitutional when recited in public schools. Its rulings often are reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Ensign and Alaska Republican Sen. Lisa Murkowski have sponsored legislation that would break the circuit in two. A new 9th Circuit would cover California, Hawaii and the Pacific Islands, and a new 12th Circuit would cover Alaska, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Nevada and Arizona.

Similar legislation passed the House in December. Breaking up the court has been a longtime Republican goal.

"Let's be frank: the motivation behind splitting the circuit is political," said Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont. "It's an attempt to control the decisions of the judiciary by rearranging the bench."

Most judges on the circuit oppose the break-up. Judges testified for and against Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0066924

The hearing featured a clash between Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., and Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand of the Justice Department's office of legal policy.

The Justice Department now supports the circuit split but has opposed it under past administrations.

"What has changed?" Feinstein demanded to know.

Brand responded that the Justice Department, often a party to litigation before the 9th Circuit, has concluded it moves too slowly and sometimes has inconsistent decisions.

Feinstein said she's never heard such a complaint from the Justice Department, including once when she had lunch with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"So I can only conclude, and I must just say this, that this is political, that it has nothing to do with the performance of the circuit," Feinstein said.

"Our opposition has nothing to do with the outcome of any particular case," Brand responded.

"There is a very strong Justice interest in consistency in the law. People have to know what the law is," she said.

Feinstein told Brand to give her written examples showing where the circuit has been inconsistent.

"The Justice Department has now joined the fray and I want them to put up," she said.

High Court Advocate Gets A Little Help From Friends On Missed Deadline (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 21, 2006

Every lawyer's nightmare -- inadvertently missing a court filing deadline -- has come true for Roy Englert Jr. Adding to the pain is that the court whose deadline he missed is the Supreme Court, where such mistakes tend to get noticed more than they might elsewhere.

But if there is any consolation, it is this: As competitive as the Supreme Court practice is, it is collegial enough that some of Englert's brothers at the bar have rallied to his side. Former Solicitors General Charles Fried and Seth Waxman have filed a brief asking the Court to clarify its rule that Englert ran afoul of and, in the process, to accept his out-of-time petition. As the brief, written by Fried, notes, "There but for the grace of God go I." The Court will consider the issue at its conference Monday.

Englert, a veteran Supreme Court practitioner and partner at Washington's Robbins, Russell, Englert, Orseck & Untereiner, was hired by Northwest Airlines to file a petition challenging a decision by the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that sided with Spirit Airlines in a long-simmering predatory-pricing dispute. The suit originally filed by Spirit has not gone to trial, but the appeals court decided some significant issues, about what a jury needs to consider, in Spirit's favor.

On April 17 the office of Northwest's 6th Circuit counsel alerted Robbins Russell that the circuit court had denied a petition for a rehearing of the case. For Englert that meant he had 90 days to file a petition with the Supreme Court.

He did just that on July 17, and the case of Northwest Airlines v. Spirit Airlines was given the docket number 06-77. But on July 20 a Supreme Court case analyst in the clerk's office called Englert with bad news; according to the 6th Circuit, the denial of rehearing was actually issued April 13, not April 17, making the petition to the Supreme Court several days late. Since Englert had not requested an extension during the 90-day period -- extensions of up to 60 days are allowed by statute -- the petition was deemed out of time. The case was yanked from the docket, meaning the 6th Circuit ruling would stand. Not a good result for Northwest.

The next day, Englert filed a motion asking the Court to direct the clerk to accept the petition out of time, an action reported first by Scotusblog, a weblog that focuses on Supreme Court developments. Englert took full responsibility for the error but described it as "classic excusable neglect" that did not prejudice any party in the case. While recognizing that the Court has been strict about enforcing its deadlines, Englert argued that nothing in the relevant statutes precludes parties from seeking an extension after the 90-day deadline has passed.

"The Court has the freedom to take into account all circumstances," Englert argued in the motion, "in exercising its discretion whether to accept the petition, but the Court's power to do so is beyond reasonable question."

In an interview, Englert says, "This is not a happy moment in my life." He adds, "I have never missed a court deadline like this in 25 years of practice."

Englert acknowledges that "courts have to have deadlines," and he understands the clerk's interest in treating all petitioners equally. "But the Court has been taking an unduly harsh attitude, without Congress saying it has to."

Englert declined to say what Northwest's reaction to the situation has been, and efforts to obtain a comment from the company were unsuccessful. Spirit's lawyers also did not return messages, and they have not filed a reply to Englert's motion -- nor are they required to. In the lawsuit, Spirit claims Northwest illegally undercut its ticket prices in the 1990s to drive Spirit out of the Boston and Philadelphia markets.

Meanwhile, Englert has sought out some top-drawer amicus curiae help from former solicitors general. Both Fried and Waxman agreed; Kenneth Starr, the only other former SG he asked, did not respond, according to Englert.

Fried also argues that the deadline issue "is an open question that should be resolved by the Court itself. So far, it seems to have been decided only by the clerk's office."

DOJ_NMG_0066925

Currently a Harvard Law School professor, Fried says he was glad to write the brief gratis on Englert's behalf. "I would no sooner charge for it than I would bill my grandson for milk and cookies."

Fried agrees that his brief is an example of the collegiality of the Supreme Court Bar. "Lawyers are professional adversaries and professional friends, and when someone you work with and sometimes work against is in a situation like this, one ought to consider stepping up to the plate," Fried says. "Collegiality is what makes it a profession, and there's not enough of it."

Collegiality or no, other high court advocates say that Englert and his amici will have an extremely hard time persuading the Court to relax its rule. The high court views the 90-day rule as a jurisdictional matter, which means that after the 90th day, the Court does not even think it has jurisdiction over a case.

"I feel for Roy. It could happen to any of us," says another high court veteran, who preferred to remain unnamed. "But I don't see what's in it for the Court to grant his motion."

But not all is lost for Northwest, even if Englert's motion fails. The case would go back to lower courts for trial, and on appeal it could return to the Supreme Court, presumably meeting deadlines every step of the way.

GAO Report: VA Underestimated Care Costs (WP/AP)

By Jennifer Talhelm

The Washington Post/AP, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The government used prewar data to estimate the cost of caring for veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan, contributing to a $3 billion budget shortfall at the Veterans Affairs Department since 2005, congressional investigators say.

The department used "unrealistic assumptions, errors in estimation and insufficient data" to project its budget, the Government Accountability Office said in a report Wednesday.

Investigators also said the VA failed to estimate correctly the costs for these war veterans partly because the agency could not get accurate information from the Defense Department.

In addition, the VA agency failed to tell Congress in a timely way that it was struggling to meet its expenses. The problems led officials to make requests for an extra $3 billion last year, according to the GAO.

Department officials said they agreed with the findings and were working to improve. Secretary Jim Nicholson said in a statement that the VA uses "highly reliable actuarial projections of health care demand" but that the agency continues to "refine" its modeling.

"The bottom line is to provide the leading-edge health care and benefits that our veterans deserve," he said.

Democrats, who requested the report, used it to criticize the Bush administration for what they said was inadequate care of veterans from the two wars. The VA will receive about $31.5 billion to provide health care for about 5.4 million patients this year.

The report is "a stunning indictment of this administration's commitment to our troops," said Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash.

Democrats urged Nicholson to provide an accurate plan for how it will meet veterans' needs in the future.

"We should not be running a VA system that is going to be short on the funding for health care," said Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo.

House Democrats began circulating a letter to President Bush asking that he "fully fund" the VA so it will not have to rely on "accounting gimmicks" and "inaccurate health care projections" when developing its budget.

Investigators said the VA knew 2005 would be a tight budget year and attempted to manage the expenses and cut costs. But officials were overly optimistic _ and sometimes plain wrong _ about how effective the changes could be, the GAO found.

One plan called for the VA to reduce the average daily patient workload in its nursing homes. But the proposal would have required the agency to cut staff and discharge or transfer in a short time potentially thousands of veterans with severe, chronic physical or mental disabilities.

The plan also would have forced the veterans to dip into Medicaid, private insurance or their own savings to pay for care, the GAO found.

Instead, in June 2005, with three months left in the budget year, the administration requested an extra $975 million from Congress to meet its expenses. That included $273 million for Iraq and Afghanistan veterans.

A month later, the administration asked for an additional $1.977 billion for the 2006 budget year.

In response, Congress required the VA to provide quarterly status reports. But the GAO review found the agency has omitted important information from the reports about the cost to treat patients.

The agency has since worked to improve its estimates and its coordination with Congress and the administration's budget office, according to the GAO.

Top Republican Says Ney Should Resign (AP-Y)

By David Hammer

AP, September 21, 2006

A member of the Republican leadership added his name to the list of GOP lawmakers calling for Rep. Bob Ney to resign.

When reporters asked some GOP leaders Wednesday whether Ney should resign, House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., responded, "Absolutely."

DOJ_NMG_0066926

Last week, Ney admitted improperly accepting trips, meals, sports tickets and casino chips while trying to win favors for a disgraced Washington lobbyist and a foreign aviation company. The six-term lawmaker remains in a rehabilitation center for treatment of alcohol abuse, a problem he disclosed when his agreement to plead guilty was announced Friday.

Ohio state Sen. Joy Padgett, who was hand-picked by Ney to run to replace him, called on the House to move as soon as possible to expel Ney from Congress if he doesn't resign immediately. The House can expel a member with a two-thirds majority vote.

Other Republicans calling for Ney to resign include fellow Ohioans Steve Chabot, Deborah Pryce, Ralph Regula and Pat Tiberi. House Majority Leader John Boehner has said the decision of whether to resign is entirely up to Ney and his family.

Pryce repeated her call for Ney's resignation.

"It's a tragedy this happened to his family, but he has betrayed the trust of his constituents," she said.

Ney lawyer William Lawler said Ney still had no plans to resign.

Pressure Mounts For Ney To Resign (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, September 21, 2006

Republicans are calling for Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) to resign before he appears in court next month, but some fear his enrollment in a treatment facility for alcohol abuse might prevent the congressman from heeding those calls.

Republicans in Ney's home state of Ohio have been among the first to call for his resignation before his scheduled court appearance Oct. 13.

Joy Padgett, the Republican running to replace him, called on Ney to step down on Monday, and Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), who is locked in her own difficult reelection fight, said yesterday that her Ohio colleague should step down before his court date.

"I feel that the members from Ohio believe very strongly that Bob Ney should resign," Pryce said during a media briefing yesterday. "It's a tragedy that this happened to his family, but he has betrayed the trust of his constituents and his colleagues."

Leaving that briefing, Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) said he also believed Ney should resign in response to follow-up questions about Pryce's remarks.

Pryce and others have suggested Ney's enrollment in a rehabilitation center for alcohol abuse prevents members and staff from contacting him while he is admitted.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), who has said Ney himself must determine whether or not to resign, briefly mentioned the possibility that Democrats may introduce a resolution to expel Ney from the House during the GOP's regular closed-door session Wednesday morning, members and staff in the meeting said.

"I feel sorry for him and really feel sorry for his family, but there has been no conversations about it amongst us in terms of what he should or shouldn't do," Boehner told reporters on Tuesday.

Any member can call for a vote to expel the Ohio Republican after notifying leadership of plans to bring a privileged resolution to the floor – majority and minority leaders do not need to give notice to bring a resolution to the floor.

Democratic leaders are taking a wait-and-see approach to whether they will offer a resolution to expel Ney, according to a Democratic leadership aide. So far, they have avoided signaling whether or not they plan to offer such a resolution, preferring instead to keep Ney in the news so that House Republicans must continue to ask questions about him.

Boehner and some leadership aides have suggested that Ney must first plead guilty before they could proceed to expel him.

The official expulsion process, which would be managed by members of the House ethics committee, is a three-step process that requires a formal investigation – one was initiated in May – a hearing before a separate sub-panel and a vote by the entire committee. The entire House would then vote on the matter after the committee vote.

Earlier this week, Republican Reps. Rick Renzi (Ariz.) and Heather Wilson (N.M.) announced that they had donated campaign contributions they had received from Ney to charity. The Ohio Republican has not been a prolific donor this election cycle.

Ney has given $4,000 to Republican candidates this cycle, all of which was donated during 2005, according to PoliticalMoneyLine.com and the Center for Responsive Politics website.

Those contributions include $2,500 to House candidate Pat DeWine, who lost in the special-election primary to fill former Rep. Rob Portman's (R-Ohio) suburban Cincinnati seat, $1,000 to Rep. Mike Conaway (R-Texas) and $500 to Rep. Thelma Drake (R-Va.).

Leaders Boost Pressure On Ney (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, September 21, 2006

With three weeks still left before Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) officially pleads guilty to a pair of federal charges, House Republican leaders on Wednesday stepped up their public calls for the embattled lawmaker to resign from the chamber immediately.

DOJ_NMG_0066927

While House Majority Leader John Boehner (R) remained reluctant to pressure his fellow Ohioan to step down from his post — and Democrats so far have stopped short of pushing an expulsion resolution on the House floor — Boehner's fellow leaders were far more definitive in their statements.

"I do, as a member from Ohio, believe very strongly that Bob Ney should resign," House Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce told reporters Wednesday. "It's a tragedy that's happened to his family but he has betrayed the trust of his constituents and his colleagues here in the House."

When asked if Pryce's view was the position of leadership, House Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) responded, "Yep, absolutely."

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has made no public announcements on Ney's resignation but indicated Wednesday that he was working on getting a letter from the Ohioan soon.

"We'll get this worked out," he said, when asked if Ney should offer his resignation.

House GOP leaders aren't the only Republicans pushing for Ney to step down now. In Ohio's 18th district, the candidate Ney endorsed to succeed him, state Sen. Joy Padgett (R), said earlier this week that if Ney doesn't resign the House should expel him as soon as possible.

Padgett has been attacked by Democrats for her endorsement by Ney, and some Republican lawmakers privately fear that the longer Ney remains in office, the longer they will have to deal on the campaign trail with stories about GOP corruption.

Last week Ney announced he would plead guilty to conspiracy and making false statements on Oct. 13 in federal court, and Boehner said Tuesday he did not believe that Ney should have to resign before that date.

"After Oct.13, when he is scheduled to go to court, or up until Oct. 13, when he is scheduled to go to court, they could change the agreement, he could change his mind," Boehner said. "A lot of things could happen between now and then and I would prefer to allow this decision to be his."

Ney did send letters of resignation to Hastert last Friday to relinquish his remaining committee chairmanship, but his office has not said when Ney plans to resign from the House. Ney's office did not return calls seeking comment Wednesday.

Ney currently is in a rehabilitation facility seeking treatment for alcoholism, which has garnered him some level of sympathy from his House colleagues, even as some Republicans remain angry that Ney repeatedly swore he was innocent before agreeing to plead guilty to federal charges.

Both Republican and Democratic House leaders are at this point reluctant to force Ney out of the House with a formal House vote, known as a motion to expel, although Democrats are reserving the right to do so.

"We would hope that Mr. Ney would do the right thing and resign," said Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

House GOP aides suggested that Ney could be postponing his resignation for financial reasons, as House Members are paid on the first of every month, and a resignation beforehand would deprive Ney — who has no personal wealth — and his family of a significant portion of his Congressional income.

Legislation On Pets In Emergencies Is Sent To Bush (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

Congress called for emergency preparedness plans that include helping individuals and families with pets, under legislation sent to President Bush. The bill calls for state and local emergency preparedness plans to make provisions for families with pets and individuals with service animals. It grants the Federal Emergency Management Agency the authority to help state and local governments develop emergency and evacuation plans that take pets and service animals into account. It also authorizes some federal financial help for states establishing emergency shelters for people and their pets.

Senators Criticize Regulators Over New Mortgages (WP)

By Kirstin Downey

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

At a Senate Banking Committee hearing yesterday, legislators and consumer advocates prodded federal banking regulators to move more quickly to put restrictions on non-traditional mortgage lending, because, they said, the new kinds of mortgages may place borrowers and lenders at financial risk.

"It seems to me there's been a race to the bottom" in lending standards, said Sen. Jim Bunning (R-Ky.). He said that consumers don't seem to understand the new products, and that if real estate values continue to fall, the market "pullback" could become "a prelude to a crash."

"There's a plethora of new products that are destroying the lives of a whole lot of people," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D- N.Y.). "These were intended for rich, sophisticated buyers but they have been sold to the least sophisticated and most vulnerable."

The popular loans, which include various adjustable-rate mortgages, interest-only loans and what are called "option" adjustables, share a common feature in that they allow borrowers to pay less money now but require them to pay more, sometimes much more, later. Monthly payments could double or triple when borrowers are required to pay the full interest and principal on the loan, several years down the road. About half of all non-traditional loans now require borrowers to pay a hefty fee, known as a prepayment penalty, if they try to sell the home or refinance to get better terms, according to George Hanzimanolis, a mortgage broker who spoke at the hearing.

The lending industry has defended non-traditional loans as a key reason that homeownership has reached a near-record high despite steep home prices. They say the loans can be tailored to meet individual needs, rather than the one-size-fits-all loans of past decades. But consumer advocates and an increasing number of legislators have questioned whether borrowers really understand what they are doing.

Last year, federal banking regulators said they intended to issue a regulatory "guidance," which is a kind of warning, to tell lenders to be more careful in making these loans and to make sure consumers understood them. At yesterday's hearing, the regulators said the guidance was still a few weeks away, something they have been telling legislators for several months.

Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) pushed the bank regulators appearing before the committee to say when, exactly, the guidance would be issued. Regulators from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and Office of the Comptroller of the Currency said "soon" or "in a matter of weeks, not months."

"We were hoping for something more specific," Allard said.

Until recently, the lending industry had said the loans were being marketed to people with only the strongest financial records. But a report released yesterday by the Government Accountability Office found that about three-quarters of people whose option-ARM loans were packaged into securities in the first half of 2005 were not required to fully document their income.

The mortgage market has changed quickly, and senators and banking industry regulators and officials grappled yesterday with the ramifications. Only six years ago, most borrowers had either simple fixed-rate or adjustable-rate loans, but now more than one-third, particularly people in high-cost areas such as the District and California, have opted for the new variants, which are typically originated by mortgage brokers on behalf of lenders, who then sell the loans on the secondary market as securities. Traditionally, banks made loans to people they thought were good credit risks and held the loans or sold them to government-backed entities such as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, which resold many of them. But now many are sold as securities to other investors who appear to have a much higher risk tolerance.

Regulators Hit Backloaded Mortgages (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

Federal regulators found serious problems with backloaded mortgages that enabled buyers to buy high-priced homes in Washington and other booming markets, after examining the portfolios of six huge banks that make half the mortgage loans in the United States.

Sandra Thompson, a director at the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., testified yesterday that some borrowers were not qualified to make escalating payments required under the loans, and the banks loosened their standards considerably to enable buyers to qualify, including "layering on" risks such as requiring no down payment or proof of income.

The problems raise the risk of defaults and foreclosures as the housing market stagnates, she told the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee in Congress' first hearing on the new breed of mortgages, sometimes called "exotic" or "alternative" loans because they do not offer standard, fixed payments like those on 30-year mortgages.

Ms. Thompson said the bank insurance agency and other federal regulators soon will be issuing rules that prohibit banks from offering loans to consumers who cannot handle future payment increases and require more rigorous disclosures about the risks of the mortgages.

State banking regulators at the hearing said they would, as reported in The Washington Times, pass the federal rules along to the half of mortgage lenders, including state banks and mortgage brokers, not regulated by the federal bank agencies.

Exotic mortgage products such as "interest-only" loans and "optional payment [adjustable -rate mortgages]" took the mortgage market by storm when they started to be widely offered in 2003, jumping to become one-third of all loans issued nationally and half of the loans issued in high-priced markets like Washington in the past year, according to the FDIC.

All the mortgages have one essential characteristic: They allow borrowers to make minimal interest payments in the first few months or years, but at the cost of ballooning payments in future years that can double or triple the monthly bill.

Mortgage brokers often did little to warn consumers about the risks of exploding payments in marketing the loans, the regulators said. Brokers say privately they expect most borrowers to refinance the loans when the higher payments come due -- yielding more business and fees for the brokers -- or end up "house poor," without the money to spend on just about anything but their mortgage if they are to avoid default.

The enticing but risky loans were an essential fuel feeding the housing boom that ended last year, the regulators said. During the housing boom, home prices doubled nationwide and tripled or more in Washington and other East and West Coast cities, an unprecedented run-up that many economists think constituted a housing bubble that is now bursting.

"The acceleration of the home price boom does appear to have been related to changes in the mortgage markets," Ms. Thompson said. "The greater availability of flexible mortgage structures probably allowed price increases to outstrip growth in incomes," while "high-priced homes probably induced at least some borrowers to use interest-only or payment-option mortgages in order to afford their homes."

One important change in the market that facilitated the boom in exotic loans was the advent of large private pools of investors, often gigantic hedge funds marshaling the resources of both domestic and foreign investors, she said. These investor pools, many of which had much lower underwriting standards than banks, stepped into the void created by the withdrawal of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac from the loan-pooling market since 2003.

The FDIC sounded a strong warning about the risks to both borrowers and lenders now that the housing boom has ended. Foreclosures already are rising this year among borrowers faced with sharply higher loan payments.

Orice Williams, director at the Government Accountability Office, Congress' investigative arm, testified that it is too soon to tell whether exotic mortgages will lead to greatly increased defaults and foreclosures, but she said it is clear that better disclosures are needed to ensure consumers understand the loans and know what they're facing.

Exotic loans have been "concentrated in regional markets on the East and West coasts in states such as California, Washington, Virginia and Maryland," she said.

"A wide spectrum of borrowers may not fully understand their risks," she said, because they often have complicated terms, the advertising emphasizes the benefits rather than risks, and the disclosures consumers do receive are hard to understand.

She said federal regulators should revamp the decades-old Truth in Lending Act to require disclosures that cover loan features that add to consumer debt burdens but are not understood by many consumers.

Sandra F. Braunstein, a director at the Federal Reserve, said the central bank is rewriting the Truth in Lending Act regulations to address exotic loans, but she did not indicate when the new rules would appear.

Military Tests 1st Synthetic Fuel For Jets (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, September 21, 2006

More flights are just days away; airlines could reap benefits

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — A 46-year-old jet lumbered off a runway this week on a flight that could lead to a new domestic fuel source, not just for the military but for commercial aviation as well.

An Air Force crew took the aging B-52 bomber aloft for more than two hours above the Mojave desert test range here in the military's first jet flight powered with synthetic fuel.

Air Force Undersecretary Ronald Sega declared the flight a success, even though an unrelated technical problem — a balky hydraulic landing gear — prompted the crew to cut short planned test maneuvers.

The Air Force's experiment is being watched by a commercial aviation industry eager to stabilize and cut fuel costs, which have soared along with the price of oil this year.

Sega, the Air Force's top energy official, said establishing the viability of synthetic fuel “is potentially important to others as well as” the military. Once testing on the B-52 is complete, he said, the Air Force will try the fuel in more modern jet engines, including those that power the KC-135 airborne refueling tanker, which uses the same engines as the Boeing 737, a workhorse of airlines.

“Some of the engines we have are the same as in commercial aviation,” said Sega, a pilot and former space shuttle astronaut who rode in the cockpit for the test flight.

“We think this is a test that has potentially huge ramifications,” said Maj. Gen. Curtis Bedke, commander of the test center here.

The Air Transport Association, the airlines' trade group, said it “strongly supports the development of alternatives to traditional oil-based jet fuel.”

The bomber took off just after dawn with two of its eight engines powered with a 50-50 mixture of jet fuel, called JP-8, and a colorless synthetic fuel produced by a Tulsa-based company, Syntroleum. The synthetic was produced from natural gas, but officials said coal — which the nation has in abundance — could be used to produce an identical fuel.

The Air Force previously conducted more than 100 hours of ground tests with the fuel mixture. Within days, it plans to conduct more test flights, including use of the synthetic in all eight of the B-52's engines.

The objective of the tests is to establish that the 50-50 synthetic mixture produces engine performance equal to that of pure jet fuel, Air Force officials said. Their hope is that a switch to a synthetic mixture can be made without modifying aircraft engines, fuel systems and performance standards. The B-52 was chosen because its relatively old-fashioned fuel system permits crewmembers to manually direct fuel from specific tanks to each engine, making it easy to isolate the new mixture and measure its performance. Also, said Col. Arnie Bunch, crews were trained to land the craft under partial power if two engines fail.

DOJ_NMG_0066930

Sega said engines running the new fuel appeared to operate identically to the other engines, though researchers will pore over flight data before reaching conclusions. He said the Air Force may also consider other mixtures, including a higher proportion of synthetic, which tests suggest burns with less pollution than regular fuel.

While new to the military's skies, synthetic fuel has a long history. It was championed in the late 1970s by the Carter administration, before the collapse of oil prices reduced interest and economic viability.

Sega said the method of turning raw carbon sources such as coal or natural gas into usable fuel was developed by German scientists in the 1920s and used briefly by Germany during World War II and later by South Africa.

The Air Force, which is the military's largest user of fuel, began looking at the idea anew in 1999, said Michael Aimone, the Air Force's assistant deputy chief of staff for logistics. He said the Air Force uses 2.6 billion gallons of jet fuel a year, at a cost of $4.5 billion.

Commercial U.S. airlines burn more than 53 million gallons of jet fuel per day, the industry group says. Fuel now amounts to 20% to 30% of total airline operating costs, twice the historical average, it said.

The project took on a new priority after President Bush, in his Jan. 31 State of the Union speech, set the goal of using technology to replace more than 75% of oil imports from the Middle East by 2025.

Bedke and other military officials said they don't know yet what kind of cost savings, if any, could be gained from using synthetic fuel. But its viability has grown with the price of oil. Beyond such savings, however, the officials said there are strong potential benefits of synthetic fuel, including cleaner emissions and a stable domestic energy source.

Workers To Get Their Pick Of Dental, Vision Plans (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

The new dental and vision benefit program for federal employees and retirees tries to fill a gap in their health-care coverage by offering a mix of national and regional plans that vary in cost and enrollment options.

The program's design should make the federal premiums competitive with plans offered in the private sector, officials at the Office of Personnel Management think. By law, the government cannot provide a subsidy for the new benefits, but enrollees who stay in dental and vision networks will have lower costs.

The OPM officials kicked off the new dental-vision program yesterday after announcing premium increases for the federal employees health insurance program. Federal employees and retirees will have to do some homework to determine which dental and vision options best fit their needs, of course. But OPM briefing materials provided a snapshot of the program's design and the options offered by 10 vendors.

As with their health insurance, federal employees will be able to pay their dental-vision premiums on a pretax basis through a payroll deduction. Retirees may have their premiums withheld from their monthly pension checks, but the Internal Revenue Code does not provide a tax break for retirees.

When enrolling, federal employees and retirees will select one of three options: self-only coverage; self plus one, for the enrollee and a family member; and self and family, for eligible family members (such as unmarried, dependent children under 22).

In the Washington area, biweekly dental premiums range from $9.64 for the MetLife self-only standard option to $51.20 for the Government Employees Hospital Association's high-benefit family option.

Biweekly premiums for vision benefits will range from $2.63 for self-only coverage through the Spectera standard option to $16.21 for family coverage under the Vision Services Plan high option.

The only service that will not be available to enrollees right away is orthodontia.

One of the 10 vendors, MetLife, will offer two dental options, high and standard. The high option, the OPM said, will provide the highest per-person maximum benefit of any nationwide provider -- $3,000 per person annually. Orthodontia will be covered after a two-year waiting period, with a $1,500-per-person lifetime maximum under the standard option.

Another vendor, CompBenefits, a dental-health maintenance organization, will provide coverage in the District, Virginia, West Virginia and most of Maryland. There are fixed co-payments for each service, regardless of the amount of the charge. The plan has no benefit maximum, but it does not offer an out-of-network benefit in most areas. It also has no lifetime maximum for orthodontia.

In general, dental plans will cover basic services, such as exams, sealants and X-rays; restorative procedures, such as fillings, crowns and periodontal scaling; and some major services, such as root canals and complete dentures.

Visions plans will provide eye exams and coverage for lens, frames and contact lens. Other benefits, such as discounts on Lasik surgery, also may be available.

OPM officials said employees will be able to enroll for the dental-vision programs through a Web site or by calling a toll-free number and speak to a program representative.

Some federal employee health insurance plans cover some dental and vision services. That will serve as the first payer for services, and the new dental-vision program will be secondary. Dental and vision enrollees will be asked to provide information on their medical insurance plan to help coordinate benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0066931

To help reduce out-of-pocket costs, employees also will be able to use their flexible spending accounts, which require annual renewal, for any services that insurance doesn't pay for.

Federal employees and retirees will be able to enroll in the new program from Nov. 13 to Dec. 11. Coverage starts Dec. 31.Innovation Deadline

The deadline to apply for the $100,000 Innovations in American Government award has been extended to Tuesday to give applicants more time to prepare and file their material, program spokesman Carl Fillichio said.

Applications and information on the award, given annually to creative, effective government programs, may be found at http://www.innovationsaward.harvard.edu . The original deadline was Sept. 12.

The award is administered by the Ash Institute for Democratic Governance and Innovation at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government in partnership with the nonprofit Council for Excellence in Government.

Unneeded And Divisive (WP)

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

"UNNECESSARY and likely counterproductive." That's what a major interest group had to say Tuesday about a provision that has snarled completion of the defense authorization bill. The provision -- contained in the House version but not in the Senate-passed measure -- would permit military chaplains to offer explicitly sectarian prayers at public events. But that negative assessment, and the call on congressional negotiators to drop the amendment, didn't come, as you might assume, from the usual separation-of-church-and-state types. Rather, it was contained in a letter to lawmakers from the Rev. Ted Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals. "At this time, our country needs no legislation in this area," the Rev. Haggard wrote. He is right.

The House provision has been pushed by some evangelical ministers who contend that new Air Force and Navy guidelines violate the rights of chaplains whose faith requires them to pray in the name of Jesus Christ when they offer public prayers. It would guarantee chaplains "the prerogative to pray according to the dictates of the chaplain's own conscience, except as must be limited by military necessity, with any such limitation being imposed in the least restrictive manner feasible."

We respect the chaplains' convictions about the demands of their faith. But we are also concerned about having such sectarian prayers at events that military personnel of other faiths, or no faith at all, are compelled to attend. No one disputes that chaplains are free to pray as they wish, and as their religion demands, at private, voluntary services. The argument is about what rules should govern religious speech at public, nonreligious events. In fact, as the Defense Department explained in stating its opposition, the military's "present insistence on inclusive prayer at interfaith gatherings" is more conducive to "unit cohesion."

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) went to the Senate floor Tuesday evening to make clear his opposition to including the amendment in the defense bill. Instead, Mr. Warner said that lawmakers should hold hearings at the start of the next Congress and that in the interim the military should suspend enforcement of the new guidelines.

Mr. Warner deserves credit for his efforts to get the amendment out of the authorization bill. But the better resolution of this complicated and divisive issue would be for Congress to stay out of it and leave the matter in the hands of the military services. In the long run, the best resolution would be not to drain prayer at public ceremonies of specific religious content but to discourage prayer at such events as inherently and unnecessarily divisive.

Keep Christ Out Of The Christmas Tree (NYT)

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

Taxpayers may find it hard to believe that the must-pass $500 billion defense budget could be held hostage to a mischievous amendment empowering evangelical chaplains to speak in the name of Jesus at nonreligious military gatherings. But that is the case in Congress, where hard-right Republicans have held up passage of the defense bill in an attempt to license zealot chaplains to violate policies of religious tolerance at secular ceremonies.

Despite the firm opposition of the Pentagon and ecumenical chaplain groups, House Republicans have been defending this egregious pro-evangelical thumb on the scale in negotiations with the Senate.

We expect the Senate, mindful of the nation's multidenominational legions fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, to reject the fine-print travesty. At its heart is religious intolerance — not respect of chaplains' consciences — and a naked attempt to elevate evangelical beliefs to primacy in the ranks. These very abuses caused a scandal at the Air Force Academy two years ago after cadets complained that ranking officers tolerated evangelical chaplains' proselytizing and discriminating on campus.

Proponents hope to exploit the urgency of passing the defense bill — part of the annual attempt to make a "Christmas tree" of the measure by weighting it with nonessential favors for political patrons. Another controversial amendment aims at allowing war veterans to introduce hunting to a pristine part of the Channel Islands National Park off the coast of California. A spokesman for Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California, said the proposal would "preserve the herds" and provide veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan with "the experience of a lifetime." Surely the Senate will oppose such a wacky exploitation of veterans as just another sop to the gun lobby.

DOJ_NMG_0066932

Defense conferees who were truly conscientious would act to control predatory insurance salesmen at the gates of military bases. And they would force the Pentagon to end its awarding of unearned "bonus" payments to favored defense contractors. Government investigators found the Air Force's F-22A Raptor plane 20 months late and 42 percent over budget, yet contractors reaped $849 million in bonuses.

Voters should wonder what in the name of (fill in deity) is going on in Congress.

Poll: Democrats Lead, But Bush Popularity Rises (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's approval rating has reached its highest level since January, helping to boost the Republican Party's image across a range of domestic and national security issues just seven weeks before this year's mid-term election, a new Times/Bloomberg poll has found.

While the survey spotlights a continuing array of Republican vulnerabilities, it also offers the first evidence in months that the GOP may be gaining momentum in November's battle for control of Congress.

Democrats hold a lead in the poll, 49% to 39%, when registered voters are asked which party they intend to support for Congress this year. But that advantage may rest on softening ground — on virtually every comparison between the parties measured in the survey, Republicans have improved their position since the summer.

In particular, Republicans have nearly doubled their lead when voters are asked which party they trust most to protect the nation against terrorism — the thrust of Bush's public relations blitz in recent weeks.

"I believe he has made the country more secure," said R.C. Cox, a police officer from North Little Rock, Ark. who responded to the survey and categorized himself as a political independent. "President Bush has stuck with a nonpopular plan throughout this and he has been relentless in what he has done."

The shift in the wind hasn't dispelled all of the GOP's problems. Along with a plurality of voters saying they want Democrats to control Congress, most say they disapprove of Bush's overall job performance. And the percentage of voters who say they believe their own member of Congress deserves reelection is lower than in the weeks before a Republican landslide overturned Democratic majorities in the House and Senate in 1994.

But the results suggest that a combination of improving attitudes about the economy and the president's focus on national security issues have ended the nearly unbroken slide in the GOP's public standing through Bush's tumultuous second term and created the conditions for a highly competitive battle in this year's election.

The Times/Bloomberg poll, supervised by Times polling Director Susan Pinkus, surveyed 1,517 adults, including 1,347 registered voters, from Saturday through Tuesday. It has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points.

The survey captured consistent signs of recovery for Bush and the GOP. Still, adding to the uncertainty of the political climate, their level of support remains at a point that has usually produced election losses for the party in power.

One of the key figures — Bush's approval rating — rose among registered voters from 41% in late June to 44% in the new poll, with 54% disapproving. In January, 45% of registered voters expressed approval of his job performance.

The improvement for Bush tracks with the direction of most other recent national surveys. In the Times/Bloomberg poll, Bush's gain since the early summer rests on consistent, if modest, gains among Democrats, independents and Republicans.

Bush's backing from his Republican base, a political asset that has wavered during the last year, again looks solid, with more than 4 in 5 of GOP respondents giving him approval marks.

"Things that impress me most about him are his strong emphasis on family values and how he tries to protect our nation through one of the worst periods," said Ruth Bixby, a homemaker and a Republican from Taylor, S.C.

But from other angles, Bush's political position continues to look more precarious. His approval rating remains no better than Times' polls recorded for President Bill Clinton in the two months before the GOP's 1994 landslide. And Bush faces an intensity gap: the percentage of Americans who say they strongly disapprove of his performance is more than 1½ times as large as the share who strongly approve.

Michelle Hayter, a Democrat from Puyallup, Wash., who lives on disability payments, is one of those deeply alienated from the president. "I think his whole policy with Iraq is terrible," she said. "I think he is using fear to get people to agree with what he's doing. I don't think it has anything to do with terror at this point."

Other assessments point to the same trend: Bush has gained ground, but his standing still is weak by historical standards.

In the June poll, just 32% of voters said they believed the country was better off because of his policies and should continue in the direction he's charted. In the new survey, that nudged up to 36%, but 61% said they thought the country should change direction.

Similarly, the number of registered voters who said in June that they disapproved of Bush's handling of the economy exceeded the share who approved by 21 percentage points; that gap dropped to just nine percentage points in the new survey. But 52% of those polled still gave Bush poor marks for his economic performance.

DOJ_NMG_0066933

These findings underscore a critical question arising from the poll: Is the upturn in Bush's fortune a temporary blip linked to the public attention on the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks or is it the start of a sustained recovery of political strength?

The same question looms over the measures of voter preferences in the midterm elections.

Many of the poll's findings underscored the persistence of the threat facing the GOP's congressional majority.

The 10-percentage point Democratic lead on the question of which party voters intend to support for Congress is twice as large as the Republican advantage in the final Times survey before the 1994 election.

Also, just 46% of registered voters said in the new survey their own member of Congress deserves reelection, while 40% said they want to elect someone new — figures that seem to show a greater desire for change than polls found shortly before the 1994 vote.

But beneath the surface, the survey finds substantial evidence that the current may be starting to reverse direction.

On some issues where voters have preferred Democrats, the survey found Republicans narrowing the gap.

Democrats still lead Republicans by seven percentage points (44% to 37%) on the most sweeping question: Which party do Americans trust to handle the nation's major problems. But in the June poll, the Democratic advantage was twice as large.

Democrats also lead Republicans when voters were asked which party they most trust to handle immigration and taxes, but in each case the margin has decreased slightly.

Bigger changes are evident on national security and foreign policy. While voters narrowly preferred Democrats over Republicans in June when asked which party could best handle the war in Iraq, they now tilt slightly toward the GOP.

In June, Republicans led Democrats by nine percentage points when voters were asked which party they trusted most to handle national security and the war on terror. In the new poll, voters prefer Republicans by 17 percentage points, 49% to 32%, on that central question.

Still, the survey suggests that one of the critical fault lines in this year's campaign will be whether voters view national security primarily through the lens of terrorism or the war in Iraq.

Public attitudes about the war remain largely negative. Just 37% of voters said they believe Bush when he says America is making progress in the war; 56% said they don't agree with that assessment. And 57% said the war in Iraq has not been worth the cost, with 38% saying they thought it has been.

For all the anxiety about Iraq, the survey found that significantly more voters (46%) said the U.S. should stay in the country as long as it takes to establish order than said American troops should be withdrawn within the next year (28%).

The reluctance to abandon a war most Americans consider has not been worth its costs seemed to capture the ambivalence of a nation that appears up for grabs in the final weeks of a frenzied struggle for control of Congress.

Will Bump For Bush Help GOP In The Fall Elections? (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

President Bush has done this before: He launches a series of speeches highlighting the war on terror, and his job approval rating improves in most major polls. Then the speeches end, and the bump fades.

Will that happen again? And, in the end, how will the president's standing with voters affect how they approach individual races for Congress on Nov. 7?

The political world has been abuzz over the latest Gallup Poll, which shows Mr. Bush with his highest job approval in a year - now at 44 percent - and likely voters split evenly between Republicans and Democrats, 48 percent to 48 percent, over which party's candidate they would vote for in their congressional district. The "generic ballot" has typically favored Democrats among registered voters, often with a double-digit lead, so far this year.

The short answer is, it's too soon to tell if the improved national climate for Bush and Republican candidates - helped also by a decline in gasoline prices to a six-month low - has the legs to carry through to election day. Dick Morris, a political adviser over the years to top members of both parties, calls polling on presidential approval and congressional preference "notoriously fickle." He and others note that 44 percent still isn't that great.

"His [Bush's] standing is not all that different than [President] Clinton's was in 1994," says Carroll Doherty, an analyst at the Pew Research Center, referring to the last time control of the House changed hands, from Democratic to Republican. "It's still a pretty tough environment."

But the latest polling does contain many hopeful moments for Republicans concerned that the war in Iraq and perceptions of a weak economy are sinking Bush politically and damaging enough Republicans in competitive races to cost the GOP control of the House.

According to the latest Gallup Poll, released Sept. 19:

• Americans tend to believe the country would be safer from terrorism under a Republican-controlled Congress than under a Democratic-controlled Congress.

• A growing percentage of voters - now 48 percent - see the Iraq war as part of the larger war on terror as opposed to an entirely separate military action (49 percent). In December, 43 percent saw Iraq as part of the war on terror versus 55 percent who did not.

DOJ_NMG_0066934

• Most voters - 67 percent - do not believe the Democrats have a plan for handling the situation in Iraq. Bush does not fare much better: 61 percent of voters say Bush does not have a clear plan for handling the situation in Iraq. But that's down from 67 percent in June.

Gallup editor in chief Frank Newport notes a strong partisan correlation among voters' partisan choices for Congress and which issue they see as most important in the fall election. Sixty-eight percent of registered voters who rank Iraq as the No. 1 issue plan to vote Democratic for Congress; among registered voters who rank terrorism first, 71 percent of registered voters plan to vote Republican.

"Convincing more voters to focus on terrorism as the pivotal issue in the fall campaign - as the Bush administration is attempting to do - could benefit the Republicans, just as convincing voters to focus on Iraq - as the Democrats are doing - could benefit them," writes Mr. Newport.

The 9/11 anniversary, the UN General Assembly meeting, and debate over legislation on military tribunals and warrantless wiretapping has provided news pegs for Bush to use his bully pulpit on terrorism. On Iraq, the news is continuous, but in public discussion, it has been drowned out by the terrorism debate. Still, the Gallup Poll found that 72 percent of Americans believe Iraq is in a state of civil war, which does not bode well for voter tolerance of continued US involvement there.

The Democratic polling organization Democracy Corps argued last week that Bush's bully-pulpit offensive had given him only a modest rise in job approval, "concentrated in his conservative base." But Gallup's numbers show an across-the-board improvement for Bush among all political groups - Republican, Democratic, and independent.

According to Newport, support for Bush among Democrats is up to 15 percent, Republicans are at 86 percent, and Independents are at about one-third approval. Compared with the previous poll, taken Sept. 7-10, which found Bush's job approval at 39 percent, he went up among all groups.

Charles Franklin, an expert on presidential polls at the University of Wisconsin, Madison, says Bush's average job approval among major polls has gone from 34 percent in May to 41 percent today. Looking at Bush's ability to halt declines in approval by using the bully pulpit, he adds, "there's reason to believe that this upward trend can at least sustain itself or flatten out, not turn around and fall again between now and election day."

Only 25% In Poll Voice Approval Of The Congress (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Janet Elder

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

With barely seven weeks until the midterm elections, Americans have an overwhelmingly negative view of the Republican-controlled Congress, with substantial majorities saying that they disapprove of the job it is doing and that its members do not deserve re-election, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll.

The disdain for Congress is as intense as it has been since 1994, when Republicans captured 52 seats to end 40 years of Democratic control of the House and retook the Senate as well. It underlines the challenge the Republican Party faces in trying to hold on to power in the face of a surge in anti-incumbent sentiment.

By broad margins, respondents said that members of Congress were too tied to special interests and that they did not understand the needs and problems of average Americans. Two-thirds said Congress had accomplished less than it typically did in a two-year session; most said they could not name a single major piece of legislation that cleared this Congress. Just 25 percent said they approved of the way Congress was doing its job.

But for all the clear dissatisfaction with the 109th Congress, 39 percent of respondents said their own representative deserved re-election, compared with 48 percent who said it was time for someone new.

What is more, it seems highly unlikely Democrats will experience a sweep similar to the one Republicans experienced in 1994. Most analysts judge only about 40 House seats to be in play at the moment, compared with over 100 seats in play at this point 12 years ago, in large part because redistricting has created more safe seats for both parties.

The poll also found that President Bush had not improved his own or his party's standing through his intense campaign of speeches and events surrounding the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks. The speeches were at the heart of a Republican strategy to thrust national security to the forefront in the fall elections.

Mr. Bush's job approval rating was 37 percent in the poll, virtually unchanged from the last Times/CBS News poll, in August. On the issue that has been a bulwark for Mr. Bush, 54 percent said they approved of the way he was managing the effort to combat terrorists, again unchanged from last month, though up from this spring.

Republicans continued to hold a slight edge over Democrats on which party was better at dealing with terrorism, though that edge did not grow since last month despite Mr. Bush's flurry of speeches on national security, including one from the Oval Office on the night of Sept. 11.

But the Times/CBS News poll found a slight increase in the percentage of Americans who said they approved of the way Mr. Bush had handled the war in Iraq, to 36 percent from 30 percent. The results also suggest that after bottoming out this spring, Mr. Bush's approval ratings on the economy and foreign policy have returned to their levels of about a year ago, both at 37 percent. The number of people who called terrorism the most important issue facing the country doubled to 14 percent, from 7 percent in July; 22 percent named the war in Iraq as their top concern, little changed from July.

Across the board, the poll found marked disenchantment with Congress, highlighting the opportunity Democrats see to make the argument for a change in leadership and to make the election a national referendum on the performance of a Republican-controlled Congress and Mr. Bush's tenure.

In one striking finding, 77 percent of respondents — including 65 percent of Republicans — said most members of Congress had not done a good enough job to deserve re-election and that it was time to give a new people a chance. That is the highest number of voters saying it is "time for new people" since the fall of 1994.

"You get some people in there, and they're in there forever," said Jan Weaver, of Aberdeen, S.D., who described herself as a Republican voter, in a follow-up interview. "They're so out of touch with reality."

In the poll, 50 percent said they would support a Democrat in the fall Congressional elections, compared with 35 percent who said they would support a Republican. But the poll found that Democrats continued to struggle to offer a strong case for turning government control over to them; only 38 percent said the Democrats had a clear plan for how they would run the country, compared with 45 percent who said the Republicans had offered a clear plan.

Overall discontent with Congress or Washington does not necessarily signify how people will vote when they see the familiar name of their member of Congress on the ballot, however. Democrats face substantial institutional obstacles in trying to repeat what Republicans accomplished in 1994, including a Republican financial advantage and the fact that far fewer seats are in play.

Thus, while 61 percent of respondents said they disapproved of the way Congress was handling its job, just 29 percent said they disapproved of the way their own "representative is handling his or her job."

The New York Times/CBS News poll began last Friday, four days after the commemoration of the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, and two weeks after the White House began its offensive on security issues. A USA Today-Gallup Poll published Tuesday reported that Mr. Bush's job approval rating had jumped to 44 percent from 39 percent. The questioning in that poll went through Sunday; The Times and CBS completed questioning Tuesday night. Presidential addresses often produce shifts in public opinion that tend to be transitory.

The nationwide poll was conducted by telephone Friday through Tuesday. It included 1,131 adults, of whom 1,007 said they were registered to vote, and had a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points.

As part of the Republican effort to gain advantage on the war in Iraq, Republicans have accused Democrats who want to set a timetable for leaving Iraq of wanting to "cut and run." But 52 percent of respondents said they would not think the United States had lost the war if it withdrew its troops from Iraq today.

The poll also found indications that voters were unusually intrigued by this midterm election: 43 percent said they were more enthusiastic than usual about voting. However, with turnout promising to be a critical factor in many of the closer Senate and House races, there was no sign that either party had an edge in terms of voter enthusiasm.

Evidence of the antipathy toward Congress in particular — and Washington in general — was abundant: 71 percent said they did not trust the government to do what is right.

"If they had new blood, then the people that influence them — the lobbyists — would maybe not be so influential," said Norma Scranton, a Republican from Thedford, Neb., in a follow-up interview after the poll. "They don't have our interest at heart because they're influenced by these lobbyists. If they were new, maybe they would try to please their constituents a little better."

Lois Thurber, a Republican from Axtell, Neb., said in a follow-up interview: "There's so much bickering, so much disagreement — they just can't get together on certain issues.

"They're kind of more worried about themselves than they are about the country."

Incumbents and challengers nationwide are trying to accommodate this sour mood. Democrats are presenting themselves as a fresh start — "Isn't it time for a change?" asked an advertisement by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee directed against Senator Jim Talent, Republican of Missouri.

And Republican incumbents are seeking to distance themselves from fellow Republicans in Washington. "I've gone against the president and the Republican leadership when I think they are wrong," Representative Christopher Shays, a Connecticut Republican locked in a tough re-election battle, said in a television advertisement broadcast this week.

The Republicans continue to be seen as the better party to deal with terrorism, but by nowhere near the margin they once enjoyed: it is now 42 percent to 37 percent. When asked which party took the threat of terrorism more seriously, 69 percent said they both did; 22 percent named Republicans, compared with 6 percent who said Democrats.

Voters said Democrats were more likely to tell the truth than Republicans when discussing the war in Iraq and about the actual threat of terrorism. And 59 percent of respondents said Mr. Bush was hiding something when he talked about how things were going in Iraq; an additional 25 percent said he was mostly lying when talking about the war.

Not that Democrats should draw any solace from that: 71 percent of respondents said Democrats in Congress were hiding something when they talked about how well things were going in Iraq, while 13 percent said they were mostly lying.

Robert Allen, a Democrat from Ventura, Calif., said: "We're in a stalemate right now. They're not getting hardly anything done." He added, "It's time to elect a whole new bunch so they can do something."

For Bush, Cheaper Gas Is Premium (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — When it comes to President Bush's approval rating — the number that measures his political health — one factor seems more powerful than any Oval Office address or legislative initiative.

It's the price of a gallon of gas.

Statisticians who have compared changes in gas prices and Bush's ratings through his presidency have found a steady relationship: As gas prices rise, his ratings fall. As gas prices fall, his ratings rise.

For some Americans, analysts speculate, gas prices provide a shorthand reading of the general state of the economy. Even though prices at the pump are largely outside the president's control, he gets credit when they fall — and blame when they rise.

"Gas prices are a price everybody knows because it hangs on the street in big letters," says Stuart Thiel, an economist at DePaul University in Chicago who has been tracking the trend for several years.

A statistical analysis by Doug Henwood, editor of the liberal newsletter Left Business Observer, found that an "uncanny" 78% of the movement in Bush's ratings could be correlated with changes in gas prices. Based on trends in crude oil prices, Henwood predicted last Thursday that it "wouldn't be surprising to see his approval numbers rise into the mid-40s."

In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday, Bush's rating rose to 44%, his highest in a year. Average gas prices, which peaked at more than $3 a gallon in August, had dropped under $2.50, the lowest since March.

A renewed focus on terrorism contributed to Bush's turnaround, analysts say. "When they put the terror issue out there, they tend to get political points," says sociologist Robb Willer of the University of California, Berkeley.

Gas prices may be "a proxy for larger developments in the political economy," Henwood says. For instance, the war in Iraq and Hurricane Katrina, which drove up fuel costs, also eroded Bush's support.

The ratings of Bush's three immediate predecessors weren't closely tied to gas prices, Henwood found. Volatile prices and a supply crunch did contribute to President Jimmy Carter's political travails.

For Bush, too, prices have been volatile, and his background as an oilman may be a factor affecting public attitudes. In the USA TODAY poll, two in five said the administration has deliberately manipulated gas prices to decline before the fall elections.

Routine market forces are likely to deliver more good news to Bush, says Tom Kloza of the Oil Price Information Service. Absent an international crisis, he predicts gas prices will drop an additional 10 to 20 cents a gallon by Election Day.

Ferry Fuss (WP)

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

NO ONE DENIES the charm of crossing the Potomac River on White's Ferry, or its convenience to hundreds of commuters. By the same token, there is no denying that the Coast Guard is right to ensure that the ride be safe. That's why it's so unfortunate that the ferry operator and the Coast Guard have allowed a dispute over licensing ferry pilots to endanger what ought to be a cooperative and harmonious working relationship.

Owner Edwin Brown ran afoul of the Coast Guard for supposedly using unlicensed ferry operators. In the ensuing weeks, the situation escalated, with the Coast Guard demanding -- and Mr. Brown refusing -- that he shut down operations. A truce was declared, with the ferry being allowed to operate under a provisional license. Then the Coast Guard announced its latest salvo: It would seek "thousands of dollars" in fines for the alleged violations. Commuters able to escape traffic by using the ferry between Montgomery and Loudoun counties are right to worry that massive penalties could mean the end of their ride.

We suspect the real reason for the Coast Guard's unnecessarily hard line has little to do with the level of danger posed to the public; The Post's Fredrick Kunkle likened the ferry to "a hunk of driveway that has broken loose," and even Coast Guard officials concede it is less than demanding to operate. Rather, officials think that they need to prove a point with Mr. Brown, a rather colorful character who essentially thumbed his nose at them in word and deed -- and who in the process received a groundswell of public support. While we don't condone anyone defying a direct government order, it also seems as though there was a way to avoid that showdown.

Mr. Brown, now contrite and clearly worried about the future of his business, is seeking to make amends with a letter of apology and a pledge of cooperation. Coast Guard officials, who certainly have more important things to do with their time and resources, would do well to take him at his word.

Markets Applaud Holding Rates Steady (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, September 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066937

NEW YORK — The broad U.S. stock market closed within 2 points of a fresh 5½-year high Wednesday after the Federal Reserve left short-term interest rates unchanged and said it expects inflationary pressures to lessen over time.

For its second straight meeting, the nation's central bank decided to leave its target for short-term rates at 5.25%, although it noted in a statement that the future direction of rates still will be dependent on incoming data on the economy and inflation (story, 1B).

Stocks, which have been in rally mode since mid-August, continued to move higher as investors bet that the Fed will be able to cool growth and root out inflation without causing serious harm to the economy, says Rod Smyth, chief investment strategist at Wachovia Securities.

"The market decided in August that a 'soft landing' was looking more likely," says Smyth. "And the message of today's Fed statement is that the market got it right."

However, Smyth insists that any signs of inflation spiking up again or a sharper-than-expected housing plunge could hurt stocks going forward.

While stocks finished the day a tad below their intraday highs, the S&P 500 finished at 1325.18, less than a point below its May 5 high for the year and less than 2 points below its close of 1326.61 set on Feb. 15, 2001.

The Dow Jones industrial average marched closer to an all-time high, gaining 72.28 points, or 0.6%, to 11,613.19. The blue-chip index is less than 110 points shy of a record. The Nasdaq composite also rallied, helped by a good earnings report from Oracle. It gained 30.52 points, or 1.4%, to 2252.89.

For the year, the Dow is up 8.4%, the S&P 500 is up 6.2% and Nasdaq is up 2.2%. The broad market, as measured by the S&P 500, is up 4.2% since the Fed's first rate pause on Aug. 8.

Stocks have been helped by a 21.5% drop in a barrel of crude since its July 14 high. At one point Wednesday, oil dropped below $60 a barrel. A dip in long-term bond yields has also given stocks a boost. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note closed at 4.74%.

Oracle jumped 11.2%, or $1.80, to $17.93 a day after it reported quarterly profit that topped analysts' forecasts.

If stocks are to continue marching higher, investors must get more clarity on how much the economy and corporate earnings will slow in the quarters ahead, says Quincy Krosby, chief investment strategist at The Hartford.

Unchanged Rates, Oil-Price Dip Rally Stocks (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

A stand pat Federal Reserve and a dip in crude oil prices under $60 a barrel pushed stocks higher, with major market indexes hitting fresh four-month highs.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 72.28 points, or 0.6%, to end at 11613.19, up 8.4% on the year. Among the Dow's strongest components were International Business Machines and Boeing, each of which gained nearly 2%.

The blue-chip average now stands just 109.79 points from its record close reached in January 2000. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rallied 6.87 points, or 0.5%, to 1325.18, up 6.2% on the year.

As widely expected, the Federal Reserve's policy makers left their key interest-rate target unchanged at 5.25% following their one-day meeting. Perhaps more important, the U.S. central bank made no major tweaks to the language of its statement explaining its decision, compared to the one from its last meeting.

Wall Street dissects those statements for any inkling of what the Fed might do next, parsing each word as carefully as a school kid diagrams sentences. Economists and investors alike want to know whether the Fed is done raising rates or may have to undertake another hike or two sometime soon.

Looking at yesterday's Fed statement, Lehman Brothers economist Ethan Harris said he still believes more rate increases are on the way because the Fed still seems concerned that signs of inflation may resurface.

He acknowledged that the statement, in discussing the slowing housing market, excised the descriptor "gradually," suggesting the central bank believes the real-estate slowdown is in full gear. Such a development would seem to discourage further rate increases. But Mr. Harris thinks his fellow Wall Streeters and investors have been too blasé about price increases that may yet show up in the government's monthly economic data.

"Everyone seems to have forgotten about the lags before inflation usually shows up," he said. "It's true that producer prices and the cost of goods seems to be under control. But that doesn't save us from inflation in services and rents and other things."

One of the factors helping ease inflation fears is a general pullback in energy prices, which continued in dramatic fashion. Crude-oil futures for October delivery fell $1.20, or 1.9%, to a six-month low of $60.46 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, hurt by reports of growing U.S. inventories. The selloff temporarily pushed oil below $60 and left the price of crude off 1% on the year.

The oil pullback has generated savings for consumers -- who are also investors -- at the pump lately. The driving club AAA reported that the national average retail price for regular-grade gasoline hit $2.472 on Wednesday, off 11% from a year ago.

Among specific stock sectors, technology continued to outpace the rest of the market, a trend that analysts said reflects investors' rising confidence and willingness to take riskier bets. The Nasdaq Composite Index jumped 1.4%, or 30.52, to 2252.89, up 2.2% on the year. Surprisingly strong earnings by Oracle helped boost the tech sector and drove the software company's stock to a five-year high.

DOJ_NMG_0066938

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, rose 0.04%, or 0.09 point, to 217.47.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.52 billion shares, as 2,156 issues advanced and 1.137 fell.

Bond prices were little changed. The 10-year note was unchanged, yielding 4.733%. But the 30-year bond rose 4/32 to yield 4.848%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 117.45 yen, compared with 117.61. The euro rose to $1.2687, compared with 1.2679.

Fed Keeps Interest Rates Unchanged (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve policymakers left interest rates unchanged Wednesday but cautioned more rate increases could come later this year.

In a 10-1 vote, Fed officials left their target for short-term interest rates, which influence the cost of borrowing for everything from mortgages to credit cards, at 5.25%, the highest in nearly six years.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues said in their post-meeting statement that the economy was continuing to moderate, in part because of widespread cooling in the housing market. Although inflation measures were still high, price pressures "seem likely to moderate," partly reflecting recent energy cost drops.

But the Fed repeated "inflation risks remain" and said the "extent and timing of any additional (rate) firming that may be needed" would depend on incoming data, suggesting more interest rate increases may be on the way.

"This leaves us in this kind of limbo state about whether the Fed hikes going forward," Lehman Bros. chief U.S. economist Ethan Harris says.

Harris predicts inflation pressures will force the Fed to raise rates twice more in the next six months. But other economists, including those at Moody's Economy.com and Global Insight, say the Fed is done.

The Fed next meets Oct. 24-25.

Lacking a clear signal on rates, investors initially erased some of the gains seen earlier in the session after the widely expected decision. The Dow Jones industrial average later bounced back, ending the day up 72.28 points at 11,613.19.

The Fed's decision Wednesday marked the second consecutive meeting in which U.S. central bankers have left rates unchanged. The Fed raised interest rates 17 times from June 2004 to June 2006 to remove stimulus put in place earlier in the decade and to stem inflationary pressures.

Data have pointed to a recent easing in price pressures, and oil prices are down more than 20% from the peak hit two months ago, potentially a positive development on the inflation front. Such declines have led investors to reduce expectations of future Fed action, a development that recently has also led to lower costs of borrowing for some loans, including mortgages. But other borrowing rates, such as for credit cards, are tied to the prime rate, which has not changed from 8.25%.

Despite recent declines, the consumer price data are still above where many Fed officials, including Bernanke, have said they would like to see inflation.

Higher inflation readings mean "There is still a very clear risk that we see another tightening," Briefing.com chief economist Timothy Rogers says.

As in August, Richmond Fed President Jeffrey Lacker issued a rare dissent, instead favoring a rate increase.

Fed Leaves Rates On Hold At 5.25% (FT)

By Richard Beales In New York

Financial Times, September 21, 2006

The US Federal Reserve left interest rates unchanged at 5.25 per cent on Wednesday as expected, amid housing market weakness and signs of easing inflation.

The Fed's open market committee nonetheless reiterated its watchfulness on inflation and its dependence on economic data.

"The committee judges that some inflation risks remain," the Fed said, repeating language used in August.

"The extent and timing of any additional firming that may be needed to address these risks will depend on the evolution of the outlook for both inflation and economic growth."

Stocks closed higher on the day, having fallen back slightly after the announcement, which confirmed near-unanimous market expectations and did not appear to suggest the Fed was poised to resume interest rate increases.

Bonds also responded by giving up most of their earlier gains to trade close to their levels on Tuesday evening.

DOJ_NMG_0066939

Alan Ruskin, international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital, said the statement's tone was "almost exactly the same" as in August, when the Fed left rates unchanged after 17 consecutive rises over more than two years.

"It may have disappointed a few players who thought that, with housing slowing sharply and oil prices undercutting some price pressures, the Fed would sound more dovish," he said. "Instead, the Fed . . . made it clear that their bias is still, if anything, toward tightening. The market's inclination is to view this as largely bluster."

Jeffrey Lacker, Richmond Fed president, cast a formal dissenting vote, preferring another rate rise, as he did in August.

According to the minutes of the earlier meeting, he felt another rate rise would help bring inflation down more quickly than would be the case with an unchanged rate.

But other policymakers believed a pause would "allow the committee to accumulate more information before judging whether additional firming would be necessary".

Keeping rates steady last month also partly reflected a belief at the Fed that earlier interest rate rises would have a delayed effect on economic activity.

Since the Fed's last meeting, housing market indicators have provided further evidence of a sharp slowdown in activity, a factor contributing to the central bank saying in Wednesday's statement that "the moderation in economic growth appears to be continuing".

The Fed also noted that recent declines in energy prices made for a "reduced impetus" on inflationary pressures. But the committee repeated earlier concerns about relatively high inflation readings recently.

Fed Holds Rate Steady At 5.25% (NYT)

By Louis Uchitelle

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — The Federal Reserve's policy makers voted Wednesday to keep interest rates unchanged, committing themselves for the second time in six weeks to the proposition that the slowing economy will eventually damp a still troublesome inflation rate.

The vote was not unanimous; there was one dissent. But the tone of the statement — issued in the early afternoon, after a morning of debate and voting — suggested that the policy makers were clearly satisfied with the decision they made at their last meeting, on Aug. 8, to halt a series of 17 consecutive rate increases stretching back two years. It also suggested that they would not change their view at their next meeting in late October, just before the midterm elections.

"The consensus among the policy makers that the pause was justified is perhaps stronger now than it was in August," said Robert V. DiClemente, chief United States economist for Citigroup. "What has happened to the economy since then has in some small measure enhanced the Fed's credibility."

The stock market responded joyfully to the Fed's decision to keep the key lending rate that it controls at 5.25 percent. Stock prices often jump when a lid on rates makes stocks seem like a better investment than interest-bearing securities. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 72.28 points, or 0.63 percent, to close at 11,613.19, a little more than 100 points below its record high.

The Fed's statement Wednesday spotlighted the housing slowdown and also suggested that the risk of a rising inflation rate, while still present, had diminished. Since August, residential construction and home sales have deteriorated noticeably, and the pressure on inflation from rising energy costs has also eased, thanks mainly to sharp declines in petroleum and natural gas prices.

The policy makers took special note of the deterioration in housing and "the reduced impetus from energy prices." Their statement suggested that the "cooling of the housing market" was the main reason for the moderation in economic growth. Indeed, the cooling was no longer "gradual," as it had been in August. That adjective was eliminated from yesterday's statement — a significant deletion in the Fed's carefully calibrated public statements.

"There is greater recognition at the Fed that the economy has slowed to below trend growth and this is precisely the time to sit on the sidelines and watch," said Laurence H. Meyer, vice chairman of Macroeconomic Advisers and a former Fed governor. "The policy makers do not see much risk in waiting."

Ben S. Bernanke, who succeeded Alan Greenspan this year as Fed chairman, is betting that the slowing economy will moderate the annual inflation rate, which now exceeds the Fed's upper-end target of 2 percent. In taking this stance, Mr. Bernanke runs up against the view of some economists, particularly on Wall Street, that consumer demand is still strong enough to give business the power to raise prices.

Higher rates are necessary, according to this view, to contain that pricing power and bring down the inflation rate. It is a view that one of the policy makers, Jeffrey M. Lacker, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, seems to share. Of the 11 policy makers who voted — that is, all of the sitting Fed governors and 5 of the 12 bank presidents — only Mr. Lacker dissented, as he had on Aug. 8. Instead of a continuation in the pause, he favored a quarter-point increase, the statement said.

The Fed controls a crucial short-term rate, known as the federal funds rate, now at 5.25 percent. This is the rate at which banks and other financial institutions lend to each other. The rate also determines what these lenders charge for mortgages, auto loans and other consumer and commercial borrowing. Housing has been hurt by rising mortgage rates, but consumer spending, while weakening a bit in recent weeks, is still robust. Partly in response to this demand, the inflation rate has inched up this year.

DOJ_NMG_0066940

"Creeping inflation," Albert Wojnilower, a senior economic adviser at Craig Drill Capital, calls it. "It is very difficult to deal with creeping inflation, because there is no popular support for stopping it."

Acknowledging this view, the Fed's statement on Wednesday recognized that "some inflation risks remain," repeating a phrase from the Aug. 8 statement. The policy makers also declared, as they did six weeks ago, "that the extent and timing of any additional firming that may be needed to address these risks will depend on the evolution of the outlook for both inflation and economic growth, as implied by incoming information."

What the statement omitted was any reference to rising labor costs, and the upward pressure that might have on prices. For Mark M. Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com, that was a significant omission.

"All the wage data show an acceleration to one degree or another yet the policy makers do not acknowledge that in their statement," Mr. Zandi said. "That is suggestive of a more dovish Federal Reserve. The small changes in this latest statement all suggest that the Fed will not be raising interest rates anytime soon. In fact, you can almost make the case that they are trying to drive expectations in the other direction."

Fed Holds Steady On Key Rate (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

Federal Reserve policymakers held short-term interest rates steady yesterday, saying inflation remains too high but should drift lower as energy prices fall and the economy slows.

The central bank left open the door to further rate increases if necessary to tamp down price pressures, but the decision strengthened many analysts' view that the Fed is done increasing rates for now.

The policymaking Federal Open Market Committee last raised its benchmark short-term interest rate to 5.25 percent in June, the 17th consecutive increase in two years meant to cool the economy and bring down inflation. The group left the rate unchanged at its previous meeting, in early August, saying that it expected price pressures to weaken as past rate increases took effect in coming months.

Since then, energy prices have tumbled, inflation has ebbed and the housing market has slowed sharply, boosting expectations in financial markets that the central bank will leave interest rates on hold through the end of the year, and perhaps even cut rates early next year.

One big question for the committee and financial markets now is how the housing downturn will affect the rest of the economy.

The housing boom of recent years was a big generator of jobs in construction, finance and retailing, and rapid appreciation of housing prices encouraged many consumers to borrow against their homes to finance extra spending.

Construction of new homes plunged 6 percent in August, for the third consecutive monthly decline, pushing the pace of home building to its lowest level in more than three years. Inventories of unsold homes have shot up in recent months, and the rise of home prices has been sluggish.

This shift is likely to cause a "fairly significant" drop in consumer spending and a hit to the economy next year, which will prompt the Fed to cut interest rates by the spring, predicted Jan Hatzius, chief economist at Goldman Sachs Group Inc.

But other economists, including many at the Fed, believe the weakness in housing will be offset by strong business investment, an increase in exports and solid consumer spending. Many households have more money to spend now than earlier this year because of lower gasoline prices, rising incomes and steady job growth.

"Housing is going to cool off, but not crush the economy," said Ethan S. Harris, chief U.S. economist at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. He added that though inflation had eased, it will remain high for several months, likely prompting the Fed to raise its benchmark interest rate to 5.5 percent this year and perhaps to 5.75 percent early next year.

The Fed adjusts interest rates to encourage economic growth and keep inflation low. Higher rates make it harder for businesses and consumers to borrow and spend, slowing growth and weakening inflation. Lower rates do the opposite.

Consumer prices rose 2.4 percent in the 12 months that ended in July, according to the Fed's preferred measure, which excludes volatile food and energy prices. That is above the 1 to 2 percent comfort zone described by Chairman Ben S. Bernanke and several of his colleagues.

As in August, one voting member of the Fed committee dissented yesterday from its decision. Jeffrey M. Lacker, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, would have preferred another quarter-percentage point increase in the benchmark interest rate, the group said in a statement.

Lacker has argued that the Fed should raise the rate to bring down inflation more rapidly.

The Fed's decision means that consumer interest rates linked to the benchmark federal funds rate should stay steady as well. Those include rates on many credit cards and home equity loans.

Fed policy directly affects short-term interest rates like those on credit cards, but only indirectly influences long-term rates, which are determined more by global financial markets. Mortgage rates, for example, have declined in recent months. The average rate on a 30-year, fixed-rate mortgage slipped to 6.43 percent last week, down from a peak this year of 6.79 percent in early July, according to mortgage financier Freddie Mac.

DOJ_NMG_0066941

Financial markets showed little reaction to yesterday's decision, which traders had expected. The Dow Jones industrial average gained 72.28 points, or 0.63 percent, to close at 11,613.19.

Fed Cites Energy, Housing Declines In Holding Rates (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

What started out as a pause in rate increases last month began to look more like a full halt yesterday.

The Federal Reserve left its short-term interest rate target at 5.25% for a second consecutive meeting. It also warned that it remains concerned about inflation, and thus if it changes rates soon, it is more likely to raise them than lower them.

The statement accompanying yesterday's decision suggested that, since pausing in its two-year string of rate increases last month, the Fed has become more confident that standing pat is justified. In explaining yesterday's decision, it cited the quickening decline in housing activity and easing inflation pressure from energy.

Investors, however, increasingly expect the Fed not just to remain on hold, but to cut rates at least once by next June and again by December 2007. Ten-year Treasury bond yields have fallen, ending yesterday at 4.73%, down from 5.25% in late June. Those expectations may not match the Fed's, at least for now. Indeed, its statement did little to hint a rate cut would be on the table in the near term and financial markets pulled back slightly in their anticipation of one.

Stocks, meanwhile, which have been rallying because of falling oil prices and on hopes the Fed is finished raising rates and the economy escapes recession, extended their winning streak. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 72.28 points yesterday to 11613.19, just 110 points short of its January 2000 record.

In its statement, the Fed said growth is moderating, "partly reflecting a cooling of the housing market." By discarding last month's characterization of housing as "gradually cooling," the Fed acknowledged the slide in home construction, sales and, in some regions, prices has picked up speed.

It said that while the "core" measure of inflation, which excludes food and energy, remains "elevated," it was likely to moderate in part because of "reduced impetus from energy prices."

Oil and gasoline prices have fallen sharply in recent months. Oil futures on the New York Mercantile Exchange fell $1.20 yesterday, or nearly 2%, to settle at $60.46 a barrel -- their lowest level in six months and down 22% from the nominal high reached July 14. In theory, such a decline has mixed implications for the Fed. Lower energy prices reduce inflationary pressure, which would call for the Fed to lower rates. They also boost consumer purchasing power, which can improve growth prospects and would call for an increase in rates. The Fed statement suggests it considers the former effect as more important.

While economists differed on what the Fed's next action is likely to be, they agreed that the small changes in its statement signaled greater comfort with leaving rates where they are, despite its stated bias toward raising rates.

"We see these wording changes (and absence of other potential changes) as a step in the direction of a neutral balance of risks," Peter Hooper, chief economist at Deutsche Bank Securities, wrote in a note to clients. He predicted the Fed would drop its bias to higher rates either at its next meeting, on Oct. 24-25, or in December, and would cut rates by March.

The Fed's statement conveys "more of a sense of comfort of being on hold," agreed Bruce Kasman, head of economic research at J.P. Morgan Chase. He noted that inflation remains the Fed's paramount concern. He also expects another rate increase by March.

Ten of the 11 voting members of the Federal Open Market Committee agreed to yesterday's decision not the change the federal-funds rate, which is charged on overnight loans between banks. The Fed had increased that rate at 17 consecutive meetings before pausing last month. As in August, Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond President Jeffrey Lacker dissented, preferring a quarter-point increase. It was the first time in eight years an FOMC member dissented at two consecutive meetings in favor of higher rates, said David Resler of Nomura Securities. The last time, he said, the Fed's next move was to lower rates.

The Fed remains focused on inflation risks in large part because core inflation is above the 1% to 2% "comfort zone" of many Fed officials, including Chairman Ben Bernanke. In the 12 months through August, core inflation was 2.8%, up from 2.7% in the 12 months through July. Using a lesser-known price index that the Fed prefers, core inflation was 2.4% in the 12 months through July.

Fed officials expect core inflation to move back below 2% over the next two to three years as energy prices stop boosting the prices of other goods and services and the economy cools. If that forecast doesn't unfold, it could pose a threat to the Fed's credibility that would require higher interest rates.

The Fed's continuing concern about inflation seems at odds with investor expectations of rate cuts. Thomas Joseph Marta, fixed income strategist at RBC Capital Markets, says that while the Fed and his own firm's economists are optimistic the housing slump won't significantly hurt the rest of the economy, market participants are far more pessimistic. "I've heard traders say, 'Look, the Fed's wrong,'" he said. "Traders are reacting viscerally to housing. Housing is something you see when you're driving home from the train station; it's very obvious, very visible."

Mr. Marta added, "In terms of inflation, I keep whispering in the traders' ears, 'Look, core [prices], hourly wages, unit labor costs, they're all at dangerous levels.' They don't care."

DOJ_NMG_0066942

Still, some economists say the bond market will be proven right. Paul Ashworth, senior U.S. economist at Capital Economics of London, said if housing construction's share of economic output falls to the same level it hit in the early 1990s, after the last housing boom, "you'll get a substantial drag on growth." He expects growth to slow to 1.5% next year from a projected 3.3% this year, and the Fed cutting its rate target to 3.5% by mid-2008.

Another reason for the disconnect could be anticipation of easier credit conditions globally. The U.S. bond market is increasingly linked to its foreign counterparts, and there have been signs of slowing growth in Germany, Japan and China in recent weeks.

Chile Seeks U.S. Files On 1976 Assassination (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile — Thirty years after a Chilean-organized hit squad assassinated former Foreign Minister Orlando Letelier and an American colleague on the streets of Washington, investigators here are drawing closer to implicating this country's former dictator, Gen. Augusto Pinochet, in the killings.

But they say their efforts are being hindered by a parallel investigation in the United States that has been stalled since President Bush took office and that is withholding potentially important documents.

Mr. Letelier, one of the most visible leaders of the opposition to the Pinochet dictatorship, and Ronni Karpen Moffitt were killed on Sept. 21, 1976, when a bomb planted under his car exploded as they were riding to work.

Even after 9/11, the Letelier assassination remains the most audacious act of state-sponsored terrorism committed on American soil.

"Every day it is clearer that Pinochet ordered my brother's death," said Fabiola Letelier, a prominent human rights lawyer here. "But for a proper and complete investigation to take place we need access to the appropriate records and evidence."

General Pinochet was detained in London in 1998 by prosecutors seeking to bring him to justice for abuses committed during his 17-year rule.

Afterward, the Clinton administration came under new pressure from the Letelier and Moffitt families, and it released more than 24,000 declassified diplomatic and intelligence cables. It also reopened an investigation of the assassination, sending an F.B.I. team to Chile in 2000 to interview more than 40 witnesses.

That mission resulted in a recommendation that the United States indict General Pinochet, but Attorney General Janet Reno decided to leave the decision to her successors in the Bush administration.

The case remains politically delicate in Washington, where previous Republican administrations supported the Pinochet dictatorship as a bulwark against leftist encroachment in Latin America during the cold war.

Though President Bush, whose father was director of central intelligence at the time of the assassination, promised to "direct every resource at our command" to defeating terrorism, the American investigation continues to languish, Ms. Letelier and Chilean officials say.

They and others complain that hundreds of secret documents are being kept out of Chilean hands.

"It's been six years, three times longer than the original investigation that fingered the hit team, and nothing has happened," said Peter Kornbluh, a Chile specialist at the National Security Archive, which obtained the release of the original trove of documents. "I've filed Freedom of Information Act requests, but the documents that come closest to Pinochet are still being withheld, ostensibly as evidence."

No one in the Bush administration would comment on the case. William Blier, head of the unit in the office of the United States Attorney in Washington that is in charge of the case, declined a request for information on the status of the investigation. He referred the question to a press spokesman, Channing Phillips, who also would not discuss any aspect of the case.

Other lawyers involved in the case on the victims' side said the Bush administration's performance contrasted with promises made after Sept. 11 to put pressure on states that sponsored terrorism.

"It is stunning to me that with all the energy being put into the war on terror," the Bush administration "has been completely unresponsive to our queries," said Sam Buffone, a Washington lawyer representing Ms. Moffitt's husband, Michael Moffitt.

"The most basic lesson of that war is that anyone responsible for an act of domestic terrorism will never get away with it, no matter how long it takes," Mr. Buffone said. "But that rule seems to have been honored in the breach for Augusto Pinochet."

General Pinochet, now 90, ailing and discredited here, ruled Chile from Sept. 11, 1973, to March 1990. Since mid-2004, investigations in the United States and in Chile have uncovered an illicit fortune of more than $27 million that he hid abroad.

He is now facing tax fraud and forgery charges, two indictments for human rights violations and several other investigations of murders, kidnappings and disappearances that occurred during his rule.

John Dinges, co-author of "Assassination on Embassy Row" and a professor at Alberto Hurtado University here, said, "The evidence against Pinochet is as strong in the Letelier case as any of the other cases he is facing."

He noted that the dossier now included damning testimony from central officials. Among them are Gen. Manuel Contreras, the former chief of the National Intelligence Directorate, or DINA, General Pinochet's secret police, and Michael Townley, an American-born former DINA agent.

DOJ_NMG_0066943

Facing intense diplomatic pressure, the Pinochet government handed Mr. Townley over to the United States in 1978. He admitted organizing and carrying out the assassination with Cuban exiles recruited for the task. He served a short prison term and was enrolled in the witness protection program.

General Pinochet refused to extradite other officials of the intelligence directorate who were Chilean citizens. But in 1995 General Contreras was convicted here of the Letelier assassination and sentenced to seven years in prison.

In interviews, including one with The New York Times in November 2004, General Contreras, currently serving a prison term here for the disappearance and torture of political prisoners, said General Pinochet had known and approved of all the actions he took.

But he has not specifically said that General Pinochet, whom American diplomatic cables show as irate about Mr. Letelier's activities in exile, ordered the killing.

Most recently, Chilean courts agreed to consider a request that General Pinochet be stripped of his immunity in a related case: the murder of Eugenio Berrios, a DINA agent nicknamed Pinochet's Mad Scientist, whose headless body was found on a beach in Uruguay in 1995.

Mr. Berrios had been spirited into exile there in 1992, in anticipation that he would soon be called to testify in an investigation of the Letelier and other assassinations.

In March, Chile asked that three senior Uruguayan military officers said to be involved in the Berrios killing be extradited here. Uruguayan courts complied, and the men were recently interrogated by a Chilean investigative judge, Alejandro Madrid, whose inquiry into the Berrios case inevitably led him to the Letelier assassination.

"The Chileans have been remarkable, exemplary, in going forward on Pinochet," E. Lawrence Barcella, the lead prosecutor in the original trial of Mr. Letelier's assassins in 1980, said in a telephone interview from Washington. "In my view, outliving those you kill is not a defense, and I hope nobody stops trying" to build the case against General Pinochet.

Third Baby Dies After Error At Indiana Hospital (USAT)

By Theodore Kim And Tammy Webber

USA Today, September 21, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS — A third premature baby has died in a case of medical error here that has shaken one of Indiana's largest hospitals.

Five-day-old Thursday Dawn Jeffers died late Tuesday, said Jon Mills, a spokesman for Methodist Hospital.

The Jeffers infant was one of six premature babies who received overdoses of the anti-clotting drug heparin Saturday in Methodist's neonatal intensive care unit.

Thursday Dawn was being treated at Riley Hospital for Children, where she had been transferred after being born at Methodist.

"They killed my baby. Why, oh why?" the child's mother, Heather Jeffers, asked her mother as they hugged outside the younger woman's apartment.

"We are all saddened by this news and our hearts are with this family, and all the families who have been affected," Mills said in a statement Wednesday.

Two other infants died late Saturday: 5-day-old D'myia Alexander Nelson and 2-day-old Emmery Miller. The other three babies are expected to survive, Mills said.

"Ultimately, the blame for our errors falls upon the institution," Sam Odle, president and CEO of Methodist Hospital, said following the first two deaths. "This is a system failure."

Premature newborns are often given heparin to prevent their blood from clotting as they are administered fluids intravenously, said James Lemons, a neonatologist at Riley Hospital.

Each of the six infants was given an adult dose — an amount 1,000 times greater than prescribed, Odle said.

A preliminary hospital investigation found the mix-up occurred when a veteran technician delivered adult-dose heparin vials to the neonatal unit, Odle said.

Joanna Pruitt, Heather Jeffers' mother, held a news conference outside her daughter's apartment in which she described how her granddaughter deteriorated. "When she got the heparin, that's when she started … breaking down, and I really don't know what to say, except that they killed my grandbaby," Pruitt said.

Methodist Hospital pledged to prevent future overdoses by requiring all drugs to be double- and triple-checked before they are administered, Odle said. Clarian Health Partners, which runs Methodist, has 1,300 beds and tallies nearly 1 million patient visits annually.

The hospital has offered to pay for funeral expenses and counseling, plus provide restitution to all six families affected, Odle said.

Brittany Alexander, an aunt of D'myia Nelson, said the family is planning legal action. And, in a statement released on Tuesday, the family of Emmery Miller said it had hired an attorney.

G.O.P. Gains Big Fund-Raising Advantage (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066944

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — The Republican National Committee has amassed a significant fund-raising advantage, according to campaign finance records filed Wednesday, feeding Democrats' fears about remaining competitive in the intense final weeks before the midterm elections.

The Democrats' House and Senate campaign committees have been unusually successful raising money compared with past election cycles. House Democrats have nearly as much as Republicans, while Senate Democrats have $10 million more than their Republican counterparts.

But that edge is being offset by the fund-raising of the Republican National Committee, which has said it would spend more than $60 million to make up for any shortcoming by the party's Congressional committees.

The cash-on-hand figures, revealed in reports filed with the Federal Election Commission, are critical indicators of the resources the parties can draw upon during the intense days ahead. The money is primarily devoted to television advertisements in districts that are — or will become — competitive, as well as to help finance get-out-the-vote operations.

The new fund-raising reports show that at the beginning of September, Republicans had $39 million in the bank, compared with $11 million for Democrats.

The disparity is caused by the decision of the Democratic National Committee chairman, Howard Dean, to take a longer view of turning around the party by devoting most of the money he has raised to rebuilding state organizations across the country. Last week, the committee said it would provide $12 million to finance voter turnout efforts, only $2.6 million of which would be directed toward House campaigns, a point of bitter contention among Democrats and relief among Republicans.

"The advantage that we have is based on the fact that because we all work together, we've been able to be more strategic and our dollars will go further," said Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee. "We've been building our turnout operation since 2005."

Republicans concede that fund-raising, at least by the Republican National Committee, is one of the few bright spots in an otherwise frustrating political season. And fund-raising, in turn, helps fuel a turnout machine that has a proven track record during the last three election cycles.

"The area where the Republican funding advantage could make the difference is on the ground," said David B. Magleby, a professor of political science at Brigham Young University who studies campaign finance. "It's an open question of whether the Democrats will find a way to compete with the Republican advantage in the closing days."

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, dismissed suggestions that Democrats could not compete with Republicans in the final stage of the contest. Fund-raising will only increase among Democrats, he said, as voters frustrated with the Republican-controlled Congress begin tuning into the race in October.

"We're getting contributions large and small from people that we never have gotten contributions from before," Mr. Schumer said, noting that such donations were urgently needed considering the overall Republican fund-raising muscle. The fund-raising at the Democratic senatorial committee, under Mr. Schumer's businesslike-direction, has significantly outpaced the Republican equivalent, led by Senator Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina. The Democratic committee reported a cash-on-hand balance of $29.8 million, compared with $18.6 million for the Republican committee.

In an interview on Wednesday, Mr. Schumer was ebullient as he discussed his committee's fund-raising success. His voice quickly fell, though, when asked whether he was satisfied with the fund-raising by the Democratic National Committee, saying, "I'm not going to comment on that."

To win control of Congress, Democrats must pick up 6 seats in the Senate and 15 in the House. The National Republican Congressional Committee, led by Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, reported Wednesday that it had $36 million at its disposal as of the beginning of the month. A spokesman, Carl Forti, predicted that the fund-raising tally would soar in the next month, particularly through an initiative called the battleground program, where representatives are asked to contribute $17.5 million to the committee.

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, is not far behind Mr. Reynolds. The Democratic committee reported $35 million in the bank, and similar edicts have been issued to Democratic members.

"N.R.C.C. 36, D.C.C.C. 35," Mr. Emanuel said, talking about the fund-raising report as though it were a weekend football score. "Financial parity is better than financial disparity. It's that simple."

Senate Democrats Get Boost In Fund Raising (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- While Republicans enjoy an overall financial edge in the coming elections, Senate Democrats ended August with a nearly $12 million advantage over their Republican colleagues, which could ratchet up pressure on incumbents fighting to hold their seats.

The Democrats' campaign committee also got a boost this month when four senators -- New York's Hillary Clinton, Massachusetts's Edward Kennedy, Illinois's Dick Durbin and California's Dianne Feinstein -- transferred a million dollars each from their own brimming campaign accounts to the Senate effort, Democratic aides said.

DOJ_NMG_0066945

According to reports released yesterday, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee raised $4 million in August and ended the month with $30 million in the bank. The Senate Republican committee reported raising $3.3 million with a cash balance of $18.6 million.

The Democrats' strong standing may help incumbents fend off a barrage of attacks expected in the coming weeks from the Republican National Committee, which is flush with money. It also will help Democratic challengers seeking to unseat embattled Republican incumbents, many of whom have been forced to start drawing down precious dollars to run television advertising earlier than their campaigns originally anticipated.

Uncle Sam Leaning More Heavily On The Better-off (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Warning to the wealthy: The cash-strapped federal government is targeting you.

Having already gone after people with higher incomes through the federal tax code and the Social Security system, the government next year will begin charging wealthier seniors more for doctors' care under Medicare.

The Bush administration, members of Congress and outside experts are all looking at other ways to raise new revenue from the rich.

If taxes must be raised or benefits cut, "you have to ask the question, who should pay the price?" says Robert Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a fiscal watchdog group.

The answer, according to many Democrats and Republicans, is those with greater ability to pay. Democrats generally are in favor of higher taxes, such as eliminating President Bush's tax cuts for the wealthiest taxpayers. Republicans are more likely to favor raising the price for government benefits, such as Medicare and Social Security.

Singling out wealthier Americans is controversial. When higher-income seniors were asked to pay for an expansion of Medicare in 1988 that would largely benefit the poor, they revolted, and the law was repealed the following year.

Most of the proposals for means-testing benefits still face stiff odds:

•President Bush proposed last year that Social Security benefits should be increased more slowly for "people who are better off." He endorsed a plan that would tie their increases in benefits to prices, rather than faster-rising wages. Congress didn't bite.

•In November, an advisory tax panel created by Bush proposed several major changes to the federal tax code that would limit wealthier Americans' tax breaks for mortgage interest, employer-paid health insurance and state and local taxes. Its report was largely ignored.

•Bush proposed in his 2007 budget to speed up the premium increases paid by higher-income Medicare beneficiaries. Congress has not gone along.

•Many Democrats in Congress want to roll back Bush's tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans, which would raise their tax bill. Republicans want to extend the tax cuts.

Government taxes and benefits already treat rich and poor differently. "It permeates tax and expenditure policy," says Eugene Steuerle of the non-partisan Urban Institute.

The income tax code has six brackets, escalating by income level. The personal exemption, child credit and education credits phase out at higher income levels. The earned income tax credit helps lower-income taxpayers. Savings incentives such as individual retirement accounts are income-related.

Under Social Security's benefits formula, low-wage workers receive a proportionately greater return on their contributions than those with higher incomes. Since 1984, some benefits have been taxed at different rates, depending on income.

Medicare taxes now apply to all wages, so the wealthy pay a far greater share. And lower-income beneficiaries get reduced prices for prescription-drug coverage.

Nevertheless, both Medicare and Social Security are on unsustainable paths, with promised benefits eventually overtaking projected revenue from taxes and premiums. And the federal budget is still $296 billion in the red. So the Bush administration, Congress and budget watchdog groups are looking for additional sources of revenue.

"The growth in entitlement spending is going to be tremendous," says Len Burman, director of the Tax Policy Center. "Reducing the benefits to those who least need government assistance makes sense."

Going after higher-income groups, says former Democratic senator John Breaux of Louisiana, imposes "the least amount of heartburn" on politicians.

In 2003, the Kaiser Family Foundation and the Harvard School of Public Health found that means-testing premiums was the most popular way to raise money within Medicare to keep it financially sound. In 2005, a USA TODAY poll found that limiting benefits and raising taxes for wealthy retirees were the most popular ways to shore up Social Security.

"That's what the public wants," says Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a Council on Foreign Relations economist and former director of the Congressional Budget Office. "The days of free are over."

DOJ_NMG_0066946

The newest area of government means-testing is Part B of Medicare, which covers doctors and outpatient services. Under the same 2003 law that created Medicare's prescription-drug benefit, about 1.2 million seniors will be required to pay higher premiums; that will rise to 2.8 million by 2013. Singles with incomes greater than $80,000 and couples with incomes greater than $160,000 will be affected.

Opponents such as Maria Freese of the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare say higher premiums will chase healthier, wealthier seniors out of the program, making it more expensive for those remaining to sustain. Experts such as Tricia Neuman of the Kaiser Family Foundation say that's unlikely because no private insurance product compares to Medicare financially.

Not all policies or proposals target the rich. Many of Bush's tax cuts, such as those on capital gains and dividends, benefited wealthy investors. Medicare's drug benefit does not require higher premiums from upper-income beneficiaries.

Democrats in Congress have been first to protest treating rich and poor Medicare and Social Security beneficiaries differently. They fear that doing so could cost the programs public support. “There's always this concern that a program for the poor is a poor program,” says Maya MacGuineas of the bipartisan Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget.

For that reason, most experts say further efforts to increase taxes and premiums or reduce benefits for upper-income Americans will face political peril.

“It will have to be done very gradually,” says Robert Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute and a former Congressional Budget Office director.

Adds Isabel Sawhill, a Brookings Institution economist: “Doing it right means not carrying it too far.”

President's Fund-raising Swing Brings Him To Tampa, Orlando (PALMBEACHP)

By Brian E. Crowley

Palm Beach Post (FL), September 21, 2006

President Bush will be in Florida today raising money for the state Republican Party, its nominee for governor, Charlie Crist, and other candidates.

Bush is scheduled to arrive in Tampa about noon to raise campaign cash for Republican Gus Bilirakis, who is trying to keep the state's ninth congressional seat not only in the party, but in the family. His father, U.S. Rep. Michael Bilirakis of Tampa, is retiring after 24 years in Congress.

Gus Bilirakis faces Democrat Phyllis Busansky, a former Hillsborough County commissioner, in the general election.

About two hours after arriving in Tampa, Bush is scheduled to go to Orlando, where he will pose for pictures at a private reception for those who contribute $25,000 or more to the Florida Republican Party.

A reception for Crist will cost $500, the state's limit on individual campaign contributions to a candidate. Neither the campaign nor the party would disclose how much money they will raise from the events at the Orlando Ritz Carlton.

Crist is running against Democrat Jim Davis in the Nov. 7 election.

U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris, a Republican who is challenging U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson, a Democrat, plans to be at the Orlando events, her campaign said.

Bush is scheduled to depart Orlando on Air Force One by 6:45 p.m.

Nebraska: New GOP Poll Shows Smith Trouncing Kleeb (RC)

Roll Call, September 21, 2006

Although some Democrats have talked optimistically about making the 3rd district race competitive this year, a new Republican poll showed state Sen. Adrian Smith (R) walloping rancher Scott Kleeb (D), 51 percent to 24 percent.

Public Opinion Strategies surveyed 400 likely voters on Sept. 9, 10 and 12 for Smith’s campaign and the National Republican Congressional Committee. The poll had a 4.9 percent margin of error.

Smith was considerably better known than Kleeb — 74 percent of those surveyed knew him, compared to a 47 percent name ID for Kleeb — and had fairly solid favorability ratings. Smith and Kleeb are vying to replace Rep. Tom Osborne (R), who lost the May Republican gubernatorial primary, in the western Nebraska district.

“Scott Kleeb and the Democrats had hoped to put Nebraska’s Third District in play this election, but that hasn’t happened — nor will it,” pollster Glen Bolger wrote.

2 Polls Confirm Senate Contest Is Very Tight

Two new polls out in the Buckeye State Senate race showed the contest between Rep. Sherrod Brown (D) and Sen. Mike DeWine (R) to be a dead heat.

A Quinnipiac University poll released Wednesday showed Brown ahead of DeWine 45 percent to 44 percent, while 11 percent of the 876 likely voters surveyed were undecided.

The poll was done Sept. 11-17 and had a 3 percent margin of error.

DOJ_NMG_0066947

The Quinnipiac survey found that DeWine and Brown were in a statistical tie among independent voters. Women favored Brown by an 8 percent margin, while men backed DeWine by an 8 percent margin.

Also out this week, a University of Cincinnati Ohio Poll showed Brown led DeWine 51 percent to 47 percent. The poll of 671 likely voters was taken Sept. 7-17, although interviews were not conducted on Sept. 11. It had a 3.8 percent margin of error.

The gender gap was even wider in the Ohio Poll, as 55 percent of women said they backed Brown compared to 42 percent who backed DeWine. DeWine had an 8 percent advantage among male likely voters.

Giuliani to Raise Money for McGavick Senate Bid

Rudy Giuliani, former New York mayor and prospective 2008 presidential contender, is heading to the Pacific Northwest to stump for former insurance CEO Mike McGavick, the Republican Senate nominee.

Giuliani will be in Washington state Oct. 9, according to the McGavick campaign. No further details were available, although the event is expected to be held in the Seattle area.

"Mayor Giuliani will always be remembered as a great American leader, an outstanding mayor, and someone whose decisive, clear-headed leadership helped guide this country through the tragic aftermath of" the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, McGavick said in a news release.

McGavick is trying to unseat first-term Sen. Maria Cantwell (D) and is getting enthusiastic support from national GOP leaders.

New Radio Spot Seeks to Link Kean With Bush

Sen. Bob Menendez (D) is on the radio with a new spot accusing state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. (R) of being closely aligned with President Bush.

"Tom Kean Jr. will say anything to get elected," the ad's male narrator begins.

"His pro-Bush, pro-war record is clear. On issues from supporting the Iraq War to privatizing Social Security, Republican Tom Kean Jr. is just like George Bush," continues a female narrator.

Despite the strong Democratic leanings of the Garden State and Bush's low poll numbers there, Kean is running strong in the race. A new Quinnipiac University poll of 688 likely voters released Wednesday found Kean leading Menendez, 48 percent to 45 percent.

The poll was taken Sept. 13-18 and had a 3.7 percent margin of error. However, a Quinnipiac poll of 1,233 registered voters found Menendez ahead, 41 percent to 38 percent. That poll had a 2.8 percent error margin.

Democrats attribute Kean's strength to his lineage — his father is popular ex-governor and former 9/11 commission Chairman Tom Kean (R). But Republicans say that recent reports of Menendez's ethics problems are contributing to the Democrat's problems, and the Quinnipiac poll seems to confirm that.

"The recent ethical questions about Sen. Menendez have hurt him slightly, but the jury is still out," said Clay Richards, associate director of the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute. "More than four in 10 voters say they don't know if Menendez — or Kean for that matter — can be described as honest or trustworthy."

Democratic Poll Shows Why Republicans Fretted

One week after last week's hard-fought primaries, a new Democratic poll suggests that the highly competitive 8th district may not be so competitive after all.

In the poll, conducted for former state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords (D) by Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research, Giffords led ex-state Rep. Randy Graf (R) 54 percent to 35 percent. Two Independent candidates split 5 percent of the vote, and the rest were undecided.

The survey of 500 likely voters was taken Sept. 13-18 and had a 4 percent error margin.

The 8th district seat, which Rep. Jim Kolbe (R) is giving up after 12 terms, represents one of the Democrats' best pickup opportunities of the cycle. National Republicans have fretted that Graf, a hardliner on illegal immigration, may be too conservative for the district, and the poll appears to bear that out.

While both Giffords and Graf were relatively well-known, Graf was viewed favorably by just 32 percent of those surveyed and unfavorably by 39 percent. Kolbe has so far refused to endorse Graf.

President Hopes to Give Them Heller in Reno

President Bush is going to Nevada to headline a fundraiser for the 2nd district Congressional bid of Nevada Secretary of State Dean Heller (R).

According to the Ralston Report, a Nevada tip sheet, Bush will be in Reno Oct. 2 to help Heller in his open-seat contest with Jill Derby (D), a member of the state universities' board of regents.

Rep. Jim Gibbons (R) is vacating the seat as he seeks the governorship.

A recent poll conducted for the Reno Gazette-Journal and KRNV-TV showed Heller leading Derby in the GOP-stronghold 45 percent to 37 percent.

The survey of 600 likely voters was conducted Sept. 5-7 and had a 4 percent margin of error.

GOPer's Ad Touts Plan to Rebuild New Orleans

Attorney Joe Lavigne began airing a new TV commercial this week that focuses on his plan to help rebuild hurricane-ravaged New Orleans.

Lavigne is the leading Republican in the 2nd district all-party primary that features embattled Rep. William Jefferson (D), as well as several prominent Democrats.

The ad, airing on CNN and Fox News, notes that the New Orleans Times-Picayune has called Lavigne the "colorblind candidate" and highlights his priorities for the rebuilding effort.

"Honest, Independent, Joe Lavigne, he'll fight for all of us," an announcer says at the end of the spot.

Lavigne had raised more than $242,000 for his campaign as of July 22 .

If no candidate receives more than 50 percent of the vote on Nov. 7, a December runoff between the top two vote-getters will be held.

Brown Ad Portrays Him as a Fiscal Conservative

Police administrator Charlie Brown (D) is on television in his bid to oust Rep. John Doolittle (R) in the solidly Republican 4th district.

In a 30-second spot airing on cable television in the Sacramento and Reno, Nev., markets that serve the sprawling 4th district, Brown makes his case to conservative voters, saying he'll balance "budgets, secure our borders," and provide real support for the troops.

Brown, a military veteran, has the politically delicate task of trying to appeal to the district's majority of socially conservative voters despite his stands on social issues. The Democrat supports abortion rights and is not opposed to same-sex marriage.

Shays to Join Bush at State GOP Fundraiser

President Bush will headline a fundraiser to benefit the Connecticut Republican Party and its candidates Monday.

One of the featured beneficiaries, Rep. Christopher Shays, (R) is scheduled to attend.

The luncheon, which costs $15,000 per couple, will be held at a residence in Greenwich, the hometown of former President George H.W. Bush, the Stamford Advocate reported.

The state party chairman hopes to raise $400,000 for the party's entire ticket, according to the newspaper.

Shays is locked in a tough rematch with Westport First Selectwoman Diane Farrell (D), who almost beat him in 2004.

Poll: House Incumbents in Good Shape So Far

A recent poll showed Republican Reps. Jeb Bradley and Charles Bass in good shape for re-election.

The Research 2000 survey of 600 likely voters reached Sept. 13-14 on behalf of the Concord Monitor, revealed that both men hold substantial leads over their Democratic opponents.

In the 1st district Bradley led Carol Shea-Porter (D), the surprise winner of last week's Democratic primary, 53 percent to 22 percent. In the 2nd district Bass led attorney Paul Hodes (D), whom he trounced in 2004, 55 percent to 30 percent.

National Democrats are high on Hodes despite his seemingly uphill climb. This week he was added to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee's "Red to Blue" program, which assists promising candidates with fundraising, communications and strategic advice.

Party leaders had backed state Rep. Jim Craig against Shea-Porter in the 1st district Democratic primary.

No Child Left Behind Stirs Conn. Campaigns (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 21, 2006

Recent congressional debate over the No Child Left Behind law has been largely nonpartisan, but that has not prevented struggles over implementing it from becoming a flashpoint this fall in Connecticut's hotly contested races.

Footage of Republican and Democratic lawmakers giving the education law high marks for its goals set the stage at yesterday's Business Roundtable event on the coming reauthorization of the law. There, the House's senior Republican and Democrat on education issues struck an optimistic note on future changes to No Child Left Behind, which requires states to test students annually and meet accountability standards.

But frustration among many Democrats and education groups about incomplete federal funding and state benchmarks seen as excessively rigid are fuelling campaign rhetoric in Connecticut. The state remains tangled in a lawsuit against the Department of Education (DoE), arguing that the law is an unconstitutional unfunded mandate.

Diane Farrell, the Democratic former town selectwoman mounting a strong challenge to Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), has ranked No Child Left Behind alongside the Iraq war among issues where Shays, an avowed centrist, aligned himself with the Bush White House. Farrell, in an interview, noted the drop in Connecticut's federal education funding since the Act was signed — the state suffered more than $7 million in cuts this year — and said lawmakers have "got to go in and modify" it.

"We should focus on what really matters: teacher training and class size," she added.

Joe Courtney, a Democratic former state lawmaker mounting his second challenge in three cycles to Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.), also points to No Child Left Behind as shortchanging the state. His campaign contends that a Democratic House majority, with Courtney a part of it, will be far more inclined than a GOP-controlled chamber to force changes in the law.

Simmons, a former educator whose wife is a teacher, admitted in an interview that No Child Left Behind "did not work well in Connecticut" but attributed the problems to overreaction by state education officials, who feuded with Education Secretary Margaret Spellings over implementation.

"Our accountability plan was not well-negotiated," Simmons said, referring to the state-written definitions of student progress that must be approved by the federal government. Specific changes to Connecticut's accountability plan would go a long way, Simmons said, but fighting in court with the Bush administration makes reopening the plan less likely.

Chris Murphy, the Democratic state legislator challenging Rep. Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.), labeled No Child Left Behind "a disaster for Connecticut's students" in his education plan and vowed to "fight to restore state control of education funding."

At the Roundtable event yesterday, DoE Chief of Staff David Dunn and House Education and the Workforce Committee Chairman Buck McKeon (R-Calif.) acknowledged that the law has not hit all its marks.

"I don't want to be put in a position where I'm defending [the law] as the perfect be-all, end-all. It isn't," McKeon said. Echoing Simmons, he said later that lawmakers field the brunt of the criticism for the law's failings "but the problem really lies with state standards."

Rep. George Miller (Calif.), the education panel's ranking Democrat, defended No Child Left Behind, saying, "It is working. There is a lot of angst in this country but … the system is changing."

The landmark statute has also stoked campaign fires in Connecticut's Senate race, where Democratic nominee Ned Lamont released an education plan this month that tracked dire predictions from the Business Roundtable and other groups about plummeting student proficiency in math and science. NCLB, Lamont wrote, "has imposed rigidity and 'teaching to the test' … along with massive unfunded mandates, without any clear benefit in terms of outcomes."

Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D), running as an independent against Lamont, was part of a state delegation that unanimously backed No Child Left Behind in 2001. He told local reporters this week that he would favor hearings with teachers and school administrators to examine broad changes to the statute, not just a reauthorization.

Miller yesterday dismissed the "teach to the test" criticism, a reference to reliance on test scores alone as a measure of student progress. But he praised "growth models," alternative and flexible methods of calculating student success that are in a pilot stage in two states.

The National Education Association (NEA) and American Federation of Teachers (AFT), two politically powerful education unions, both support formally adding "growth models" to No Child Left Behind during next year's reauthorization process. The Connecticut chapters of both unions were the first labor groups to endorse Lamont's upstart run earlier this year.

Connecticut is far from the only state to wrestle with accountability-plan pitfalls, funding gaps and other setbacks with implementation. Still, the law has yet to emerge as a top-tier campaign issue in other close midterm contests because GOP candidates have tended to share Democratic complaints.

In Maryland, where the lax showing of Baltimore city schools has popped up in gubernatorial campaign ads, GOP Senate hopeful Michael Steele positioned himself early as a critic of the new law's execution. Steele's rival, Rep. Ben Cardin (D-Md.), has called for full funding.

Rep. Mark Kennedy (R-Minn.), running behind Democrat Amy Klobuchar in their Minnesota Senate race, touted his vote against No Child Left behind in a recent campaign ad where he narrates, "I want people who know our kids' names to make education decisions, not bureaucrats in Washington." Michele Bachmann, the state senator running for Kennedy's House seat, also opposed the law early in her campaign as an unfair federal mandate.

The NEA's PAC has steered just 13 percent of its nearly $1 million in contributions to Republicans, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. The union, which drew fire from McKeon and other Republicans for its efforts to point out deficiencies in the law, has given to two GOP incumbents, Reps. Mike Fitzpatrick (N.J.) and Jim Gerlach (Pa.), to the exclusion of their Democratic foes.

Moderate Shays Tries To Find Ways To Win In Iraq — And Conn. (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, September 21, 2006

Henrik Ibsen's play "An Enemy of the People," currently showing at Washington, D.C.'s Shakespeare Theatre, contains a devastating portrait of a political moderate, the kind of image now being projected onto embattled Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.).

In the play, a character named Aslaksen prates about believing in "discreet moderation ... and moderate discretion." At first, he promises to back the protagonist, Dr. Stockman, who has discovered that their town's water pipes and public baths — crucial to the economy — are poisoned with pollution.

But when Aslaksen discovers that repairing the system will force taxes to be raised, he turns on the doctor and backs the town's mayor, a character who echoes Vice President Cheney, in keeping the situation secret.

Shays, the quintessential moderate Republican, is now being accused by Democrats and the media of shifting his position on Iraq out of similar expediency because he is under threat of losing his House seat.

After his August visit to Iraq, his 14th, Shays announced he now favors a timetable for withdrawing U.S. forces — a reversal of his previous stance and a seeming abandonment of President Bush, who is deeply unpopular in Connecticut.

Shays' Democratic opponent, Diane Farrell, is seeking to tie Shays to Bush and the war; she described his shift as "an election-year conversion." Shays added to his woes with an agonized appearance at a reporters' breakfast sponsored by The Christian Science Monitor last week during which he said Bush "has no credibility" on the war.

After attending that breakfast and interviewing Shays for almost two hours, I'm convinced he's no Aslaksen; I believe he genuinely wants to win the war, not simply withdraw U.S. troops, and that he thinks the Iraqi government needs to face deadlines for achieving its goals.

As Shays emphasizes, his proposed timetable is not identical to those being put forward by many Democrats. It isn't based on a date certain, but rather on the achievement of administration goals for training adequate numbers of Iraqi security forces.

Moreover, even though Shays says that both he and Bush lost credibility because weapons of mass destruction were not found in Iraq, I do think Shays has credibility as one of the most diligent Members of Congress in providing oversight of Iraq operations and the war on terror.

As chairman of the House Government Reform subcommittee on national security, Shays has held more than 100 hearings on terrorist threats since March 1999 — well before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks — and has been to Iraq more than any other Member, often traveling without U.S. government escorts or approval.

He supported the war and still believes it is "a noble mission," along with Bush's vision of spreading democracy in the Middle East. At the same time, he has delivered consistent warnings — albeit mostly in private, he admits — about failings in administration policy.

After his first visit to Iraq in April 2003, he said, he urged that U.S. forces bring on more Arabic speakers so they could connect with Iraqis. An ex-Peace Corps volunteer, he traveled with nongovernmental aid groups and heard from their Iraqi employees the complaint that U.S. forces purposely had allowed looting in the aftermath of the war.

He said he argued that it was a mistake to disband the Iraqi army and police forces, whose lower-level personnel could have been employed to guard hospitals and other facilities.

FBI agents in Iraq told him — and he told Bush — that U.S. forces should be dismantling roadside bombs to trace their manufacturers instead of exploding them. He says he also urged the Pentagon to move faster in armoring Humvees and trucks.

After the Iraqi government began recruiting police, he warned U.S. officials, on the basis of a staffer's visit to a training facility, that the police were being infiltrated by militias loyal to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Shays said U.S. deadlines were crucial in getting Iraq to form a provisional government, write a draft constitution and hold elections in 2005. Then, he said, it took more than four months to form a government, and "since January, nothing has happened" to reconcile sectarian groups, write a final constitution and hold provincial elections.

"It's a slow death," he told me. He wants to force Iraqi reform both because he's afraid Americans are losing the will to see the mission through and because Iraq is heading for civil war. Echoing Bush, he said that U.S. defeat in Iraq will be a victory for radical Islamic terrorism.

In Ibsen's play, which is well worth seeing, the town's mayor covers up the truth about pollution because "without moral authority I am powerless to direct public affairs for what I judge is the common good." Shays thinks the administration should be admitting its mistakes to regain credibility.

The truth-telling doctor in the play becomes the enemy of the people. He gives up on convincing anyone else and declares that "the strongest man in the world is he who stands most alone." Shays seems to fear that Bush is becoming like the doctor. Shays said he is willing to lose his seat over Iraq, but clearly he would rather win both contests.

Dems To Spotlight Iraq (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 21, 2006

Congressional Democrats plan to hold Iraq war hearings on Capitol Hill and around the country, turning an election spotlight on an issue much as the GOP did with immigration during the summer recess.

The Democrats' will highlight the fact that they intend to go toe-to-toe with Republicans on the issue of national security, believing that this election cycle it can play to their advantage rather than to their detriment as it has in elections past.

And Rep. Walter Jones (R-N.C.), a leading House critic of the war, indicated yesterday that he would give the hearings a degree of bipartisan cover by attending them when he can.

"Any [hearings] up here that I can get to, I'll attend," said Jones, who voted for the resolution authorizing President Bush to use force in Iraq but has since pressed to bring American troops home. "I wish it was my party, the committees in the House, doing the same thing. The American people want answers."

Jones said he would try to attend the Senate Democratic Policy Committee's (DPC) first planned hearing on Monday, provided he can make the five-hour drive from his district in time.

Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R-Minn.) also said he would consider taking part in the hearings, which Democrats say will be open to Republican lawmakers on both sides of the Capitol.

"I might take them up on it," Gutknecht said. "I would certainly consider sending them some written testimony."

The hearing on Monday, featuring military officers who served in Iraq, will delve into "the policy decisions that led to the current situation in Iraq," according to Barry Piatt, spokesman for DPC Chairman Byron Dorgan (N.D.).

Democrats said they will follow up that hearing with field hearings around the country at least through November. They argue that Republicans have neglected to provide proper oversight of the war in a number of areas, including postwar planning, troop readiness and care for troops and veterans.

"At no time is congressional oversight more important than when the men and women of our armed forces are engaged in combat to defend our freedom," Dorgan and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) wrote in a letter to Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and Republican Policy Committee Chairman Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) in which the Democrats invited Senate Republicans to attend their hearings.

"We all understand how important the war on terror is, especially the ongoing fighting in Iraq. These issues have been addressed on the floor of the Senate and will continue to be addressed," Frist spokeswoman Carolyn Weforth said. "It's no surprise, however, that on the day after a national poll showed improving American attitudes toward the liberation of Iraq, that the Democrat leadership would want to change the subject."

Democrats said they extended an invitation to Republicans so that the hearings would be seen as fair.

Jones, who attended a DPC oversight hearing earlier this year, said his experience with the panel was "absolutely fair."

"I called Sen. Dorgan's staff and told them I wanted to come," he said of the first hearing he attended. Aides to Jones and Dorgan talked yesterday about making arrangements for Jones to attend Monday's hearing.

Even if they are not ready to share a dais with the Democratic Policy Committee, there are other Republicans who say their party has done too little to keep an eye on the administration's conduct of the war.

"I think it's been inadequate oversight of the Iraqi issue," said Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa), who has opposed the Iraq war from its outset. Leach left open the question of whether he might attend the hearings.

"I'd have to see what they're doing," he said.

Leach said he believes in bipartisanship in assessing national security issues, that both parties should offer support and criticism of presidents.

"I can't tell you that either political party looks good on the Iraq issue," he said.

Dorgan has held numerous hearings on Iraq contracting and the government's handling of hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Like Leach, he has called for the establishment of a commission, modeled after a committee run by then-Sen. Harry Truman (D-Mo.) during World War II, that would investigate allegations of contracting abuses.

"Because we have one-party control, there's been virtually no oversight," Dorgan said. "This Republican-led Congress has been AWOL when it comes to the war in Iraq."

Jones said he would like to hear from more people than he has at House Armed Services Committee hearings.

DOJ_NMG_0066952

"We had hearings, but I think we need different witnesses than we've had," he said. "Anything I can do to expand my knowledge … helps me make the right decisions for my people."

Jones said in particular that he wants to hear from retired senior military officers such as retired Gen. Anthony Zinni, retired Maj. Gen. John Batiste, and retired Marine Lt. Gen. Gregory Newbold, all of whom have called for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

GOP Bullish On Prospects Of Stealing Case's House Seat (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, September 21, 2006

When Rep. Ed Case (D-Hawaii) decided to give up his House seat to challenge Sen. Daniel Akaka (D-Hawaii) few pundits or political operatives believed Democrats would have a hard time holding onto his 2nd district seat.

But with Saturday's primary looming, Republicans sense a unique opportunity brewing in the Aloha State and some Democrats fear they are right.

Ten Democrats are vying for their party's nod while two Republicans — a multimillionaire heir to the Hawaiian throne and a popular sportscaster — compete for the chance to represent the GOP and possibly make history.

The ultimate Democratic nominee is "going to land on the other side of the primary broke," said one Democratic operative who did not want to be named.

If Quentin Kawananakoa wins the Republican nomination, which is far from certain, the Democratic candidate could face "an infinite war chest," the operative warned.

Kawananakoa is a former state lawmaker and a direct descendant of Hawaiian Prince David and Princess Abigail Kawananakoa. He also is an heir to the Campbell Estate, a large private trust, philanthropic entity and mammoth real estate venture.

The trust owns huge tracts of land in Hawaii. When it dissolves next January, it will net Kawananakoa about $25 million on top of his already considerable fortune, according to The Honolulu Advertiser.

Republicans are positively giddy about this prospect. It is "the sleeper race of the decade," according to Jonathan Collegio, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee. "Few pundits and few pols are paying attention to this race and it's on virtually no one's radar but Republicans have two candidates in Kawananakoa and Bob Hogue who could easily go all the way."

Hogue is a state Senator and former local TV personality who still writes a regular sports column for a weekly newspaper. According to private and public polls, the race between Hogue and Kawananakoa is neck-and-neck.

Kawananakoa had a little more than $117,000 in the bank as of Sept. 3 while Hogue had just about $20,000. Kawananakoa had sunk almost $350,000 of his own money into well-produced TV spots and other aspects of his campaign.

Though Hogue has not proved himself an adept fundraiser, Democrats and Republicans agree he is a well-known figure with positive name recognition.

The 2nd district spans all the outlying islands and all of Oahu, save Honolulu.

Many in Hawaii's Democratic establishment are still bitter that Case not only is challenging Akaka, an affable elder statesman, but that by doing so he takes an otherwise safe Democratic seat and possibly puts it in play during a cycle when Democrats have a realistic chance of winning control of the House.

"Are Democrats worried?" one Hawaiian Democrat who did not want to be named asked. "Yeah they're worried; they're still ticked off that Ed Case left a safe seat and even created that kind of problem."

But Ira Rohter, a public policy professor at the University of Hawaii, said Democrats can relax.

Case's Senate candidacy has reinvigorated the state's Democratic Party, he said. The establishment, which had been stagnating, has sprung back to life to rally around Akaka as party elders think Case threatens them as much as he threatens the 82-year-old Senator.

Once the Senate primary is done, the newly mobilized Democratic Party will turn its attention to the open House race, Rohter predicted.

Furthermore, Rohter said the fact that no one can predict who will win the Republican primary shows that national Republicans' hope for Kawananakoa is unfounded.

"It seems there's not a lot of passion for Kawananakoa," he said. "I wouldn't put my money on Kawananakoa.

"He didn't distinguish himself in the Legislature and the idea of him as a prince, he is not even the first line," Rohter said, noting that Kawananakoa descends from a more distant branch of the original Hawaiian royal family.

Queen Liliuokalani ruled the Hawaiian archipelago until she was overthrown by American businessmen and landowners, with the help of U.S. Marines, in 1893.

Rohter said Hogue is viewed as a nice guy and popular sports figure but that both he and Kawananakoa are light on legislative accomplishments and "really B-Team stuff" compared to the Democratic field.

In the past two presidential elections, the Democratic nominee has done better in the 2nd district than statewide. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) took 56 percent of the vote there in 2004.

GOP Hopes Attacking Democrats' Tax Records Pays Off (CCT)

By David Hammer

The Contra Costa Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Some Republicans feeling the pinch in key midterm elections are emphasizing an old mantra that Democrats will raise taxes, despite low voter interest in the topic this campaign season.

Republicans are putting a large amount of money behind the message in a key U.S. Senate race in Ohio. Sen. Mike DeWine and two national Republican Party organizations have spent at least $3 million on television ads seeking to convince voters that DeWine has a record of cutting taxes and alleging that his opponent, Rep. Sherrod Brown, votes to raise them. The back-and-forth has included dueling and disputed tallies of how many times Brown voted for raising or lowering taxes.

In certain states and congressional districts, Republicans are hoping taxes are the way to take voters' minds off GOP corruption scandals, the war in Iraq or Bush's low approval ratings.

"Republicans are looking to take refuge in issues that have been tried and true in the past," said Chris Borick, a pollster at Muhlenberg College in Allentown, Pa. "In a year when they feel under siege in a number of high-profile races on issues like Iraq, they are going back to the basics."

Also, in races that appear to be going down to the wire, Republicans hope their traditional tax message can at least keep the support of conservative voters who have shown a disdain for the current GOP leadership.

"Taxes - they will never top the charts as the most important issue facing the country, but they still are very important to a significant group of people who feel very intensely about the issue," said Whit Ayres of GOP polling firm Ayres McHenry in Alexandria, Va.

Several national polls have suggested taxes won't drive voters on a national level. An AP-Ipsos poll Sept. 11-13 found voters consider Iraq, terrorism, health care, the economy and social security as important issues more readily than taxes.

Fifty-three percent of 661 likely voters surveyed see Iraq as extremely important, compared with 37 percent who gave high personal importance to taxes.

But the national mood aside, Republicans have made sure the issue is prominent in certain locations, especially in tight suburban House races, where socially moderate voters are still conservative on pocketbook issues.

Republican Reps. Jim Gerlach and Mike Fitzpatrick ran TV ads attacking their opponents on taxes in suburban Philadelphia. In northwest Connecticut, Rep. Nancy Johnson has an ad that repetitively says Democrat Chris Murphy voted to raise taxes 27 times. In suburban Columbus, Ohio, Rep. Deborah Pryce, a member of the GOP House leadership, has tried to define Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy for the taxes she raised as a county commissioner.

In the Ohio governor's race, Republican Ken Blackwell addressed taxes at least two dozen times during his first debate with Democrat Ted Strickland. Blackwell said he plans to cut them and predicted his opponent would raise them, which Strickland denied.

Democrats are touting their own plans for targeted middle class tax breaks. Strickland said he would be able to pay for projects without raising taxes. Brown and Kilroy called separate news conferences to announce similar proposals for middle class tax credits.

Brown said Republicans can't count on owning the tax issue this time.

"This effort to give tax breaks to the richest in the country - the scam's up," he said.

Democrats have to address taxes, even though the issue is perceived as a strength for the GOP, said Joe White, a political science professor at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland.

"You want to neutralize your opponent's issues, so a certain amount of moderate me-tooism is appropriate for Democrats," White said. "The Republicans are trying to define the Democrats. At the minimum, the Democrats have to say, no, that's not me."

Courting Votes For Next Year (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, September 21, 2006

The two Democrats vying to become House majority leader next year are courting Democratic candidates likely to win in November, hoping to reach out early to those who may one day have a say in their promotion.

Rival Reps. Steny Hoyer (Md.) and Jack Murtha (Pa.) have been discreetly raising the issue with candidates, even as they campaign to ensure that Democrats will win control of the House, without which their contest for the majority leader post cannot take place.

“It’s being done on both sides,” said Rep. Bill Pascrell (D-N.J.), a Murtha supporter, referring to the efforts to reach out to candidates. “It would be remiss not to do it.”

In a Democratic House, freshman would number not fewer than 27 — at least 15 from previously Republican districts, plus as many as 12 replacing Democrats who are retiring or running for higher office. That bloc of new members, who lack the entrenched loyalties of incumbents, is enticing to both campaigns.

Hoyer, the minority whip, has long been active with candidates, traveling around the country on behalf of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) to recruit promising challengers, raise money, hold press events and mentor new recruits through the ups and downs of the campaign season.

Hoyer has visited candidates in 31 districts this cycle, an aide said, and directly contributed over $600,000 to candidates.

Murtha has traveled as well, hitting districts in Pennsylvania, Ohio and New York, but he lacks the breadth and depth of relationships Hoyer enjoys, said members and aides on both sides.

"It's a slight advantage, yes," Pascrell conceded. "Because [Hoyer] has been involved in so many other elections, no one can argue Steny's status with candidates, [but] Jack is very well regarded for his work on the committees. In the last five years, Jack has emerged as an individual people will pay attention to because Iraq and 9/11 is the subject at hand."

Among current Democratic lawmakers, Murtha is undoubtedly a giant, but to candidates, he is known largely for his outspoken stance on Iraq, said Democratic sources.

"I am sure Mr. Murtha is a fine person, but Congressman Hoyer came out to my district, held a fundraiser for me. He met with the press. He's been a mentor for questions, a coach, essentially a father figure," said a Democratic candidate in a competitive race who asked to remain anonymous.

The candidate went on to suggest that Murtha's position on Iraq made him too polarizing for the district.

"I have an incredible respect for [Murtha's] service background, but in regard to the war, I'm trying to give my own presentation."

Rep. Mike Capuano (D-Mass.), a Murtha ally, downplayed the influence of campaign work on leadership races.

"Does that personal contact matter? Yes. Does it translate into votes? No. Candidates are thinking about their own races right now, not this race."

Capuano was confident of Murtha's standing even before the new members were counted, predicting that Murtha would win by a "measurable degree."

Capuano estimated that there were still 30 to 35 uncommitted members in the race, 20 of whom had "vehemently opposed" the idea of starting the contest before the election.

Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.) took issue with Capuano's assessment.

"I thought that this campaign had been suspended," he retorted. "It seems there is a lot of over-confident talk being thrown around while we should be concentrating on the November elections."

But Dingell's doubts about conducting a race now didn't prevent him from throwing his support behind Hoyer.

"A majority of our caucus understands that Steny is the majority leader we need to help lead us when we take back the House," he said.

If Murtha is to win, as Capuano contends, he must do so against a tide of newly elected members who have been helped by Hoyer. Many Democratic candidates running in swing districts are centrists, and centrists have traditionally sided with Hoyer.

Rep. Mike Ross (D-Ark.), a Blue Dog who did not vote for Hoyer in the race for whip several years ago, said he was backing Hoyer now. He lauded the whip's work with candidates.

"The phone calls he's made, the trips around the country, the people he knows and the people who know him will all help his chances of being the next majority leader," Ross said. "... How many Democratic candidates has he not met? The answer is very few.

"I have not one bad word to say about Jack Murtha, but I've seen Steny continue to work, working hard every year and I think he's earned the right."

Still, Murtha has a formidable track record on leadership races. He largely engineered Rep. Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) ascent to minority leader and Rep. John Larson's (D-Conn.) victory in the race for caucus vice-chairman.

Asked whether Hoyer enjoyed an advantage among candidates, Murtha said only, "We'll see."

Murtha has been picking and choosing his opportunities across the country, at times taking a gamble in safe Democratic seats by endorsing a candidate before the primary. He backed Mike Erlandson, a Democratic candidate in Minnesota, before he lost to Keith Ellison in the primary. In New York, he had better luck, holding a town hall event for candidate Yvette Clarke shortly before she won her primary.

"It was extraordinary," said Clarke, who was doing a victory tour around Capitol Hill yesterday. "We were gaining momentum at that time and [the visit] just threw the campaign into overdrive. That was significant. It wasn't just an endorsement for endorsement's sake."

Hoyer, the minority whip, called her after the primary to offer his congratulations, but she knew little about him.

"I looked on the Internet afterwards and: Lo and behold!"

Clarke said she had no preference yet in the majority race, but she was scheduled yesterday to meet with Murtha.

Both Parties In Ky. Battle Try To Take Right Flank (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

ELIZABETHTOWN, Ky., Sept. 20 -- Mike Weaver, age 67, is a former Army colonel who said he knows what war is about. He'll tell you that if you ask, or if you don't. In fact, he rarely goes more than a few sentences without mentioning his military career. He's eager also to share his views on abortion rights: opposed. Or gun control: opposed. Or same-sex marriage: very much opposed.

Weaver is the Democrat in Kentucky's 2nd District. At first blush, that might seem like an advantage. There are 100,000 more registered Democrats than Republicans in these precincts, home to tobacco fields and Fort Knox, south of Louisville. But for the past 12 years a good many of these Democrats have been happy to vote again and again for one of the most reliably conservative Republicans in Congress.

Rep. Ron Lewis, who used to own a Christian bookstore, has won seven straight elections -- most times without breaking a sweat.

Weaver is doing his best to make Lewis sweat this time. Weaver's campaign revolves largely around convincing even his fellow Democrats that he is conservative enough.

This is one of the places where the "Republican Revolution" began in 1994 -- before then, Democratic representative William H. Natcher held the seat for 40 years -- and it is a good window into whether the GOP reign will end in 2006.

It is also the first stop in The Washington Post's nine-day trek through nine congressional districts that sit on the dividing line between the upper South and the industrial Midwest. There is no place outside the Ohio River Valley where so many competitive districts are clustered in an unbroken line.

The aim is to capture the 2006 campaign -- its characters, issues, back stories -- at eye level, touring 500 miles of main roads and less-traveled paths through Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio and West Virginia. Even in a year buffeted by unease over the Iraq war and other national issues, many competitive races are shaped by local twists. There is the Democratic candidate who worries that a decades-old high school basketball rivalry could cost him the election, and a Republican hopes to turn local pork-barrel spending into political gold.

And there is Kentucky's 2nd, where Weaver, a state representative, is running not only against Lewis but also against long currents of political history. Natcher, who as Appropriations Committee chairman prided himself on the bridges and highways his political clout made possible, was a beloved figure right up until his death in office in March 1994. In the special election to replace him, Lewis hit hard on President Bill Clinton's unpopularity in the district. At the time, Lewis's victory was seen as something of an aberration.

It was really an omen. That November, a generation of Southern Democrats were tossed out of office by voters turned off by their affiliation with a national party that was far more liberal than their districts.

The Democratic plan for reversing the past here and in similar districts centered on recruiting candidates who sound like Republicans, at least on social issues. A military background was a big bonus.

Enter "the colonel." At least that's what Weaver's aides always call him. In addition to his military record -- the Weaver Web site says he knows "what it means to defend our freedom on foreign soil" -- he prominently mentions his faith (Roman Catholic) and his family (11 grandchildren). In a campaign headquarters a stone's throw from a mobile-home dealership where doublewides are on sale, Weaver looks fit and angry enough to jump back into the trenches at any moment. He boasts that Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said Weaver is the only Democratic candidate who intimidates him.

He casts a skeptical eye on the out-of-town reporters who come to interview him. But then he turns his ire on Democrats for allegedly surrendering the political war over values they should be winning. "We have allowed them to steal from us without challenging it at all that they are the party of faith and family values," he said of the Republicans. "One of the first things we need to do is change that, because I think that is absolutely absurd."

But Lewis said Weaver cannot escape association with his party.

"If you look at the national Democrat party and their platform, the Democrats of the 2nd District do not line up with that," he said.

Lewis spokesman Michael Dodge said he does not dispute that Weaver is as socially conservative as the congressman, but he warns that once in Washington the colonel would be taking orders from liberal leaders such as House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). Those are fighting words in these parts, where Christian singer Michael W. Smith can be heard singing praise and worship songs on the radio at Chick-Fil-A.

The district, which President Bush won with 65 percent of the vote in 2004, is a string of rural farming communities interrupted only by towns such as Elizabethtown, population 23,000. The Kentucky 2nd is anchored by Elizabethtown in the north, Bowling Green in the south and Owensboro in the west.

The area is in transition. Tobacco farmers are converting to soybeans and corn. Military life is changing, too. Fort Knox, the Army base that drew thousands of military personnel to Radcliff and turned them into lifelong district residents, survived the most recent round of cutbacks but lost its armor school, which trains personnel for armored warfare.

The latest change is that the district is once again an interesting place to watch an election. The Republican congressman this week aired campaign commercials -- the first time a challenger has forced him to do that in eight years -- and he plans to spend well over $1 million to defend his seat.

Given the scant difference on social issues, Lewis is taking aim at Weaver over tax cuts. In one of the new ads, Lewis warns that Weaver would vote for tax increases as he did several times in the state assembly. "That voting record doesn't line up" with traditional values, Lewis said. That he is going negative this early suggests Weaver's internal polling -- showing the GOP lead in single digits -- might be on target.

Weaver, in an interview, concedes that he would support repealing the Bush tax cuts that benefit the richest 1 percent of taxpayers, but he refused to detail any specifics. He walked a similar line on the Iraq war. He criticized Bush's planning and execution of the war, and he demanded that the president put forth a plan for withdrawal, but he has not backed any timetables himself. And, no matter the question, his instinct is to turn the conversation back to his biography.

"My faith and values were taught and nurtured in my home," he said, "then taught and nurtured in the school system, which happened to be a Catholic school. It was also taught and nurtured in a church -- and confirmed in a foxhole. That is my faith and values, and I match that with anyone."

The Magnificent Seven Hit The Campaign Trail (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 21, 2006

The Senate Republican freshman class is known as the "Magnificent Seven," and like the cowboy heroes of the Western classic from which they take their nickname, they plan to ride into town to save the day.

The Republican freshmen plan to campaign together as a group next month in states such as Michigan, Minnesota, and Maryland, where the GOP thinks it has the best chances of picking up Democratic seats.

The plan has gelled in recent weeks as members of the class have discussed who among them should volunteer to run the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) during the next election cycle. The perch has traditionally been viewed as a steppingstone to leadership, but with 21 GOP seats to defend, the task is one that the seven freshmen have shunned despite their senior colleagues' strong expectation that one of them should rise to the task.

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) had been the senior senators' main hope of taking over the Senate fundraising committee and the arduous tasks of recruiting candidates and raising millions of dollars next cycle, the final two years of the Bush administration when the national political environment may be as difficult for Republicans as now.

Members of the class were dubbed the "Magnificent Seven" when they first came to Congress two years ago because of the impact expected from the five-seat lead they then gave Republicans in the Senate. They are Thune, and Sens. Richard Burr (N.C.), David Vitter (La.), Mel Martinez (Fla.), Jim DeMint (S.C.), Johnny Isakson (Ga.), and Tom Coburn (Okla.).

Facing possible questions about their willingness to be team players, the class met Thursday to tackle the issue of who would head the NRSC next year. But they made little progress, according to participants, and have decided to defer the puzzle until after the Nov. 7 election. Burr said postponing discussions on the future leadership of the NRSC would also give more senior lawmakers time for "soul searches" over whether they wanted the job.

But there seems to be little interest among veteran Republicans.

"It takes a member willing to work a thankless job," said Sen. Judd Gregg (N.H.), a third-term Republican. "It's a lot of hours and you have to raise a lot of money."

In the meantime, the class will gather during the second week of October to stump in states where Republicans have a shot at capturing Democratic seats.

"We're committed as the freshman class to go out and help the candidates," said Thune, who last month declined the NRSC job because of the effect its time and travel demands would have on his family.

Thune said campaigning with classmates would underscore to voters what they stand to accomplish by electing Republicans to the Senate. For example, the five-seat majority that the class of 2004 gave to Senate Republicans helped confirm two conservative justices to the Supreme Court and pass important pieces of legislation, such as bankruptcy reform, class-action tort reform, and gun-liability reform.

The class plans to argue that increasing the Republican majority, or offsetting the loss of GOP incumbents, would enable their party to expand its list of accomplishments.

"We've had an impact and made a difference," Thune said, adding that the message would be more penetrating if delivered from a group. "We want to show that these elections matter and make a difference. All of us are going to emphasize that; it adds intensity to the message."

Burr, who is considered one of the most likely to play a leadership role at the party committee next cycle, said an effort would be made to get as many of his classmates together next month in each of the targeted states. He acknowledged that the size of the group may vary from place to place.

Burr said the plans had been under discussion for several weeks and became more defined after last week's meeting. But the scheduling is not complete.

Vitter said the lingering expectation that someone from their class chair the NRSC next year did not have much influence on the decision to campaign together.

"I don't think it's a big factor," said Vitter, who emphasized the positive dynamic among his classmates. "We bring a certain energy to the trail."

So far, the class has kept its plans largely to itself. A spokesman for the NRSC said he was not aware of them, nor was a spokesman of one of the participating members.

Minnesota, Michigan, and Maryland are on the itinerary because they are each states where Republicans have a chance to capture a Democratic seat and add to the Republican majority as the class of 2004 did two years ago. They are also closer to more of the lawmakers' states than Washington state and Nebraska, where Republicans also have pick-up opportunities.

The Fight For The Senate: More GOP Headaches, And One For Democrats (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, September 21, 2006

Recent developments have improved Democrats' prospects in their fight to take the Senate, with the Republican hold on the chamber looking more tenuous than even a month ago.

While the renomination of Rhode Island Sen. Lincoln Chafee has improved GOP chances of holding onto his seat, Virginia Sen. George Allen's ongoing problems have put a previously safe Republican seat at growing risk. The development in Virginia has a far greater impact on the fight for control, since it means a sixth GOP seat — the magic number for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee — is now in play.

Chafee's victory over Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey was impressive, particularly because Republican turnout efforts proved to be so effective. Chafee is about even money to hold his seat, not exactly a comfortable position for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, but a far better one than if Laffey had won the party's nomination.

But whatever benefits the Republicans have derived from developments in Rhode Island have been more than erased by Allen's problems in the Old Dominion.

Leaving aside all of the questions about whether the media exaggerated the controversial nature of Allen's "macaca" comment (they did), whether the media's portrayal of the demeaned Jim Webb (D) staff member was ridiculously naive (no argument here), whether Allen's grandmother's religion is relevant (it isn't) or whether The Washington Post is out to defeat the Senator (a lot of Republicans think it is pretty obvious), Allen hasn't stood the light of day very well.

Anyone who watched the Allen-Webb joint appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday with any degree of disinterest had to conclude that Webb looked relatively poised, thoughtful and smart. He thoroughly outpointed the Republican Senator.

Moreover, there now have been enough polls in Virginia to conclude that its Senate race is a single-digit contest, and Northern Virginia's growing importance in the state ought to have Republican strategists worrying about its nominee.

Some Republicans clearly are concerned, while others continue to insist, regardless of the polls, that Allen can't lose and is guaranteed 53 percent of the vote no matter what he says or does. Given how the race has developed and how little ammunition the Allen folks have against Webb, I think those Republicans who are worried have reason for concern.

Additionally, Republican seats in Pennsylvania and Montana now look very, very vulnerable, with a third, Ohio, only slightly better. Rhode Island and Missouri look like tossups, with neither party having a distinct advantage. Add Virginia to those and you have six seats, and at least a scenario for a Democratic takeover.

Two other Senate seats that Democrats have been competing in strongly, Arizona and Tennessee, still look to me to be more difficult for them, though their nominees still have six weeks to change that.

While there has been some "normal" closing in Arizona, the Tennessee contest could get very interesting in the next month if Republican Bob Corker doesn't start to put some room between himself and Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr. For the moment, I'm still expecting that to happen.

The other development in recent weeks has been in New Jersey, where, as I have believed all along, the Democrats' hold on the Senate seat is far from secure, even with the GOP's obvious weakness in the state.

Appointed Sen. Bob Menendez's (D) problems look very real, including a new federal investigation into a landlord/rental agreement with a community group over a building Menendez owns.

Menendez has, for months, flicked off suggestions that ethics could be a problem for him by asserting that he has been a reformer fighting against the establishment throughout his career. Well, Garden State voters — at least so far — haven't bought Menendez's storyline, and even if Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr. sometimes looks too green, voters in the state are giving him a long, long look.

The more Menendez is distracted by questions about himself and the more he is on the defensive, the better Kean's chances of making the contest a referendum on Menendez.

I still am not certain that Kean can beat Menendez, but this contest increasingly looks like a Democratic problem and the GOP's best opportunity to win a seat held by the minority.

Elsewhere, except for Maryland, there aren't a lot of reasons to be terribly excited about Republican prospects. Sure, that could change, but West Virginia never developed at all, and Michigan still looks like a snoozer (especially compared to the state's gubernatorial race). That leaves Minnesota and Washington, both of which seem to be going in the wrong direction for the GOP.

Republicans still have the advantage in the fight for the Senate. While I rate Missouri as a tossup, I still give Sen. Jim Talent (R) an edge. That means Democrats have the advantage in only three states with GOP incumbents: Pennsylvania, Montana and Ohio. They'll need to add at least three more races to that list to win the Senate, and, of course, they cannot afford to lose New Jersey. It still looks very hard, but with the addition of Virginia, it finally looks at least possible.

Allen's Mother Revealed Jewish Heritage To Him Last Month (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

RICHMOND, Sept. 20 -- Henrietta "Etty" Allen said Wednesday that she concealed her upbringing as a Jew in North Africa from her children, including Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), until a conversation across the dining room table in late August.

She said Allen asked her directly about his Jewish heritage when he was in Los Angeles for a fundraiser. "We sat across the table and he said, 'Mom, there's a rumor that Pop-pop and Mom-mom were Jewish and so were you,' " she recalled, a day after Allen issued a statement acknowledging and embracing his Jewish roots as he campaigns for a second term in the U.S. Senate.

At the table in Palos Verdes, Calif., Allen's mother, who is 83, said she told her son the truth: That she had been raised as a Jew in Tunisia before moving to the United States. She said that she and the senator's father, famed former Redskins coach George Allen, had wanted to protect their children from living with the fear that she had experienced during World War II. Her father, Felix Lumbroso, was imprisoned by the Nazis during the German occupation of Tunis.

"What they put my father through. I always was fearful," Etty Allen said in a telephone interview. "I didn't want my children to have to go through that fear all the time. When I told Georgie, I said, 'Now you don't love me anymore.' He said, 'Mom, I respect you more than ever.' "

Allen's heritage became an issue in the Virginia Senate campaign Monday, when television reporter Peggy Fox raised it at a televised debate in front of 600 business executives in Fairfax County. Allen repeated what he has said in the past: "My mother's French-Italian with a little Spanish blood in her. And I was raised as she was, as far as I know, raised as a Christian."

In fact, Allen had just recently learned about their Jewish roots when he made those comments. Allen declined to comment, but his mother said she had sworn him to secrecy.

"I said, well, I just didn't want anyone to know," she explained. "I had said, 'Please don't tell your brothers and sister and your wife.' The fact this is such an issue justifies my actions, and my behavior."

For Allen, the 2006 campaign was supposed to have been a coronation -- an easy reelection to a second term in the Senate and a springboard to national prominence and a possible presidential campaign in 2008. Instead, the last six weeks have become a nightmare for his political consultants and a source of material for late-night comedians.

And for the past three days, he has been forced to deal publicly with a very private matter.

Allen's Jewish heritage has been a subject of low-level political speculation for years, in part because the former governor and first-term senator often refers to his grandfather's incarceration by the Nazis in political speeches. But Allen has always said Lumbroso was a member of the Free French resistance movement and insisted that he and his mother were raised as Christians.

Fox has said her question was prompted by an article in a Jewish newspaper that had explored his heritage last month.

"You've been quoted as saying your mother's not Jewish, but it had been reported her father, your grandfather Felix, whom you were given your middle name for, was Jewish," Fox asked Allen. "Could you please tell us whether your forebearers include Jews, and if so, at which point Jewish identity might have ended?"

Allen reacted angrily, in part, because Fox's question came on the heels of a previous one about the "macaca" controversy. Fox had asked Allen whether he learned the word macaca from his mother. Allen had used the word to describe an Indian American volunteer for the campaign of his Democratic opponent, James Webb. Macaca is a genus of monkey and is a French slur for a dark-skinned person. French and Arabic are spoken in Tunis.

Etty Allen said Wednesday that she had never used the word "macaca" before and had to go to a dictionary to look it up when she heard of the controversy. She said the word did not exist in her dictionary.

"I swear to you, I have never used that word," she said. "I must have used a lot of bad words, but not that word."

Allen's angry reaction at the Chamber of Commerce debate prompted criticism from Internet bloggers and some Jewish leaders, some of whom accused him of hiding his Jewish ancestry or viewing it as a political problem.

"It's strange that George Allen wasn't more curious about his own heritage and a lot of people are wondering why," said George Mason University politics professor Mark J. Rozell.

But Rozell said most Virginia voters are not likely to see the question of Allen's roots as an important one in determining how they will vote in November.

"I don't even think among some of the more hard-core religious conservatives in this state it will cause him any difficulty," Rozell said. "When it comes down to it in November, voters are going to look at George Allen's record, the war in Iraq, Jim Webb, a lot of policy issues."

Allen's mother said she first began concealing her Jewish roots after meeting her future husband, afraid that she would not be accepted by his parents and fearful that her religion could harm his budding coaching career, which started at Whittier College, a school in Southern California founded by Quakers.

"He didn't want me to tell his mother," she said of the elder George Allen. "At that time, that was a no-no, to marry outside the church." Allen died in 1990.

Leo Mugmon, 92, a longtime friend of Allen's mother who knew her as a Jew in Tunis, recalled her decision to hide her faith when she came to the United States.

"She did not say anything to her mother-in-law or her family," Mugmon said. He added that Etty Allen's father, Felix Lumbroso, traveled from Tunis for the Allen wedding. "Mr. Felix didn't say anything about it. In silence, he sort of condoned it."

Etty Allen said she is relieved to no longer have to keep a secret about her past. She said she hopes the revelation does not hurt her son's bid for reelection to the Senate.

"He's fine. He loves challenges," she said, then offered an unsolicited observation that suggests her son might be ready for a break from tough questions: "His favorite time of the week is when he comes home, sits on his riding mower, by himself and mows his lawn and no one is asking him questions."

Exchange Between Allen And TV Reporter On His Heritage (WP)

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

The text of the exchange between Sen. George Allen and WUSA (Channel 9) reporter Peggy Fox at the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce debate Monday in Tysons Corner:

Fox : Senator Allen, you have said several times that you made up the word "macaca" when referring to S.R. Sidarth, the young man of Indian heritage born and raised in Fairfax County who attends your alma mater. But the word is a racial slur in French-influenced African nations, most notably Tunisia. Your mother's Tunisian -- are you sure you never heard the word and if you were just making up a name, to call Sidarth, why not just call him John, something that -- rather than something that sounds derogatory. Was it because he looked different?

Allen : I hope you're not trying to bring my mother into this matter. I have said, and I'll say it once again, I made a mistake. It was a thoughtless moment. I have apologized for it, as well I should. I had never heard that word before, from my mother or from anyone else. If I had any idea that in some parts of the world, for some cultures, that this would be an insult, I would never use that word, because that's not who I am, that's not how I was raised, it's not what I believe in.

Whether it was from my father's football teams, where he had people from all different parts of the country and different backgrounds -- you don't care about, on football teams or on sports teams, what someone's race or religion is or ethnicity is, all you care about is whether they can help the team compete and succeed. And that's the meritocracy that we should aspire to in our country. And if there's one lesson that I learned more than from anyone else it was my mother, whose father was incarcerated by the Nazis in World War II. And of all people in my life who told me about tolerance and not judging people by their religious beliefs or their ethnicity or their race, it is my mother.

And so I made that mistake, I will of course do better, I'm sorry I said it. Nonetheless, there was no intent whatsoever to insult that young man or anyone else. It is not who I am and that is why, by the way, state senator Bennie Lambert, an African American, Democrat, endorsed me last week because he knows my record in making sure this is a land of opportunity for all and especially helping out minority-serving institutions.

Fox : May I ask a follow up? Following the macaca episode, the Jewish press published a story on the Internet that explored your possible Jewish ancestry on your mother's side. You've been quoted as saying your mother's not Jewish, but it had been reported her father, your grandfather Felix, whom you were given your middle name for, was Jewish. Could you please tell us whether your forebearers include Jews, and if so, at which point Jewish identity might have ended?

[Booing from the audience]

Allen : I'm glad you all have that, you have that reaction. You know what our first freedom in this country was? Freedom of religion, where people's rights are not enhanced or diminished on account of their religious beliefs. Thomas Jefferson was the author of that. As we try to stand up a free and just society, that's the first pillar of a free and just society. And to be getting into what religion my mother is, I don't think it's relevant, whatever one person believes, whatever their beliefs may be, is not relevant. So I'd like to ask you, why is that relevant? My religion, Jim's religion, or the religion beliefs of anyone out there. [applause]

My mother's French Italian . . .

Fox : Honesty.

Allen : . . . with a little Spanish blood in her. And I was raised as she was, as far as I know, raised as a Christian. But if you really need to get into such matters . . .

Fox : . . . Honesty, that's all.

Allen : Oh, that's all? That's just all? We need, we need to get this country together. And I respect your right to ask questions. But let's ask questions about issues that really matter to people here, in Virginia, such as how we're going to bring this country together, make us more secure, a land of opportunity. And I'll tell you one other thing, preserve our foundational values, and one of those values is freedom of religion and not making aspersions about people because of their religious beliefs.

September 17, 2006, 3:09 pm Making Nice, but No Progress

The standoff continues between the Bush administration and some senators over limits on CIA interrogations of suspected terrorists, raising questions on whether Congress will act on the matter before it leaves town later this month for the fall campaigns.

Making the rounds of the Sunday talk shows, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley declined to say what specific techniques would be illegal if Congress didn't pass Mr. Bush's proposal. But he said the CIA program would suffer and be shut down if interrogators do not have guidance. He said the White House is working on a compromise that "achieves Senator [John] McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change" the Geneva Conventions. "We need to find a way through that obstacle course, and I think we can," Mr. Hadley said.

Michigan Sen. Carl Levin said he wasn't certain a compromise was possible. "I don't see a way unless the president gives up on his idea that we're going to unilaterally modify Geneva," he told CBS' "Face the Nation"

A Supreme Court ruling in June essentially said the Geneva Conventions on the rights of wartime prisoners should apply to suspected terrorists in CIA custody. The decision froze the interrogations and eventually led the administration to turn over the last 14 prisoners in CIA custody to the military officials running a prison for detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

September 17, 2006, 1:11 pm Chewing Over the Virginia Senate Race

Republican Sen. George Allen, who has seen his big lead over former Navy Secretary Jim Webb deflate since he flung the "macaca" comment at a Webb volunteer of Indian descent last month, squared off with his opponent on NBC's "Meet the Press," where both men found themselves on the defensive. Webb had to answer charges that a magazine article he wrote 27 years paved the way for harrassment and abuse of women at the U.S. Naval Academy. In fact, after some early argument over Iraq and detainee interrogations, the debate turned to dealing with all the baggage.

Allen didn't really need to apologize for his remark, he's already done so repeatedly. Nonetheless, he called it "a mistake" and said "there was no racial or ethnic intent to slur anyone." When pressed on his past embrace of the Confederate flag, Allen said there are "a lot of things I wish I'd learned earlier in life," and pledged to help people of all races become a part of "team America."

Webb said he regretted "many pieces" of the article, such as one passage that referred to Naval Academy dormitories as "a horny woman's dream" and another in which Mr. Webb wrote that he had never met a female he would "trust to provide" combat leadership." Mr. Webb then tried to shift attention back to Allen's previous opposition to admitting women to the Virginia Military Institute. He later noted that he agrees with the Army's current policy of having women "attached" to combat — 62 have died serving in Iraq over the last three years - -but not directly fighting as part of infantry units.

In the end,the two came to agreement on something: chewing tobacco. Show host Tim Russert pressed them both on their long-time tobacco habits, asking if that was a good example for children. Both candidates agreed it was a bad example, but, perhaps in deference to the presence of major tobacco firms in Virginia, neither said they planned to quit. "Yes I do dip," Allen said, striking a softly defiant tone. He then quoted Mark Twain: "Nothing needs more reforming than someone else's habit." –Christopher Conkey

September 15, 2006, 6:27 pm Wait, Who's on the Ballot?

The White House this afternoon released the president's schedule for next week, which includes one intriguing entry. On Thursday, President Bush will be in Orlando, Fla., to attend a "Charlie Christ for Governor" event.

We'll take a guess they meant Charlie Crist , the Republican candidate for Florida governor. It's an easy enough mistake to make.

On the subject of religion, President Bush at a Rose Garden news conference this morning did talk about what he sees as America's changing attitudes. Responding to question about his address to conservative columnists earlier this week in which he brought up a "Third Awakening" of religious devotion, the president said: "It seems like to me that something is happening in the religious life of America… But I'm able to see a lot of people, and from my perspective, people are coming to say, I'm praying for you. And it's an uplifting part of being the president; it inspires me. And I'm grateful that a fellow citizen would say a prayer for me and Laura." –Amy Schatz

September 15, 2006, 5:34 pm Dodging a Dukakis Moment

While touring a high-tech plant today, Massachusetts Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey , the Republican candidate for governor, apparently refused to be seen wearing goggles and a hard hat by waiting photographers, according to the Patriot Ledger. The incident in Quincy follows a similar one last month in New Bedford, the AP reports, when Healey's campaign staff barred photographers from snapping photos "while she was wearing a hair net at a fish processing plant."

Seems to Washington Wire that doing anything to avoid a Dukakis moment, particularly in Massachusetts, is only prudent. Also, let's be honest: Who looks good in a hair net?!

Healey's decision to nix the goggles photo op means the Democratic winner of the state's Sept. 19 primary will have one less photo to choose from when the attack ads start. Three Democrats are currently trying to win the nomination to take on Healey in November. At this point, the governor's race is considered a toss-up. –Amy Schatz

Among the allegations the Justice Department today announced against Rep. Bob Ney (R, Ohio): on two occasions in 2003, he accepted thousands of dollars of gambling chips from a "foreign businessman" for use at private London casinos. In exchange, he lobbied the State Department for an exemption to a trade embargo against a country to which the businessman wanted to sell U.S.-made aircraft and airplane parts, the Justice Department says.

Ney The Justice Department wouldn't divulge the businessman's nationality or the country to which he sought the embargo exception. But according to numerous media accounts, the London rendezvous included British resident Nigel Winfield and Syrian-born Fouad al Zayat, co-owners of Cyprus-based FN Aviation. Their intended market: Iran. (Ney, who once lived in Iran, is the only member of Congress fluent in Farsi.)

Under the gifts section of his 2004 financial disclosure report, Ney listed $34,000 from a "game of chance" at the Ambassador's Club, a London casino. The Justice Department said his combined winnings exceeded $50,000. In June, Ney was one of just 17 Republican to vote against a bill to crack down on Internet gambling. –Ben Winograd

The new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows that a 59% majority of voters rejects President Bush's recent comparison of the war on terrorism to earlier struggles against Nazism and fascism. In equal proportions, nembers of families including a current soldier or military veteran join other voters in calling that "an inappropriate comparison that is only being made to justify the Bush policy."

Americans of all ages, incomes and demographic groups agree on the point; only Republicans and conservatives side with the president. September 15, 2006, 3:10 pm Indiana Voters Leaning Leftward?

When he worked at the White House, Mitch Daniels wasn't always the most popular guy in the room. It's not an uncommon problem for the head of the Office of Management and Budget, whose job includes telling the president and federal agencies how much less money they'll have to spend than they want.

Daniels That's one reason why Daniels, who as Indiana governor has spent a lot of time trying to balance the state's budget, probably won't be fazed by new poll from WISH-TV in Indianapolis, showing Hoosiers aren't very happy with him. Daniels, a Republican, was rated in the fair or poor categories by 57% of all respondents (although just 35% of Republicans). The poll of 800 likely voters conducted from Sept. 5 to Sept. 8 found that 55% think the country is headed in the wrong direction while 41% say its going the right way.

Daniels isn't up for re-election this fall. But three Indiana congressional seats are in play, which is why both Republicans and Democrats are pouring money and resources into the conservative state. Among local issues, voters appear to still be miffed about Daniels's decision to lease a northern Indiana toll road to an international conglomerate as well as the continuing drama over the state's effort to pick a time zone. Consequently, the answer to one poll question–"Would you like to see more Democrats or Republicans elected to Congress this year?"– may be somewhat troubling.

In all, 46% said they'd prefer more Democrats while 41% chose Republican. Among women, 50% preferred Democrats, and 35% favored Republicans. –Amy Schatz

The Citizenship and Immigration Service says its once-monumental backlog for green card, asylum and naturalization requests has almost disappeared—except for the 1.1 million people still in it.

USCIS Director Emilio Gonzalez called a news conference to announce that the service's "net backlog" had been winnowed to 139,000 by the end of July—down from 3.8 million in January 2004—and that he expects to eliminate it by Oct. 1. The backlog includes people applying to join family members, those who want to live and work here permanently, political refugees and those seeking asylum, and people who already are here and want to gain their citizenship.

The news should have come as a relief to certain categories of Filipinos, who have been waiting since 1984 for permission to join family members. Some categories of Mexicans have been waiting since 1993, and some Indians and Chinese have been on the wait list since 1995, according to a monthly government bulletin advising immigrants how long they can expect to wait.

But USCIS, which replaced the old Immigration and Naturalization Service, says it still has a "gross backlog" of a million people whose applications are being held up by other agencies and by situations over which it has no control. About 100,000 of those cases are waiting for the FBI to complete background checks. But most of the gross backlog is because Congress limits the number of new immigrants from any one country to 7% of the yearly total, regardless of the country's size or the number of its people who want to immigrate. Under that rule, tiny Singapore is entitled to as many green cards yearly as China.

The USCIS defines a backlogged case as one that's been in the works longer than six months. That means immigrants from small countries who are applying to join their families face a fairly speedy route through the immigration system. But for those long-waiting Filipinos and Mexicans, the wait could be almost as long as ever. –June Kronholz

September 15, 2006, 11:40 am Activists Call for IMF/World Bank Boycott

Antipoverty activists announce a boycott of the International Monetary Fund/World Bank annual meetings to protest Singapore's refusal to let some of them enter the country.

After massive antiglobalization demonstrations over the last decade, the international lenders have tried to incorporate nongovernmental organizations into their decision-making. But the relationship isn't always smooth.

Now 163 such groups say they won't participate in official events in Singapore. They had planned to raise concerns about the often-austere economic policies the IMF urges its 184 member nations to implement, as well as the environmental impact of dams and other big World Bank projects.

World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz condemned Singapore's "authoritarian" actions. "The one thing I think I would say is that a lot of that damage has been done to Singapore and it's self-inflicted," Wolfowitz told activists at a roundtable, before they walked out. "It is unacceptable."

An IMF spokesman said of the activist groups: "We have been having productive discussions, and we expect them to continue."

In a statement issued Friday, the World Bank said the Government of Singapore informed the organization that it will remove the objections to 22 of the 27 accredited civil society representatives whom they had previously said would be barred from participating in the annual meetings. "We are notifying those persons of their change in status," the World Bank said.

The World Bank said it would continue to urge the Government of Singapore to allow "all accredited individuals be permitted to participate," because "open dialogue with civil society is important for the effective operation of our institutions." –Michael M. Phillips

September 15, 2006, 11:31 am Gee, Thanks

For a moment, imagine that you are state Sen. Joy Padgett of Ohio. You're 59 years old and you've been kicking around local politics for years, paying your dues in both the state House and Senate. After all this time you've finally got a shot at the big-time, the local congressman has retired and endorsed you for the job.

Unfortunately, that congressman is Bob Ney, a six-term member who was forced to resign earlier this year over his shady dealings with lobbyist Jack Abramoff. And on Thursday, the day you win a special primary, beating four other candidates for the chance to take on Democratic lawyer Zack Space to win Ney's seat in November, lawyers close to his case begin leaking word that he will plead guilty to federal criminal conspiracy charges Friday. Plus, he's now in rehab.

Do you:

a.) Curse, letting loose such a long string of expletives that even your 20-something campaign staffers look on in awe

b.) Call state party leaders to complain Ney's trying to torpedo your campaign

c.) Put on a brave face, telling reporters you have no need to distance yourself from the Ney scandal since voters in the district know and trust you

d.) All of the above

Washington Wire is betting Padgett goes with option "c," although it would be hard to blame her for choosing "d" instead.

The AP, which caught up with Padgett this morning in Columbus, reports that she wouldn't comment on the Ney case but says she doesn't worry about distancing herself from the former congressman. "I don't think I have to do that at all. There was an attempt in 2004 to try to Velcro me to (Republican Gov.) Bob Taft, and that didn't work," she said. –Amy Schatz

September 15, 2006, 11:22 am Bush Approval Rating Rebounds

President Bush's job-approval rating rebounded in the latest Harris Interactive poll, rising to 38% from 34% in August. The poll numbers come in the wake of a Wall Street Journal/NBC News Poll that also showed a modest gain, following a series of speeches by President Bush on the Iraq war.

Still, less than one-third of those polled believe the country is going in the right direction–but that's up from last month's 26%. The Harris Interactive poll surveyed 1,004 U.S. adults by telephone from Sept. 8 to Sept. 11.

Capitol Hill figures of both parties, as well as cabinet officials, continued to draw low marks. The top issues on Americans' minds? Iraq–though down slightly–followed by the economy, health care and immigration.

September 15, 2006, 6:00 am The Power of Markets

Whether it's President Bush talking more about terrorism, gas prices dropping or something else, Republicans have improved their prospects of holding onto both houses of Congress in recent weeks, according to an analysis of trading in the Iowa Electronics Market by Moody's Economy.com.

As of Thursday, traders placed a 49% probability that Republicans will lose seats in the House, down from 56% a month ago. In the Senate, where only one-third of the seats are up for grabs, traders see only a 16% likelihood that Republicans will lose seats, down from 27% in August. The probability of Republicans holding onto their current total of 55 seats rose to 73% last night from 67% last month.

The IEM is a Web-based, real-money futures market operated for research purposes by professors at the University of Iowa. Investors can trade between $5 and $500 in a variety of futures contracts, such as whether the unemployment rate will drop or whether the Federal Reserve will raise interest rates later this month, and it opens trading on political outcomes in the months leading up to a major election. Probabilities are determined based on where traders put the price of a typical contract.

Think it doesn't have solid predictive power? Think again. On the eve of the 2004 presidential election, traders forecast President Bush would receive 50.45% of the vote to Sen. John Kerry's 49.55%. Pretty spot on. –Christopher Conkey

September 15, 2006, 12:00 am Poll Finds Support for Iran Strike

Voters talk tough on Iran's nuclear program.

In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 54% say U.S. should strike militarily if necessary to stop Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. Support reaches 62% if U.S. joins international coalition.

Military officials warn a successful strike might only set back Iran's program, not halt it, and prompt Iranian retaliation in Iraq. But "even people who are for troop withdrawals" from Iraq back military action through a coalition, says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts Journal/NBC survey with Republican Bill McInturff.

Though Independents and Republicans would back unilateral strike, Democrats are opposed.

Democratic leaders remain elusive foils for Republican barbs.

Seven in 10 voters don't know top Senate Democrat Reid or have no strong feelings about him; six in 10 say the same of House leader Pelosi, who Republican strategists call out of touch with mainstream. House Speaker Hastert is similarly anonymous.

Senate Majority Leader and 2008 hopeful Frist has better name recognition but split ratings, 21% positive and 23% negative. Voters cite deficit and Iraq policy as biggest fears if Republicans keep control of Congress, gridlock and premature Iraq withdrawal if Democrats take over.

Voters want Wal-Mart to face tougher government oversight.

After criticism from unions and liberal activists, 52% say companies like Wal-Mart "should be reviewed and regulated more" over adequacy of health and pension benefits. That includes majorities of women, Southerners, and rural voters; even 41% of conservatives agree.

By 50% to 45%, voters earning more than $75,000 a year say companies should set their own standards. The Midwest is most sympathetic to that view. Two-thirds of all voters say they've patronized the retailer in the last month.

Overall, Wal-Mart is rated positively by 45%-31%, though Target enjoys stronger image at 51%-10%.

DEMOCRATIC COMRADES: Kerry taps list of three million donors to boost fellow veteran-politicians. An email appeal yields more than $200,000 in 72 hours for Congressional candidates in New York, Pennsylvania and California. By 77%-17%, voters who backed Kerry two years ago favor reducing troops in Iraq.

DIPLOMAT IN CHIEF? Bush and Rice visit U.N. next week to prod allies for sanctions on Iran. Some 31% of voters rate Bush highly as "a world leader," down from 36% a year ago and 49% before the Iraq war.

TAX TACTIC: Republicans weigh new gambit for cutting estate taxes. They might add measure to government funding resolution before leaving Washington for October campaigning. Among voters earning $30,000 or less, just one-third approve Bush's handling of the economy and back Republicans for Congress.

NOT COMPLAINING: Despite controversy over imprisonment and interrogation of detainees, 54% of voters credit Bush administration with "the right course," while only 34% say administration has "gone too far." But by 51%-41%, voters oppose terror trials where suspects couldn't attend or view evidence.

Voters fault corporations, more than Washington, for widening income inequality.

Three in ten blame "excessive salaries and bonuses" for gap between highest-income workers and others. Another 26% say overseas competition, twice the 12% who cite Bush administration and Congress.

Tracking Democratic rhetoric, voters show increasing concern about the gap; one in four call it America's biggest economic problem, virtually matching the share who say energy costs. In international economic speech, Treasury Secretary Paulson says narrowing disparities is "the responsibility of all nations."

By 47%-36%, voters rate Bush poorly for "being compassionate enough to understand average people."

MINOR MEMOS: State whips Pentagon in battle of bureaucratic chiefs; Rice's positive rating rises to 55% from 48% in May 2004, while Rumsfeld's falls to 31% from 39%. Cheney's 50% negative rating exceeds that of both administration colleagues. – John Harwood

September 14, 2006, 7:29 pm Ballot Battle in Pennsylvania

Pennsylvania's Green Party candidate for Senate can't appear on the Nov. 7 ballot unless he can prove to a state court that nearly 3,000 signatures on his nominating petitions are indeed valid.

That's a big issue for Democrats, who worry that Carl Romanelli could siphon crucial votes from their candidate, Bob Casey Jr., who's locked in a tight race with Rick Santorum, the Republican incumbent. "We feel very strongly that [Romanelli's] candidacy will take away votes from Bob Casey and we're hopeful the court agrees with us," said Pennsylvania Democratic Party spokesman Abe Amoros.

Democrats filed suit challenging signatures on Romanelli's petition for listing on the ballot. A month-long review found some 30,000 invalid signatures — ones that are faked, illegible, or aren't those of registered voters — leaving him about 3,000 signatures short of the 67,070 needed. Romanelli lawyer Lawrence M. Otter argues that some of the signatures were incorrectly labeled invalid.

Pennsylvania Democrats accuse Santorum and the Republicans of helping Romanelli's climb to the ballot by financing the candidate's signature campaign and helping in the petition drive.

The Romanelli camp has until his scheduled Sept. 25 court date to rehab the 3,000 mislabeled signatures.

In the meantime, Romanelli's not showing concern. "I am confident I will remain on the ballot — definitely," he said. – Erika Lovley

September 14, 2006, 6:07 pm Dueling Letters Over Judicial Appointee

Trying to revive the nomination of one of President Bush's most controversial judicial appointments, a group of 18 retired military officers sent a letter to top Senate Judiciary Committee members in support of Williams J. Haynes II.

Yesterday's letter sought to debunk a July letter signed by 19 retired military officers that expressed "deep concern" with Haynes' nomination. Haynes, general counsel to the Defense Department, was first nominated to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in 2003, but his nomination has stalled over apprehension about his involvement in crafting legal policies toward detainees in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

According to the July letter, "Mr. Haynes was arguably in the strongest position of any other senior government official to sound the alarm about the likely consequences for military personnel of the views being put forward by the Justice Department" offering legal cover for the use torture during interrogations. Haynes also helped craft the military commission system the Supreme Court struck down in June for departing from the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Yesterday's letter said the July letter created a "highly misleading impression of Jim Haynes" by "asserting that Jim ignored the advice of Judge Advocates with respect to the policy on interrogation of detainees." This morning, the Senate Judiciary Committee was scheduled to discuss Mr. Haynes and four other appeals court candidates President Bush re-nominated earlier this month. The committee could not reach a quorum. – Ben Winograd

DOJ_NMG_0066965

A federal judge's ongoing review of two telecom deals won't slow the government's review of AT&T's pending $67 billion deal to acquire BellSouth Corp., Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin said Thursday.

In a conference call with UBS investors and analysts, Martin was asked about whether a federal judge's antitrust review might delay the government's review of AT&T's current acquisition. The court review focuses on the Justice Department's approval of the SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp. deal as well as Verizon Communication Inc.'s purchase of MCI Inc.

Noting the FCC hopes to complete its review of the BellSouth deal by mid or late October, Mr. Martin said the court review wasn't a problem. "It doesn't really have an impact from our agency's standpoint," he said. "There's not a deadline for us other than a self-imposed" 180-day clock. — Amy Schatz

September 14, 2006, 4:41 pm Run, Don't Walk

The Republican National Committee issued a call to arms, part of its much-admired get-out-the-vote effort. The RNC's "September Sprint to Victory" asks supporters to hold house parties, set up a home-based phone bank and go door-to-door in their neighborhoods in support of local Republican candidates.

Acknowledging that most people have lives to lead and aren't going to put them on hold for political races, Republicans are offering supporters three ways to help (beyond the obvious option of giving $$). There is Turnout Tuesday, in which you can invite a few friends over and turn your house into a mini-call center, using your cellphones; House Party Thursdays, where absentee ballots can be distributed or local candidates invited to speak; or Super Saturday on Sept. 30, which features a walk around the 'hood to spread the word before "invit(ing) folks back home to watch the big game."

Not clear what game that is, although it's a safe bet it's on a campus and involves a football. The volunteer who makes "the biggest impact" during the drive–including volunteers recruited, new voters registered, etc. – will "receive a special surprise gift autographed by President Bush ," (RNC's emphasis).

A spokeswoman said the campaign was an "invaluable part of our broader effort to contact millions of voters in the coming days." She declined to provide any hints about the special prize (although we note the RNC loves handing out autographed photos). –Amy Schatz

September 14, 2006, 2:38 pm Agency Unveils Car-Safety Rules

The Bush administration says proposed rules on electronic stability control systems for all new passenger vehicles would save between 5,300 and 10,300 lives annually and prevent between 168,000 and 252,000 injuries.

Electronic stability control, already available on some vehicles, helps keep cars from veering out of control and tipping over. The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration proposal would require manufacturers to begin installing the technology on SUVs, minivans and pickup trucks under 10,000 pounds, beginning with the 2009 fleet and have it on all such vehicles by model year 2012. The agency figures it will add $111 to the cost of vehicles that already have antilock brake systems, which are needed for stability control to work. –Laura Meckler

September 14, 2006, 2:21 pm Seeing Red in Pennsylvania

Recently, it seemed like Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum was gaining some momentum in his effort to hold his seat from challenger Bob Casey Jr., the Democratic state treasurer. Warm and fuzzy television ads that played all over the state this summer (see "Polka" and "Hoedown") were widely credited with reintroducing the conservative Republican in a good way to the state — and erasing the scary double-digit lead Casey had built-up. When the two debated for an hour on NBC's Meet the Press, many political observers dubbed the Sept. 3 match a draw.

Which brings us to a negative television ad the senator's campaign launched yesterday, dubbed "Corner Bar." It suggests Casey's political team contains a bunch of unethical hacks who are halfway to landing in a jail cell, if they aren't there already. It will be interesting

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has picked Michele A. Davis for the top public affairs position in the department, a role she filled during the tumultuous tenure of President Bush's first Treasury secretary, Paul O'Neill. Bush is expected to announce his intent to nominate her for the assistant secretary's post this afternoon. The position requires Senate confirmation.

While it's a job title she's held before, Davis is expected to play an expanded role, serving as a senior strategist for Paulson on policy as well as communications matters. Davis has been serving as deputy national security advisor at the White House's National Security Council. After leaving Treasury the first time, Davis served as senior vice president of regulatory policy at mortgage giant Fannie Mae. She also served as communications director for former House Majority Leader Richard Armey, (R., Texas).

September 14, 2006, 11:59 am Paulson: Fodder for Bloggers

In a blog post on RGEmonitor.com, Brad Setser praises parts of Wednesday's speech by the new Treasury secretary, but pokes a couple of holes.

Paulson

"It was rather surprising that Paulson's speech didn't explicitly allude to any risks from the rising financial imbalances that have been associated with the current form of globalization. After all there is no intrinsic reason why globalization implies that emerging economies should be financing the world's advanced economies," he says. "I was a bit concerned that Paulson may be putting a bit too much emphasis on domestic capital market reform and opening up China's domestic banking markets to foreign competition and too little emphasis on currency reform…..(L)etting US financial institutions operate Chinese banks won't do much (if anything) to address the concerns of American auto parts workers. …

"Above all, though, I was struck by the irony of the United States – and particularly the Bush Administration – emphasizing how important it is that all countries like up to their international responsibilities…. Wasn't the Bush Administration elected, in part, to make sure that the United States own policies – including its economic policies — weren't subject to any global tests?"

And Brad Delong, the Berkeley blogger who did a stint at the Clinton Treasury, writes that Paulson "appears to have decided to be Secretary of the U.S.-China Relationship. It's an honorable job, and one well worth his considerable talents." Why this approach? "Given the White House he has to deal with, he can do nothing to undo the disastrous fiscal policies of the Bush administration," DeLong suggests. "Given the White House he has to deal with, he can do nothing to bring the resources devoted to entitlement programs into long-run balance with the spending plans of the programs."

At billsdue, a blog that focuses on the improbable combination of China and video games, comes this nugget: "He was definitely trying to speak in language the Chinese government understands, and even cribbed a phrase almost directly from the latest Hu-Wen economic stump speech: China needs a more harmonious, more balanced pattern of growth that gives Chinese households more income and the confidence to spend it."

The blog maintained by the National Association of Manufacturers – whose chief, John Engler, attended the speech, was full of praise: "a clear appreciation of the place and of the nuances of the global trading system." Foreign Policy magazine's blog boiled 4,000 words of rhetoric into a single sentence: "Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson to China: We want you to succeed." –David Wessel

Richards It's slightly too early in the day for the Washington Wire to imbibe, but we're raising a margarita tonight (frozen, no salt), in honor of Ann Richards, a true giant of Texas politics and one of the wittiest pols in the business, Democrat or Republican. President Bush, who ended her political career by defeating her in the 1994 governor's race and became her verbal pincushion, had nice words to say.

DOJ_NMG_0066967

The 73-year-old former governor died yesterday from esophageal cancer, and the Texas statehouse political reporters paid homage today in Dallas, Austin and Houston.

Here's a sampling of the governor's greatest lines, beyond her classic: "Ginger Rogers did everything that Fred Astaire did. She just did it backwards and in high heels."

"I thought I knew Texas pretty well, but I had no notion of its size until I campaigned it."

"I have always had the feeling I could do anything and my dad told me I could. I was in college before I found out he might be wrong."

"Poor George [H.W. Bush], he can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth."

"There is a lot more to life than just struggling to make money."

"I did not want my tombstone to read, 'She kept a really clean house.' I think I'd like them to remember me by saying, 'She opened government to everyone.'"

September 14, 2006, 6:00 am 54 Days Left to Go

Seven-term Republican congressman Jack Kingston's Georgia seat doesn't exactly appear to be in jeopardy. Running against Democrat Rev. Jim Nelson, a United Methodist pastor and author ("Where Would Jesus Put the Sidewalks? A Study Of Faith and Politics"), political prognosticators suggest Kingston needn't give up his Washington digs.

Never hurts to reward the faithful, however, which is why Kingston's campaign committee sent out a desktop flip calendar this summer so supporters could track the last 100 days until Election Day—from Sunday, July 30 to Tuesday, Nov. 7.

Dubbed "100 Reasons to Vote Republican," the calendar is liberally sprinkled with quotes from prominent conservatives, including Rush Limbaugh and President Reagan (Aug. 11: "It has been said that politics is the second oldest profession. I have learned that it bears a striking resemblance to the first." Sept. 21: "The trouble with our liberal friends is not that they're ignorant: It's just that they know so much that isn't so."). It's peppered, too, with quotes from those on the other end of the spectrum, including Dixie Chick Natalie Maines (Sept. 14: "The entire country may disagree with me, but I don't understand the necessity for patriotism.").

The calendar has 200 pages, but the ones after Nov. 7 are blank. Unfortunately, the Friends of Jack Kingston apparently couldn't fill all 200 of them with reasons to vote Republican.

"It's for notes," explained Rob Asbell, a Kingston spokesman, who said this is the second campaign in which the congressman has sent out the calendar/notepad to supporters. — Amy Schatz

Presidential Hopefuls Do A Delicate Dance With Lamont (and Vice Versa) (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — For a road map to the 2008 Democratic presidential primaries, check out Ned Lamont's phone log.

Soon after winning the Democratic Senate primary in Connecticut last month, Mr. Lamont heard from almost the entire Democratic field — a group he refers to, with some amusement, as his "new friends."

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York rushed to donate the maximum amount to his campaign, and is planning a fund-raiser for him in early October. John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator and vice presidential candidate, rallied with him in New Haven. Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee who may try again, e-mailed supporters soliciting money on Mr. Lamont's behalf. And Wesley K. Clark, the retired general and a 2004 also-ran, offered foreign policy advice.

"You could get a pretty good idea of who was running for president by who called," Mr. Lamont said in a recent interview.

But as the dust has settled on the contentious primary defeat of Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, whose downfall was initially seen as an ominous sign for other Democrats who supported the Iraq war, the dance between the presidential contenders and the Lamont campaign has grown more delicate.

Some of the White House hopefuls — most notably Mark R. Warner, the former governor of Virginia — are debating how strongly to align themselves with a candidate who has become an icon of the liberal left. And the Lamont team, despite its initial thrill over the rush of attention, is wary of being exploited or of alienating local voters with too many national political stars.

"We're not going to be a launching pad for the 2008 candidates," said Tom Swan, Mr. Lamont's campaign manager. "Ned is still the Washington outsider. We're not going to have everyone and her sister take a piece of that."

As the general election rematch between Mr. Lamont and Mr. Lieberman — who is now running as an independent — gains intensity, the race remains a litmus test for Democrats with higher aspirations. Candidates and their advisers view the Lamont campaign as a critical marker of anti-incumbency, anti-Bush fervor and the evolution of online political forces known as the Netroots.

The potential candidates are demonstrating their affection for Mr. Lamont in varying degrees, carefully calculating how their connections to the Connecticut contest could reverberate if they run at the national level.

All of this is unfolding as other Democrats, including the heads of the national campaign committees in charge of electing party members to Congress, are largely leaving the Connecticut race to sort itself out. Given Mr. Lieberman's promise to continue caucusing with the Democrats, the outcome will hardly tip the balance of power in the Senate, so party leaders are focusing on more competitive seats being fought for by Republicans (in Connecticut, the Republican candidate, Alan Schlesinger, is stuck in single digits in the polls). As a result, it is the fledgling 2008 field that is mostly driving outside official support for Mr. Lamont.

The relationships may ultimately benefit the national candidates more than the supposed beneficiary. Mr. Lamont's campaign will rise or fall on his popularity among Connecticut voters. The generosity of national Democrats stems mainly from a desire to placate the liberal national forces that elevated his profile during the contentious primary and will play a pivotal role in the presidential selection process starting next fall.

So far, the contest for Mr. Lamont's affections has been waged mainly among the contenders trying to burnish their credentials with the liberal wing: Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Kerry and Mr. Edwards, all three of whom voted in support of the war in Iraq but have since become critical of it, have all claimed to have been in front of the Lamont wave. Mr. Clark was among the earliest to demand that Mr. Lieberman withdraw from the race.

Senator Russ Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat who is considering running for president on his opposition to the war, called Mr. Lamont immediately after the primary and "offered to help out in any way possible," a spokesman said.

"They're sending a message to the Netroots right now — who are some of the most active Democrats — that they are serious players, that they would like some early attention themselves in their presidential races," said Donna L. Brazile, a Democratic Party strategist.

Showing devotion to Mr. Lamont, agreed David Axelrod, another Democratic strategist, is "really important because there's an activist wing within the Democratic Party that helped elect Lamont" and expect the next class of presidential hopefuls to pay tribute.

"The '08 candidates are worried about the Netroots, it's that simple," said a senior Democratic lawmaker, who was granted anonymity in order to talk freely about the race. That constituency, the lawmaker said, has "far more effect in a primary than in a general" election.

Public polls taken since the primary have consistently shown Mr. Lieberman in the lead, though the latest, taken Sept. 15 to 19 by American Research Group, has him up by only 47 percent to 45 percent, within the margin of error.

At least one candidate, Mr. Warner — who made his fortune in technology and is courting the blogosphere in other ways — has largely avoided Mr. Lamont, instead lending his name and fund-raising capabilities to races that are genuinely in play and have longer-term strategic value for the Democratic Party, like Representative Harold Ford Jr.'s bid for the Senate in Tennessee. But even Mr. Warner is covering his bases; his political action committee gave $5,000, the maximum allowed, to Mr. Lamont, as did those with Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Kerry and Mr. Edwards.

Advisers to Mr. Lamont say they appreciate the assistance they have received, but intend to choose their advocates strategically. "To the extent that we can bring people in to show their expertise and the like, we will," said George Jepsen, Mr. Lamont's campaign chairman and a former Connecticut state party chairman. "But we do not want to just have a parade of celebrities."

Still, the Lamont campaign resists suggestions that the flood of attention has subsided since the flush after the primary, insisting that Mr. Lamont has spoken to several of the candidates recently and has been told that they are still willing to do whatever he asks.

At a breakfast with reporters in Washington this month, Mr. Lamont sounded tickled by his sudden standing among the national Democratic A-list. "I like all my new friends," he said.

Asked what kind of advantage Mrs. Clinton might gain from her association with him, Mr. Lamont replied, "I don't know."

"I mean, she's Hillary Clinton and I'm a guy who was pulling fiber optic cable at Georgetown nine months ago," he said, referring to his company, which installs cable on college campuses.

DOJ_NMG_0066969

Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Lamont have not yet appeared publicly together — she invited him to her home in Chappaqua, N.Y., for a confab, but it was closed to the news media. He plans to be by her side at the fund-raiser in October in New York, but has not invited her — or any of the other 2008 hopefuls — to hit the campaign trail in Connecticut.

Despite the help he got from a few national headliners in the primary, like the Rev. Al Sharpton, many inside the campaign now think local names like Senator Christopher J. Dodd — who has presidential ambitions but also a Connecticut address — and Representative Rosa L. DeLauro of New Haven are safer and more effective alliances.

"We have to make our mind up as a campaign: Do we really want a flood of out-of-staters coming in?" Mr. Lamont said over dinner in Washington recently. "Selectively, maybe, yeah, they can burnish my credentials and talk about some different issues in a way that gives me credibility."

Democrat, Republican Talk About Faith (AP-Y)

By Kimberly Hefling

AP, September 21, 2006

Democrat Bob Casey highlights his religious work while Republican Sen. Rick Santorum seeks out evangelical Christians, a reflection of the fierce fight for voters of faith.

Casey, who is a Catholic, has been talking openly about his religious upbringing and his work with the Jesuit Corps. He unveiled a 60-second television ad in the Philadelphia market Tuesday featuring a former student talking about Casey's mentoring from days in the corps' inner-city program.

Similar to a missionary assignment, Casey spent one year with the organization, which he described in a speech last week at Catholic University in Washington.

Religion "is something that a lot of us share, no matter what faith we are," Casey said in a recent interview.

The two-term Santorum, who also is Catholic, has been outspoken on issues consistent with the church's teachings such as opposition to abortion and same-sex marriage. He wrote a book, "It Takes a Family: Conservatism and the Common Good," in which he wrote, "Religious congregations are, by an overwhelming margin, the most important intermediate institution outside the family for the vast majority of Americans."

On Wednesday night in Pittsburgh, close to Santorum's hometown, James Dobson's Focus on the Family Action is sponsoring a "Stand for the Family" rally in support of the religious right. Santorum, who has regular meetings with a religious working group, is slated to address the conservative Family Research Council's voter summit on Saturday.

Religion has been at the forefront of the competitive Pennsylvania race pitting two somewhat similar candidates — both Catholic, both opposed to abortion. It reflects a change from recent elections when many Democrats tended to avoid talking about their faith and essentially conceded religious voters to Republicans. It also highlights a new willingness by Democrats to discuss religion in personal terms.

On Monday, Democratic Sen. John Kerry, the party's 2004 presidential nominee, delivered a speech in California in which he talked of "godly tasks" and described his own journey of faith.

In a recent ad in the Tennessee Senate race, Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr., seated in a church, tells voters, "I started church the old-fashioned way. I was forced to and I'm better for it."

This spring, Santorum addressed via video a get-out-the-vote training session of the Pennsylvania Pastors Network. Once Casey heard about it, he asked to speak to the group and was given a chance. He did it in person.

"To the extent that he is successful, his campaign might become a model for other Democrats in similar circumstances," said John Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life.

Casey has held a double-digit lead in polls over Santorum, the Senate's No. 3 Republican, although recent surveys have shown a tightening contest.

More than one-third of voters in Pennsylvania are Catholic. While the state has about a half million more registered Democrats than Republicans, voters tend to be socially conservative and frequently vote along cultural lines.

Santorum has enjoyed political success siphoning the support of socially conservative Democrats — many of whom once voted for Casey's father, the late Gov. Robert P. Casey. The elder Casey, a strong foe of abortion, was revered by many for standing up to the Democratic Party on the issue.

In his son, some Democrats see an opportunity to reach out to voters alienated by the party's stance on social issues.

An August poll by Muhlenberg College Institute of Public Opinion found that among Catholic voters, Casey led Santorum by seven percentage points. Among anti-abortion voters, Santorum led by 17 percentage points.

While both candidates are Catholic and abortion foes, they differ on some issues critical to religious voters. Casey supports civil unions but opposes same-sex marriage. Santorum advocated for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage; Casey said he didn't support it because it was too divisive.

Last spring, Casey addressed evangelicals on global warming at Messiah College in Grantham, Pa. His openness about his faith appealed to at least one voter.

DOJ_NMG_0066970

Kimberly Tucker, 48, of Dillsburg, Pa., an evangelical Christian who home-schooled her three children, said she wished other Democrats would follow Casey's lead.

"The Democrats really need to get comfortable with that if they want to appeal to the liberal evangelicals," Tucker said. "They need to be more open with their faith. I think if they are, evangelicals are going to come with them."

Ehrlich Wants Paper Ballots For Nov. Vote (WP)

By Christian Davenport And Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

A week after the primary election was plagued by human error and technical glitches, Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) called yesterday for the state to scrap its $106 million electronic voting apparatus and revert to a paper ballot system for the November election.

"When in doubt, go paper, go low-tech," he said.

Linda H. Lamone, the administrator of the Maryland State Board of Elections, quickly denounced the plan to swap voting systems just seven weeks before the general election as "crazy." And Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert) said it "cannot happen. It will not happen."

Ehrlich said that, if necessary, he would call a special session of the Maryland General Assembly to change the law to allow paper ballots. But Miller and House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel) dismissed the idea of a special session, saying elections officials should focus instead on fixing the current system.

"We paid millions. These are state-of-the-art machines," said Miller, who called Ehrlich's announcement a political ploy to energize his Republican supporters.

In Montgomery and Prince George's counties yesterday, election officials continued to count the thousands of paper provisional ballots that could determine the outcome of the 4th Congressional District Democratic primary race between incumbent U.S. Rep. Albert R. Wynn and challenger Donna Edwards. Prince George's officials cracked opened 26 machines yesterday and retrieved votes that had not been counted.

The problems playing out in Maryland have created unease elsewhere in the nation, where more than 80 percent of voters will use electronic voting machines in the Nov. 7 election and a third of all precincts are using them for the first time.

Ehrlich's statement came after a State Board of Public Works hearing at which Lamone said her staff would "work around the clock" to correct the problems that plagued the primary. She vowed that her office would help local election boards retrain judges, recruit new ones and force Diebold Election Systems to fix the problems that caused some of its machines to malfunction.

The idea of switching systems now worried local election officials who said testing new equipment and educating election judges and voters about a new system would be a daunting -- if not impossible -- task.

"There isn't a lot of time," said Marjorie Roher, a spokeswoman for the Montgomery Board of Elections.

Henry Fawell, a spokesman for Ehrlich, said the governor's top priority is to replace the electronic poll books, used to check in voters. But he said Ehrlich "is also interested in moving voters to a paper ballot for this year's general election."

"He realizes it's a tall order," Fawell said. But moving to paper ballots would "eliminate the chronic problems that electronic voting machines demonstrated [Sept. 12] with respect to crashing and susceptibility to tampering."

In the spring, Ehrlich advocated leasing optical scan machines that use paper ballots, a proposal that won unanimous support in the House of Delegates but was rejected by the Senate.

Many of the problems that marred this month's primary resulted from human error. Election judges in Baltimore failed to show up, meaning the polls opened late. In Montgomery, voting at nearly all 238 precincts was delayed because officials forgot to distribute plastic cards needed to operate voting machines.

In Prince George's, election officials struggled to transmit data electronically from polling places to a central office on election night, delaying the counting process for hours. In the days since, they have also discovered that dozens of memory cards were not counted after the election; some remained locked in voting machines for days.

Yesterday, county election officials began opening selected machines to locate the missing cards and capture the voting information contained on them.

Also yesterday, Gene Raynor, the Baltimore election director, resigned, saying Lamone and the General Assembly "have set dangerous precedents that, in my opinion, threaten the integrity of November's elections." Raynor previously sat on the State Board of Elections, where he had joined members in trying to oust Lamone two years ago.

There were also technical problems during the primary, mainly with the electronic poll books that were used in the state for the first time. They replaced the paper printouts of the voter registration rolls, allowing election judges to check in voters electronically.

Some crashed and needed to be rebooted, election judges reported. Others failed to transmit the name of a checked-in voter to the other machines in the same polling place. That meant, theoretically, that a voter could cast more than one ballot. Officials said they had no evidence of any voter fraud.

Lamone said the electronic poll books, purchased from Diebold in June and July, were tested in the days before the election. But those tests did not reveal any problems.

Mark Radke, a Diebold spokesman, said many of the poll books crashed because software created exclusively for Maryland caused the machines' memories to fill up after about 40 people had checked in to vote.

He said the company was investigating the synchronization problems.

But Ehrlich said he wasn't willing to risk the possibility that such glitches would remain for the November election, in which he is seeking a second term.

"I'm not sure we can afford another experiment," Ehrlich said after the Board of Public Works hearing. "I want to play it safe."

His position was supported in the hearing by Avi Rubin, a Johns Hopkins University computer scientist who worked as an elections judge during the primary and has long been critical of the touch-screen voting machines.

Gilles W. Burger, chairman of the State Board of Elections, said his panel has requested that Diebold officials appear at its meeting Tuesday.

"Their feet are going to be held to the fire," Burger said.

Maryland's election law leaves it to the State Elections Board to pick a voting system and certify its reliability and security. Mark Davis, the assistant attorney general who represents the board, said it has already performed required tests on the touch-screen machines.

"The board feels it would be catastrophic to try to do that for another system between now and the general election," he said. "It just doesn't make any sense."

The Battleground Is Joined (WSJ)

By Russ Smith

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Maryland has never been much considered, since the term was coined, a "battleground state." Registered Democrats outnumber Republicans by a two-to-one margin, and reliably voted for John Kerry (by 13 percentage points) in 2004 and Al Gore (by 17 percentage points) in 2000. Both Maryland senators are Democrats, as well as six of its eight-member House delegation. Yet the run-up to the Sept. 12 primary was the most frenzied political blitz in recent state history. Improbably, Maryland has emerged as one of the most contested states in the country, featuring very competitive gubernatorial and Senate elections. All this is more improbable still in a year not expected to bring much November cheer to the GOP.

Maryland does have a Republican governor, Robert Ehrlich, who was elected in 2002 (the first member of his party since 1966), but that was widely attributed to the inept campaign of his opponent, Kathleen Kennedy Townsend. Not surprisingly, Mr. Ehrlich has since been stifled by the Democratic legislature and unremitting criticism from the Baltimore Sun and the Washington Post; and he is now facing Baltimore's popular mayor, Martin O'Malley. The two men dislike each other personally, and as the governor told an AARP audience on Sept. 14, they "agree on nothing," accusing the mayor of being a "pseudo populist" who would govern through "speeches" and "euphemism." Mr. O'Malley replied in kind.

The match is increasingly nasty, loaded with hyperbole on both sides and expected to be the most expensive in state history. The governor is called the "$20-million man" by Democrats, and Mr. O'Malley, for his part, will be the beneficiary of fundraising appearances by Hillary and Bill Clinton.

Mr. O'Malley's television advertising attacks Mr. Ehrlich's record on education, opposition to a minimum wage hike, the environment and, echoing the national Democratic theme, pictures the incumbent clasping raised hands with George Bush at a past rally. It's not subtle, but it undoubtedly pleases Mr. O'Malley's firm base -- which may prove his Achilles' heel. His past gaffes -- he said he was "more worried about the actions and inactions of the Bush administration" than al Qaeda, at a Baltimore rally for John Kerry in July 2004 -- have demonstrated that he sometimes speaks without thinking about political repercussions.

If Mr. Ehrlich wins re-election, his profile would rise considerably; and he could make an attractive running mate for the Republican presidential nominee in two years. But the Maryland race with the more acute national resonance is for the Senate seat vacated by the retiring Democrat Paul Sarbanes, with attention focused on current Lt. Gov. Michael Steele. Not only is the national Republican majority threatened, but should Mr. Steele win the seat -- he's currently several points behind in the polling -- he'd be the first African-American senator from Maryland, and only the sixth in Senate history. That possibility sticks in the collective craw of local Democrats, who don't like Mr. Steele's cultural conservatism, for one, and are petrified, for two, that the next Barack Obama could be a Republican.

In the primary, Democratic voters did have the opportunity to nominate their own black candidate, Kweisi Mfume, a charismatic former congressman and NAACP president, but chose instead U.S. Rep. Ben Cardin by a close margin. Mr. Cardin, a 20-year House veteran whose studious demeanor resembles that of Mr. Sarbanes, was backed by the Democratic establishment, as well as the Post and the Sun, an "anointment" that caused no small resentment among Mr. Mfume's impassioned supporters. Had Mr. Mfume prevailed and faced off against Mr. Steele, it would've guaranteed a history-making precedent.

In any case, although Mr. Cardin's camp scoffs at the notion, Mr. Steele has the potential to capture a sizable percentage of Maryland's black voters, many of whom feel taken for granted by the Democrats. The lieutenant governor, raised by his mother in a dangerous Washington neighborhood and a graduate of Johns Hopkins, appeals to church-going citizens who share his opposition to abortion and gay marriage, if not necessarily his erstwhile support for George Bush's foreign policy.

Maryland's latent racial politics have made for some curious political bedfellows. Mr. Mfume, muddying the waters, has endorsed Mr. Cardin, but hasn't yet made any commitment to campaign vigorously on his behalf. Also, Mr. Mfume told reporters that "Mike Steele's a great guy," even though their political platforms are polar opposites. In late August, Mr. Steele was feted at a fundraiser hosted by hip-hop impresario Russell Simmons, who almost always reserves his endorsements for Democrats. Mr. Steele's emphasis on black empowerment and entrepreneurship, evidently, cuts across political lines.

Mr. Cardin -- whose campaign war-chest was fairly depleted by his primary race -- has not begun a general election television campaign, but Mr. Steele has. Given today's political climate, he's distancing himself from Mr. Bush and even the Republican Party, presenting his candidacy as that of an "outsider" who'll clean up corruption in Washington. His already ubiquitous advertisement (somewhat hokey, but Republicans do have to be inventive this year), begins with Mr. Steele saying, "Soon your TV will be jammed with negative ads from the Washington crowds. Grainy pictures and spooky music saying Steele hates puppies and worse. For the record, I love puppies." Seriously.

The commentariat has given the unconventional campaign mixed reviews. But even the fact that it is such a live topic of discussion reinforces the fact that the race is anyone's game, especially with the uncertain African-American vote, 29% of the population. While the prevailing wisdom seems to be that Mr. Cardin will hold the seat for the Democrats, Mr. Steele has a clear shot. The Democrats are -- and ought to be -- very nervous.

Still, although both Mr. Steele and Mr. Ehrlich trail in current polls by single digits, one indication of the volatility is that I can't find a single friend who will accept a small wager that both Republicans will emerge victorious.

Texas Candidate Accused Of Racist Crack (AP-Y)

By Kelley Shannon

AP, September 21, 2006

Gubernatorial candidate and professional wiseacre Kinky Friedman was accused Wednesday of making another racially offensive remark — this time in a year-old interview in which he said sexual predators should be thrown in prison and forced to "listen to a Negro talking to himself."

The independent candidate already was under fire for referring to Hurricane Katrina evacuees in Texas "crackheads and thugs." Some black politicians from Houston took that remark as a slap at black victims of the storm.

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram and the Houston Chronicle have reported on an interview with Friedman that aired on CNBC last year in which the country singer and comedian was asked what to do with sexual predators.

"Throw them in prison and throw away the key and make them listen to a Negro talking to himself," Friedman said. He also called "Negro" a "charming word."

State Rep. Garnet Coleman, former chairman of the Texas Legislative Black Caucus, said the remarks are unacceptable from a candidate for governor, and sound more like something uttered by someone running for "class clown or the grand wizard of the Ku Klux Klan."

Friedman's spokeswoman, Laura Stromberg, said Wednesday: "Texans who know anything about Kinky know that he's not a racist, and they're going to see through all of this political correctness very soon. This is what they've got? Bring it on. Texans can see right through."

Democratic candidate Chris Bell said he was offended by Friedman's remark, and added, "I just don't think those types of comments have a place in this campaign."

Mark Sanders, a spokesman for independent candidate Carole Keeton Strayhorn, said such "divisive language has no place in this campaign. Carole's campaign is about uniting people to get things done, not about dividing people."

Republican Gov. Rick Perry's campaign declined to comment.

Friedman was traveling to New York for a fundraiser Wednesday and was not available for comment. He told the Star-Telegram on Tuesday that anyone who is offended by his comment should vote for one of the other candidates.

"If I've got to lie to people, sweep the truth under the rug and worry about offending people, I'm not going to be very effective," Friedman said.

His spokeswoman said part of the "Negro" line was derived from a book Friedman wrote in the late 1980s that was being discussed in the CNBC interview before Friedman used the phrase.

"The United Negro College Fund doesn't have a problem with the word Negro," Stromberg said, adding that Friedman does not use the word in everyday conversation.

Friedman also took some heat recently for a remark about ethnic politicking.

"I don't eat tamales in the barrio, I don't eat fried chicken in the ghetto, I don't eat bagels with the Jews for breakfast," said Friedman, who is Jewish. "That to me is true racism."

Bills Toughen Restrictions On Sex Offenders (LAT)

By Jenifer Warren

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

Sacramento, Calif. — Calling public safety government's most important job, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Wednesday signed a package of bills increasing prison terms for many sex offenders and barring them from loitering near schools and parks upon release.

The measures, signed seven weeks before voters will decide on a ballot initiative offering similar provisions, also require that sex offenders deemed high risk by authorities wear electronic tracking devices while on parole.

Backers said the laws give California the nation's toughest restrictions on sex offenders, a category of felons facing an expanding national crackdown.

Schwarzenegger, flanked at a Capitol signing ceremony by a bipartisan group of legislators and police, said the bills would "help us fight sexual predators and make our state a safer place to live and raise our families."

The broadest measure, by Sen. Elaine Alquist, D-Santa Clara, would increase the penalty for child rape to 25 years to life in prison; allow possession of child pornography to be charged as a felony; extend prison sentences for Internet luring; and lengthen parole terms for violent ex-felons to 10 years.

Other bills would require registered sex offenders to disclose their registration status when applying for certain jobs and create an oversight Sex Offender Management Board.

Analysts say the legislation would cost the state more than $200 million annually, largely by expanding the prison population and requiring more parole agents to monitor ex-offenders for longer periods of time.

The Alquist billwas put forth by Democrats after Republicans failed to win passage of their version. Frustrated, two GOP legislators launched a bid to qualify their version for the November ballot, resulting in Proposition 83, dubbed "Jessica's Law" by proponents.

The initiative differs from the bills in two major respects, involving electronic tracking of ex-offenders and limits on where they may live. Under Proposition 83, all registered sex offenders would be required to undergo electronic monitoring for life, regardless of their offense or the likelihood they would re-offend. Under SB 1178 by Sen. Jackie Speier, D-Hillsborough, signed by the governor, high-risk former felons would be tracked with electronic devices while on parole.

The ballot measure also prohibits ex-offenders from living within 2,000 feet of schools or parks, or additional locations identified by local governments. The legislation bans loitering around schools, parks or other locations where vulnerable populations congregate but does not limit where ex-offenders may live.

Some experts say the new laws make Proposition 83 unnecessary because it mirrors many of the tougher-sentencing aspects of the legislation. Critics also argue that the loitering ban contained in legislation would be more effective than simply limiting where ex-offenders may live.

"The bills the governor is signing give California virtually every positive thing that could come out of Jessica's Law," said Robert Coombs of the California Coalition Against Sexual Assault, a statewide network of rape crisis centers. "These bills do not take sex crime lightly, but they do the job in a more thoughtful way than Jessica's Law."

Schwarzenegger, however, said the state still needs Proposition 83, and Sen. Chuck Poochigian, R-Fresno, a co-author of one bill signed by the governor, agreed. Poochigian said the ballot measure is tougher in one respect, allowing designation of an offender as a sexually violent predator after just one victim rather than two.

While cracking down on sex offenders has become a national trend, a federal study showed a 79 percent decline in sexual assaults against children ages 12 to 17 between 1993 and 2003.

The number of arrests for sex crimes against kids in California also has declined during this decade, despite population growth of 6 percent, state statistics show.

Obama Urges Challenge To Bush Policy (AP-Y)

By Will Lester

AP, September 21, 2006

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama on Wednesday called the view that President Bush has been perfect in fighting terrorism an illusion and urged Democrats to challenge the Bush administration's policies.

"On the terrorism front, I'm happy to have that debate," the first-term Illinois senator said following a speech on energy at Georgetown University. "The notion that the president has led a flawless policy on terrorism is an illusion."

Obama, mentioned as a possible 2008 presidential candidate, said the nation is involved in "a war in Iraq that has vastly expanded the number of terrorist recruits, a deteriorating situation in Afghanistan and Osama bin Laden has not been caught. We should not shy away from that debate."

Democrats have opposed Bush administration anti-terrorist measures such as the warrantless wiretapping program and proposals to allow aggressive interrogation of prisoners.

Obama questioned why the terrorism debate should become more intense around elections.

DOJ_NMG_0066974

In this politically charged atmosphere, Republicans and Democrats have clashed over Bush's Iraq war policy and his efforts to combat terrorism. Republicans have argued Democrats are weak on defense, seeking to exploit their advantage with voters on the issue.

Several GOP lawmakers and members of Bush's Cabinet have suggested Democrats are aiding the terrorists and behaving like Nazi appeasers.

Democrats have countered that the rhetoric smacks of the McCarthyism of the 1950s.

"But we don't always pick our fights, especially when the president has the bully pulpit," he said.

His talk was sponsored by the liberal political group Moveon.org.

Tracy Schmitt, spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, responding to Obama's comments, argued that his Democratic Party's "opposition to the tools imperative to the war on terror illustrates a startling lack of understanding about how to keep America safe."

Stem Cells Appear To Undo Some Heart-Attack Damage, Study Says (LAT)

By Karen Kaplan And Alan Zarembo

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

Using stem cells harvested from patients' own bone marrow, researchers reported Wednesday that they improved cardiac function in heart attack patients months, years -- and even decades -- after the patients suffered their attacks.

The infusion of stem cells boosted cardiac pumping efficiency by 7 percent in three months -- a modest gain, but still a significant improvement for a chronic condition.

In one case, a patient who had suffered a heart attack 30 years earlier showed an 11 percent improvement after the treatment, according to the study published in the New England Journal of Medicine.

The German researchers also found tentative signs that patients can continue to improve with repeated stem-cell treatments.

"We have always thought that a heart attack is permanent damage, but now there is the potential that this damage can be repaired," said Dr. Christopher Cannon, a cardiologist at Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston who was not involved in the research.

While the researchers are uncertain why the therapy works, the findings are a sign that the long-touted regenerative powers of stem cells may be moving from the laboratory into the realm of viable human therapies.

Some researchers cautioned that it was too soon to say that the results could be translated into routine treatment.

"There are a number of therapies that have gotten to this step, but when subjected to more rigorous trials have not worked," said Dr. Gregg Fonarow, a professor of cardiovascular medicine at the University of California, Los Angeles. "This is a therapy that may or may not pan out."

Dr. Andreas Zeiher, chair of the department of medicine at Johann Wolfgang Goethe University in Frankfurt, Germany, and senior author of the study, said the preliminary results pointed to potential new strategies for treating chronic heart disease -- a condition for which there is currently no cure.

Stem cells present one of the most tantalizing mysteries in medicine. Embryonic stem cells are capable of generating any type of tissue in the body, but scientists haven't learned the biochemical means to transform them.

The current study focused on adult stem cells, of which there are many types, each focused on regenerating a specific group of tissues to help the body repair normal wear and tear.

Stem cells from bone marrow have been used for decades to regenerate blood and immune cells in cancer patients. Laboratory experiments suggest that these cells -- or others found in bone marrow -- can also make heart muscle, blood vessels, nerve cells and other tissues.

Because the stem cells can be collected from the same patients they will be used to treat, they avoid problems of tissue rejection.

Heart disease has been one of the primary targets of stem-cell research.

About 1.2 million heart attacks occur in the United States per year, leading to nearly 500,000 deaths, according to the American Heart Association.

The German researchers recruited 75 patients who had suffered heart attacks at least three months -- and as long as 30 years -- earlier.

The patients already were receiving state-of-the-art drug treatments for their heart disease, including beta blockers and cholesterol-lowering statins.

The researchers extracted 50 milliliters of bone marrow from each patient's hip. They isolated a soup of cells that included the stem cells and infused it into patients within hours after the extraction.

The researchers divided the patients into three groups. One received the bone marrow stem cells, and another was treated with different stem cells derived from their own blood. A third group served as a control.

Three months later, the researchers tested the patients' left ventricular ejection fraction, a measure of how much oxygenated blood is pumped into the circulatory system. In healthy people, it ranges from 57 percent to 75 percent.

The patients in the study started out with ejection fractions ranging from 29 percent to 56 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0066975

Those treated with bone marrow stem cells saw their heart-pumping efficiency increase over three months by an average of 2.9 percentage points -- a 7 percent improvement.

Over the same period, patients in the control group saw their pumping efficiency decline by an average of about 3 percent while those treated with blood stem cells dropped about 1 percent.

To confirm their findings, the researchers swapped the treatments and gave patients in the control group either blood or bone marrow stem cells. Again, the patients who got bone marrow cells saw an increase in their pumping efficiency.

Fonarow of UCLA said the improvement was similar to the effect of statins, which boost pumping efficiency by 5 percent to 8 percent.

The patients treated with bone marrow cells showed an increased ability to tolerate physical activity before getting tired and breathless -- and the improvements have been sustained, Zeiher said.

He said one patient who had suffered a heart attack four years earlier improved by 61 percent and returned to the golf course to play at least nine holes. Some patients have made further progress by receiving one or two additional infusions over a two-year period.

"For the past 20 years, we have obsessed about treating (heart attacks) quickly -- time is muscle," said Dr. Douglas Losordo, chief of cardiovascular research at St. Elizabeth's Medical Center in Boston. "What this paper tells us is there is another time window for therapeutic intervention that's quite a bit longer and larger than we thought."

Dr. Anthony Rosenzweig, director of cardiovascular research at Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston, said the results suggest the stem cells were doing more than just accelerating the recovery process.

"These people were, on average, six years after their heart attacks," he said. "If it were just hastening healing after a heart attack, you wouldn't necessarily predict you'd be able to have a beneficial impact so long after."

Laboratory experiments have shown the cells can rebuild damaged heart cells, stimulate the formation of new blood vessels and release chemicals that aid the healing process, Zeiher said. But in patients, he said, "it is extremely difficult to assess these different mechanisms of action."

Some doctors, however, noted that a key piece of information was missing from the study: What exactly were the bone marrow cells doing inside the heart?

"They provide no evidence that the injected (stem cells) actually settled in the heart," Dr. Robert S. Schwartz, deputy editor of the New England Journal, wrote in a perspective piece accompanying the study. He added in an interview: "Physicians should know how any therapy they give works. That's fundamental."

Others found the mystery less bothersome.

"We still don't know how statins work, but I haven't stopped prescribing them," Losordo said.

The German researchers also published results of a companion study showing that patients who received the bone marrow cells within seven days of a heart attack improved their blood-pumping efficiency by 11 percent after four months, compared with a 6 percent boost for patients who received a placebo.

Human Stem Cells Are Found To Help Rats' Vision (NYT)

By Nicholas Wade

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

Pointing the way to a possible clinical use of human embryonic stem cells, researchers have improved vision in rats suffering from a disease similar to age-related macular degeneration.

The scientists, at Oregon Health and Science University, used human embryonic stem cells that had spontaneously converted into the special cells that line the base of the retina. The cells, which support the light-sensing rod and cone cells above them, are damaged in some forms of macular degeneration.

A group led by Raymond Lund says members injected these human cells into the retina of a special breed of rat in which the retina degenerates shortly after birth. The cells rescued the rats' vision, as judged by several tests, for three months after birth, the researchers report today in the journal Cloning and Stem Cells.

The injected human cells seemed to behave as retinal cells should, and the treated rats retained some six layers of rods and cones in their retinas, as much as half the normal value.

The human retinal lining cells, derived from different cultures of embryonic stem cells, were supplied by Advanced Cell Technology, a company with laboratories in Worcester, Mass. Dr. Neal Adams of the Wilmer Eye Institute in Baltimore said the development was important and "shows us some of the hope that regenerative medicine possesses." But many more stages lie ahead before any clinical test of the cells in patients with macular degeneration could be tried, Dr. Adams added.

Macular degeneration is a good candidate for embryonic stem cell therapy, at least in principle, because the eye is not closely monitored by the immune system. So cells from another individual could be grafted with lesser risk of rejection than at other sites.

A bank of retinal cells derived from 100 embryonic stem cells of different immunological backgrounds should suffice to provide a good match to most of the American population, said Robert Lanza of Advanced Cell Technology.

Although the experiment suggests a possible treatment for age-related macular degeneration, a disease that affects one-third of the population older than 75, many uncertainties remain to be addressed. The disease treated in the rats is caused by a genetic defect and is not exactly the same as the human disease.

Also, as with many proposals for cell therapy, the replacement cells are liable to be damaged in time by whatever disease process killed the patient's cells. Dr. Adams said macular degeneration was probably caused by a mix of environmental and genetic factors. Even if replacement cells should also fall victim to the disease, he said, they may buy the patient extra time and be a valuable treatment.

Stem Cell Experiments Slow Vision Loss In Rats (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

Researchers will report today that cells grown from human embryonic stem cells slowed vision loss when injected into the eyes of rats with a disease similar to macular degeneration, the leading cause of blindness in people older than 55.

The experiments do not prove that the cells, obtained through the destruction of human embryos, will work in people. But by showing that the cells have the potential to fill in for failing cells in the retina, experts said, the work may help justify trying the technique in humans.

Raymond D. Lund, then at the University of Utah's John A. Moran Eye Center in Salt Lake City, and Robert Lanza of Advanced Cell Technology Inc. (ACT) in Worcester, Mass., started by developing a reliable method for turning embryonic stem cells into retinal pigment epithelium cells, which nourish the light-sensitive "photoreceptor" cells in the eye. In macular degeneration, the pigment cells gradually disappear.

The researchers achieved the transformation in all 18 stem cell lines they worked with -- including some provided by the National Institutes of Health and others developed privately at Harvard University and at ACT -- proving that their approach can consistently produce the crucial pigment cells. Then they injected the cells, about 20,000 per eye, into the retinas of 14 rats with a genetic disease similar to macular degeneration. Eight control rats received eye injections without any cells.

Forty days after treatment, the team measured retinal electrical activity in response to flashes of light, and it found that the treated rats were twice as responsive as the untreated ones, which by then were going blind. A separate test -- which tracks eye and head movements in response to a moving display, a measure of an animal's ability to discern fine details -- showed that the treated rats had twice the visual acuity of the untreated rats nearly three months after treatment.

Microscopic examination of the retinas at autopsy showed that the treated eyes had healthy photoreceptor layers five to seven cells thick, while the untreated eyes had an average thickness of just one cell. (Healthy rats have layers 10 to 12 cells thick.) None of the cells divided abnormally or grew into tumors, the team reports in today's issue of the journal Cloning and Stem Cells.

"It's important and pretty exciting work," said Lucian V. Del Priore, an expert in retinal cell transplants at Columbia University. A steady source of safe, laboratory-cultivated cells for retinal transplants would be a welcome advance, he said.

But Del Priore cautioned that the rat disease is not identical to macular degeneration (no animal disease is), and it remains uncertain how long the new cells will survive and work. Immune-system responses, while generally suppressed inside the eye, can eventually lead to rejection, he said.

'A Dissident Of Islam' (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

While her security contingent waits outside the Georgetown restaurant, Ayaan Hirsi Ali orders what the menu calls "raw steak tartare." Amused by the redundancy, she speculates that it is intended to immunize the restaurant against lawyers, should a customer be discommoded by that entree. She has been in America only two weeks. She is a quick study.

And an exile and an immigrant. Born 36 years ago in Somalia, Hirsi Ali has lived in Ethiopia, Kenya, Saudi Arabia and the Netherlands, where she settled in 1992 after she deplaned in Frankfurt, supposedly en route to Canada for a marriage, arranged by her father, to a cousin. She makes her own arrangements.

She quickly became a Dutch citizen, a member of parliament and an astringent critic, from personal experience, of the condition of women under Islam. She wrote the script, and filmmaker Theo van Gogh directed, "Submission," an 11-minute movie featuring pertinent passages from the Koran (such as when it is a husband's duty to beat his wife) projected on the bodies of naked women.

It was shown twice before Nov. 2, 2004, when van Gogh, bicycling through central Amsterdam in the morning, was shot by an Islamic extremist who then slit his throat with a machete. Next, the murderer (in whose room was found a disc containing videos of "enemies of Allah" being murdered, including a man having his head slowly sawed off) used another knife to pin a long letter to van Gogh's chest. The letter was to Hirsi Ali, calling her a "soldier of evil" who would "smash herself to pieces on Islam."

The remainder of her life in Holland was lived under guard. Neighbors in her apartment building complained that they felt endangered with her there and got a court to order her evicted. She decided to come to America.

Holland evidently tolerates everything except skepticism about the sacramental nature of multiculturalism. One million of the country's 16 million residents are Muslims, and the political left has appropriated the European right's traditional celebration of identity grounded in racial and ethnic traditions and culture. But the recoil of many Dutch people from Hirsi Ali suggests that the tolerance about which Holland preens is a compound of intellectual sloth and moral timidity. She was more trouble than the Dutch evidently think free speech is worth.

Her story is told in a riveting new book, "Murder in Amsterdam," by Ian Buruma, who is not alone in finding her -- this "Enlightenment fundamentalist" -- somewhat unnerving and off-putting. Having experienced life circumscribed by tribal and religious communities (as a girl she suffered the genital mutilation called female circumcision), she is a fierce partisan of individualism against collectivism.

She reminds Buruma of Margaret Thatcher's sometimes abrasive intelligence and her fascination with America. He is dismissive of the idea that she is a Voltaire against Islam: Voltaire, he says, offended the powerful Catholic Church, whereas she offends "only a minority that was already feeling vulnerable in the heart of Europe."

She, however, replies that this is hardly a normal minority. It is connected to Islam's worldwide adherents. Living sullenly in European "dish cities" -- enclaves connected by satellite television and the Internet to the tribal societies they have not really left behind -- many members of this minority are uninterested in assimilation into open societies.

She calls herself "a dissident of Islam" because, given what Allah supposedly enjoins and what she knows is right, "the cognitive dissonance is, for me, too much." She says she is not "a militant atheist," but the emphasis is on the adjective.

Slender, elegant, stylish and articulate (in English, Dutch and Swahili), she has found an intellectual home here at the American Enterprise Institute, where she is writing a book that imagines Muhammad meeting, in the New York Public Library, three thinkers -- John Stuart Mill, Friedrich Hayek and Karl Popper, each a hero of the unending struggle between (to take the title of Popper's 1945 masterpiece) "The Open Society and Its Enemies." Islamic extremists -- the sort who were unhinged by some Danish cartoons -- will be enraged. She is unperturbed.

Neither is she pessimistic about the West. It has, she says, "the drive to innovate." But Europe, she thinks, is invertebrate. After two generations without war, Europeans "have no idea what an enemy is." And they think, she says, that leadership is an antiquated notion because they believe that caring governments can socialize everyone to behave well, thereby erasing personal accountability and responsibility. "I can't even tell it without laughing," she says, laughing softly. Clearly she is where she belongs, at last.

Juice For The Apple (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

The Mets and Yankees may be safely in first place, but New Yorkers haven't had much else to cheer about lately. The state ranks first in the nation in net outmigration since 2000, according to a Manhattan Institute analysis of Census data, and the economic damage is especially notable in such struggling upstate areas as Utica and Buffalo. With even nearby Rhode Island planning a reduction in income tax rates, New York will slip further behind on the cost of doing business.

Enter GOP candidate for Governor John Faso, who is expected to release a tax reduction plan today that could at least put New York back in the game for jobs and investment. At the urging of such advisers as economist Larry Kudlow, Mr. Faso will propose to repeal the state's tax on dividends and capital gains over four years and immediately zero out the capital gains tax on all new investment in the state. Since the amount of new investment under the current tax regime is so microscopic, eliminating that capital-gains levy would cost the state almost nothing in lost revenue even on a static basis.

It's always been a strange paradox that New York, which fancies itself the financial capital of the globe, tries to repel capital with high taxes. Mr. Faso will also propose cutting the corporate income tax, as well as indexing the personal income tax brackets for inflation while chopping the top marginal rate to 6.25% from 6.85% (plus 3.65% if you live in New York City). The Big Apple's top rate would fall below 10% for the first time in decades. "When it comes to taxes, the world is flat and New York should be too," says Mr. Faso, referring to the flat-tax movement sweeping Europe and other parts of the world.

The current front-runner in the Governor's race, Democratic Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, isn't likely to follow suit. His own tax plan focuses on property levies, which are the fourth highest in the country. That sounds good, but he can't resist adding a class warfare wrinkle to his proposal for tax "relief," imposing an income test so that only lower- and middle-income homeowners get his rebate.

Property taxes have long been flat-rate levies that rise based only the value of one's home, so Mr. Spitzer is proposing to make the property tax as "progressive" as the income tax rates that have driven so many talented families and businesses out of the state. A state that found the cash to increase spending by 13% last year can afford a far bigger tax cut.

For years, Albany politicians have tried to lure businesses by offering lucrative special favors, one smokestack at a time. But that kind of corporate cronyism, financed through "economic development" grants and specific tax subsidies ($1 billion in handouts were just awarded to computer chip maker AMD), has only narrowed New York's tax base and accelerated its economic decline. Mr. Faso says he'd eliminate these corporate-welfare grants and apply the savings for his across-the-board tax cuts.

If not for the 2003 Bush tax cuts that helped to revive American capital markets and thus New York City in particular, the state would be even worse off. Mr. Faso is proposing to take a page from that same tax strategy and use it to lure investment and people back to America's fourth-largest state. This is a debate worth having.

Clash Of Civilizations (WSJ)

By Carlos Alberto Montaner

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

The clash of civilizations began this way. On Sept. 8, the Miami Herald (TMH) and El Nuevo Herald (ENH), both of the McClatchy newspaper chain, published on Page One a sensationalist report, clumsily researched, under a headline that read, in type befitting a major event, "10 Miami Journalists Take U.S. Pay." The initiative for the report had come from TMH; ENH was obliged to publish it, grudgingly. From the way in which the story was presented, it appeared that a great font of corruption had been unearthed, but in reality nothing criminal had happened. All the article said was that journalists of Cuban origin also contributed to Radio and TV Martí, an official U.S. broadcast station similar to Radio Free Europe, governed by the ethical standards of Voice of America, and transmitting to Cuba. Naturally, the journalists accepted for their work the fees (generally low) that the government routinely pays.

Miami's Cuban community was indignant. What was bad about trying to undermine Cuba's censorship? For the Cuban journalists, that was a civic duty. TMH has editorialized in support of Radio and TV Martí. Wasn't it logical that the good Cuban journalists said to Cuba, via Radio Martí, the same things they said in Miami via the McClatchy chain? To add insult to injury, the company fired three reporters on ENH's staff, claiming there might be a conflict of interests if they collected honoraria from the government. Granma, the organ of the Communist Party of Cuba, reported that those who criticized the Cuban government were bought by money from Washington. TMH did more damage in one day to Cuban writers in the democratic opposition than Granma has done in 40 years.

A few days later, ENH reported that hundreds of U.S. journalists have appeared on VOA and received the usual modest $100 per program. To contribute to VOA, PBS or public radio, and to charge for it, doesn't compromise their objectivity. Why a different standard for Cuban writers? TMH did not reprint ENH's report; 1,200 readers cancelled their subscriptions and it became evident that the two newspapers were taking opposing stances. For the "Anglo" journalists, their Cuban colleagues had conflicts. In contrast, the journalists at ENH felt their corporate brothers had ambushed them. To Miami's Cuban-Americans, this was a display of double-standards.

This clash also allows us to reflect on "conflicts of interest." To think that just because a journalist participates in a VOA program and receives $100 he will sell his conscience to the government is to have a terrible opinion of journalists. To think that readers, if they find out, will repudiate the medium where these journalists work, is to have a terrible opinion of readers. Professors at public universities get paid by the government; yet they don't submit to their paymaster for that reason. Because the law enshrines the presumption of innocence, U.S. society is characterized by a presumption of decency. Life is a continuous conflict of interest and one must presume that people -- even Cuban journalists -- act in accordance with reasonable principles and standards.

So what can McClatchy do now? Something very simple: Apologize publicly for the defamatory report and readmit the expelled journalists.

Mr. Montaner, a syndicated writer, is published in the Miami Herald and El Nuevo Herald.

Early October New Deadline For Iran (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 20 -- With Iran still resisting a freeze on its nuclear activities, the United States and five partners have decided to set yet another deadline in hopes that Iran will finally agree to terms paving the way for substantive talks on its nuclear program.

Under the plan, reached by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her counterparts from five other nations over a late-night dinner Tuesday, Iran will have until early October to agree to suspend its nuclear activities as the negotiations take place, diplomats said. At the meeting, Rice backed off the U.S. demand that the U.N. Security Council begin imposing sanctions over Iran's failure to meet previous deadlines, but noted that there is intense interest in the issue on Capitol Hill.

"Everyone wants to solve this through negotiation, everybody wants to solve this diplomatically," Rice said Wednesday, declining to confirm the new deadline.

The new deadline is the fourth in four months. Originally, when the six countries -- the United States, France, Britain, Germany, China and Russia -- offered on June 1 to discuss an array of incentives with Iran if it froze its uranium enrichment program, they demanded an answer by the end of June. That slipped to July, and then the end of August was set as the deadline in a Security Council resolution.

U.S. officials said they believe the deadline of the first week of October is firm, but at least one European diplomat suggested that the possibility of slippage remains.

"There is certainly no doubt in our mind how much longer we will see through continuation of the Solana track," one U.S. official said, referring to the efforts of European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana, who is spearheading the talks with Iran. "We have a hard end-date in mind." The official spoke on the condition of anonymity because the ministers agreed not to announce the date.

Solana has held numerous talks with his Iranian counterpart, Ali Larijani, in an effort to find a formula that would allow the talks to begin. The United States granted a visa to Larijani so he could meet with Solana in New York this week, but Larijani did not show up.

Larijani and Solana agreed in a telephone call to hold talks next week somewhere in Europe, the official Iranian news agency reported in Tehran.

"We must have a response fairly quickly," French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy told reporters. "It's becoming urgent."

Iran has resisted appearing to bow to international pressure to halt its program. In a speech to the U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Iran's nuclear activities are "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eyes of IAEA inspectors," referring to the International Atomic Energy Agency. He denounced the effort to bring the issue to the Security Council, which he called "an instrument of threat and coercion."

Originally, Iran was told that no talks could start until it suspended the nuclear program. Officials are discussing the possibility of beginning the talks without the United States present, having Iran declare its willingness to suspend its program at the same time that action in the Security Council is halted, and then having the United States join the talks once the suspension is verified. Rice has said that she would attend the first meeting as the U.S. representative to the talks.

Meanwhile, President Bush met on Wednesday with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, and Rice met with her counterparts in the Quartet, a coordinating group on Middle East peace that includes the European Union, Russia and the United Nations. The main topic of discussion was the Palestinian government led by the Islamic Resistance Movement, also known as Hamas -- which receives financial backing from Iran -- and how to persuade the militant group to give up its pledge to destroy Israel.

U.S. officials say that a cutoff of international aid has left Hamas desperate for a solution, but Europeans officials have pressed for ways to relieve the suffering of the Palestinians. The Quartet in a statement said that the group has agreed to expand and continue what was originally billed as a temporary measure to bypass the government and to bring aid to critical groups of Palestinians.

Why Bush Is Taking A More Diplomatic Approach On Iran (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.

With prospects fading for tough economic sanctions against Iran anytime soon, the United States is shifting its stance even more solidly toward a diplomatic solution to Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

President Bush is sounding more conciliatory, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is approving more leeway for the Europeans to pursue talks with the Iranians - and everyone is insisting the aim is to allow Tehran the peaceful nuclear-power program it says is its only goal.

The US insists that the option of sanctions remains on the table, but the reasons for the softer approach appear to be twofold. First, Iranian officials are themselves sending mixed messages about their openness to suspending uranium enrichment in exchange for broad talks with the West. And second, international powers appear further than ever from joining to impose the sanctions they had agreed to this summer if Tehran did not suspend the nuclear activities that could lead to a bomb.

The question now niggling the US and others is whether Tehran is indeed debating the merits of backing off enrichment for the potentially more economically promising negotiations - or is just playing the international community for more time.

Iran's power circles are divided over what foreign policy to pursue, and that division is currently being played out in internal debate over the nuclear program, analysts say. What is less clear is when that debate might be settled enough to yield a clear answer to the countries - the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council plus Germany - offering negotiations to Iran.

"Iran doesn't have a united front, that's clear," says Jon Wolfsthal, a nonproliferation expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) in Washington. "The problem is that the default for them [in the absence of unity] is a more aggressive approach, as opposed to accepting a deal."

Just last week, Mr. Bush warned the international community against falling into a trap set by Iran, and again on Tuesday, he said Tehran is simply stalling. If that continues, he added, "We will then discuss the consequences of their stalling." But in his speech to the UN General Assembly, the president refrained from any urgent language, saying the US accepts Tehran's right to a peaceful nuclear-power program.

At the same time, Secretary of State Rice convened a meeting Tuesday night of key foreign ministers - a meeting that was originally envisioned as the setting for the next steps towards sanctions. Instead, she allowed that preliminary talks between the Europeans and Iran will proceed. Her deputy, Nicholas Burns, said those talks are already in "extra innings," but there was no hint of a precise deadline for reaching a conclusion.

That approach reflects a consistent approach on the part of the administration, Mr. Wolfsthal says, which is to let Iran convince the world it ultimately is not willing to shut down its nuclear-weapons ambitions. "I don't think anyone in the administration really expects Iran to compromise," he says. "So the whole diplomatic path has been to demonstrate to the rest of the world that Iran never was serious about a diplomatic solution."

But other analysts say the American seesaw from tough talk to more conciliatory language reflects a hard-line/ pragmatist policy divide within the administration that is not unlike the split coloring Tehran's approach.

"Iran is another chapter in the administration's internal struggle for control of foreign policy," says Joseph Cirincione, a weapons-proliferation policy expert at the Center for American Progress in Washington. "Depending on where you sit in this divide, what we're seeing in terms of Iran is either the collapse of the Bush strategy [to arrive at international sanctions], or it's all unfolding according to plan."

Mr. Cirincione says "hard-liners" in the administration - starting with Vice President Dick Cheney - "have always thought Rice's strategy of going for sanctions would fail," but they have gone along as a way to prove the international community won't act. The objective, he says, is to let diplomacy run its course, especially with military action against Iran's nuclear installations so unpalatable right now.

"From their perspective, it's fine to have the president talking softly at the UN," he says, "as long as plans for military action proceed at the White House and in the backrooms of the Pentagon."

That does not mean the US is doing nothing more than sitting back while, from its perspective, Tehran hangs itself. Over recent weeks, the US has begun pressing other countries to pursue the kinds of unilateral measures it is already taking against Tehran, including freezing the assets of companies.

One Swiss bank, Union Bank of Switzerland, has already cut off relations with Iran, but the US would like to see more - especially since European intelligence reports earlier this year reported Iran was diligently looking throughout Europe and former Soviet countries for materials and technological know-how.

In the midst of the American and Iranian mixed signals, President Jacques Chirac of France came up with a new proposal this week that he said could break the diplomatic logjam: The Iranians would agree to suspend uranium enrichment once talks begin - not as a condition for talks as the US insists - and agree to honor the suspension as long as talks go on.

That suggestion took the US by surprise. But Mr. Chirac quickly reassured Bush publicly after a breakfast in New York Tuesday that he continues to see "eye to eye" with the US president on the necessity of forestalling a nuclear-armed Iran.

Cirincione says that Chirac, who saw the reality of the sanctions effort going nowhere fast, is "probably planting this as a face-saving solution" that could appeal to all sides.

But he adds that while he believes a deal is still possible, the conditions may be too much for Washington to allow. The US and its international partners would have to "accept some amount of enrichment activity in Iran," he says, while the US would have to cease "all talk and promotion of regime change in Tehran."

What that would amount to, Cirincione says, is offering the Iranian regime "the same security assurances we gave the government of Libya to get that deal" of forswearing nuclear-weapons goals.

All these issues will keep diplomacy around Iran's nuclear program percolating for a while, with some analysts predicting little movement well into next year.

Another reason for the lack of urgency - fewer officials even in the Bush administration are speaking of a "crisis" - is that more nuclear experts are concluding that Iran's progress toward mastery of nuclear weapons technology has slowed.

Despite a recent House committee report faulting US intelligence for failing to keep abreast of Iran's progress, most experts say Iran has slowed its rate of advancement in the nuclear field - either by design or as a result of mounting procurement difficulties in terms of technology and materials.

"It's increasingly clear through inspections and intelligence reports that Iran is making glacially slow progress on its program," Wolfsthal of CSIS says.

"Yes, they have surprised us before," he adds. "But from what we're able to see, it's pretty clear they are not months away, but years away, from having a nuclear bomb. And that is deflating some of the pressure to act on this one way or the other right now."

Nations Discuss New Deadline For Iran (AP)

By Angela Charlton, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

The nations seeking to halt Iran's nuclear activities are working out a new deadline for Tehran despite differences over possible sanctions, the French foreign minister said Wednesday.

With world leaders gathered at the United Nations, the United States had hoped to move decisively this week toward political and economic sanctions against Iran after it missed an Aug. 31 U.N. Security Council deadline to halt disputed uranium enrichment that many believe is aimed at making a bomb.

But some U.S. allies are balking. France has instead proposed a compromise deal: a simultaneous suspension of all threats of sanctions and Iran's uranium enrichment.

French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy pushed ahead with this plan Wednesday. He suggested that the United States and others support it and said they were discussing a possible new timeline. He also discussed it with Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki and said the Iranian agreed that "time is an important factor."

Douste-Blazy gave no specific date. But a senior French diplomat said the nations involved in nuclear talks with Iran are mulling an early October deadline for Tehran to agree to a simultaneous suspension of uranium enrichment and talk of sanctions.

The United States and Britain remained cautious about the suspension plan. A U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment on the confidential discussions, confirmed that the group had discussed a new timeline — but said sanctions are still on the table.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Wednesday: "I'm not going to talk in terms of deadlines," but added, "This cannot go on for very much longer."

She also reiterated the U.S. position that Iran suspend enrichment before negotiations can begin.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett would not discuss a possible new date, either.

"What we are looking for is a clear and sustained and concrete signal that Iran wishes to negotiate," she told reporters. "Our patience, I think, is not unlimited."

A dinner meeting Tuesday with Rice, Beckett, Douste-Blazy and the foreign ministers of Russia, China, Germany and Italy produced little consensus about the next step, U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said. He said the diplomatic effort to counter Iran was in "extra innings."

The Americans have little choice but to give the Europeans a little more time, since Washington needs Europe on board for sanctions to be effective.

U.S.-Iranian tensions are in the spotlight this week, with both nations' presidents speaking Tuesday to the U.N. General Assembly — and pointedly avoiding each other in the halls of the world body.

In his speech, President Bush said, "Iran must abandon its nuclear weapons ambitions," but said the U.S. has "no objection to Iran's pursuit of a truly peaceful nuclear power program."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad insisted in his speech that Tehran's nuclear activities are "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog. He also reiterated his nation's commitment to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Progress hinges on talks between EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani. Larijani had been expected in New York this week, but Beckett said Wednesday that it appeared that he would not be coming.

She also said the ministers have authorized Solana to go anywhere at any time to meet Larijani.

Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi met Ahmadinejad later Wednesday, but no details of the talks were released.

France appeared determined to resist sanctions, despite mixed messages this week.

President Jacques Chirac shook up diplomatic circles with a proposal to drop talk of sanctions on Monday, then appeared to soften the stance after meeting Tuesday with Bush. Chirac also said Tuesday he was not interested in new deadlines for Iran.

Douste-Blazy, however, was eager to set a new timeline.

"We cannot let the Iranians ... gain time," he said. "We must have a response rather fast."

Iran hinted last week that it might be willing to suspend uranium enrichment. That was enough to sow new division among the nations seeking to stem Iran's nuclear program — and brake the push for sanctions.

New Iran Deadline As Bush Watches Clock (AFP)

AFP, September 21, 2006

World powers handed Iran a new early October deadline to halt uranium enrichment, a senior European diplomat said, as President George W. Bush warned "time is of the essence" in settling the nuclear showdown.

Hopes of a snap breakthrough in the crisis however were already dimmed, with an announcement that European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana would not meet, as expected, this week in New York with Iranian negotiators.

The five permanent members of the UN Security Council plus Germany and Italy agreed late Tuesday to give European negotiators more time to convince Iran to give up enrichment before seeking sanctions under a UN resolution

A senior European diplomat told reporters the new deadline would stretch to early October, in the hope that new talks between Solana and Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani would bear fruit.

The UN Security Council had set an August 31 deadline for Iran to comply with the demand for a suspension of enrichment operations. But Tehran, which denies US claims it is seeking a nuclear weapons, has so far refused to comply.

Bush meanwhile warned time was running out for Iran, and again wondered out loud whether the latest delay was a symptom of Tehran running out the clock.

"I'm not going to discuss with you our intelligence on the subject, but time is of the essence," Bush said, when asked on CNN whether he backed the Israeli line that only a few months remained before Iranian scientists learned how to enrich uranium -- the critical step towards building a bomb.

"I'm concerned that Iran is trying to stall, and to try to buy time, and therefore it seems like a smart policy is to push this issue along as hard as we can and we are," Bush said.

Bush's secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice meanwhile declined to confirm the new deadline but also warned diplomacy couldn't stretch on indefinitely.

"Everyone wants to resolve this through negotiations and everyone wants to solve this thing quickly," she said here.

DOJ_NMG_0066982

"There is a really excellent opportunity for Iran to engage with the international community, if it will simply meet a condition (freezing uranium enrichment)."

French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said Wednesday major powers -- Britain, China, France, Germany, Italy, Russia and the United States -- agreed that Iran must respond rapidly.

"We must have a response fairly quickly," he said, "it's becoming urgent."

At Tuesday's meeting, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice backed away from the long-standing US position that Iran should face sanctions immediately for failing to meet an August 31 UN deadline for suspending its uranium enrichment.

She agreed to permit a new round of negotiations between Solana and Larijani in hopes of convincing Tehran to meet the UN demand, US officials said.

If Iran suspends its enrichment, Rice said she would personally attend the launch of direct negotiations with Tehran aimed at rewarding the Islamic republic for winding down its nuclear program.

Chances of a quick breakthrough in the standoff were hit by the announcement that Larijani would not meet with Solana in New York this week as expected.

Instead, Larijani and Solana agreed in a telephone conversation to hold talks next week in an unidentified European capital, the official Iranian news agency reported in Tehran.

"It seems to have been difficult to get some of those (talks) scheduled and we would encourage the Iranians to take him up on his offer to meet with him and to clarify any remaining questions," said Rice.

"But this cannot go on for very much longer."

As well as the extended deadline for an Iranian response, Washington got its partners to agree to the new deadline for imposing sanctions if Iran stands firm, according to senior US and European officials present at the meeting.

Douste-Blazy said Tuesday's meeting had agreed on the need to give Iran one more chance.

"We all thought that we had to avoid confrontation and do everything possible to pursue a dialogue ... while also avoiding a situation where the Iranians, through meeting after meeting, are able to play for time and we end up with a fait accompli" of an Iranian nuclear weapons program, he said.

Concession Clears Way For Iran-EU Talks (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr

Financial Times, September 21, 2006

Iran's chief nuclear security official, Ali Larijani, is expected to resume talks with the European Union's Javier Solana next week following a concession by the US to give the process more time before pursuing a United Nations sanctions resolution.

The Iranian state news agency – reporting from Damascus where Mr Larijani met the Syrian president, Bashar al-Assad, on Wednesday – said Iran's chief negotiator would continue talks with Mr Solana, the EU's foreign policy supremo.

Although the meeting had been expected to take place at the UN in New York, reports from Tehran said they would meet in Europe. Iranian officials blamed the US for a delay in issuing visas for Mr Larijani and his delegation as the main reason for the nuclear team's failure to show up in New York.

"Only Mr Larijani and one deputy, Javad Vaeedi, hold visas now, while the rest are still waiting for their visas to be issued," an Iranian official told the Financial Times.

Diplomats are trying to work out a process whereby negotiations will begin and ran will suspend its uranium enrichment. The sequence is still unclear, but signs of progress and pressure from France, China and Russia have persuaded the US to put the sanctions drive on hold.

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad insisted on his country's right to develop nuclear energy in a forceful speech to the UN General Assembly in New York on Tuesday. He also reiterated Iran's adherence to its international safeguard commitments, while questioning the legitimacy of the Security Council and what he called the abuse of the UN by the veto-wielding powers, particularly the US and UK.

The position of Mr Ahmadi-Nejad in Iran's top leadership is stronger in domestic issues, while big international policies, including the nuclear decisions, are taken collectively by the top leadership. Sources have confirmed that Mr Ahmadi-Nejad, with a rather confrontational approach, is in the minority within the leadership.

Although his speech lacked any suggestion of dialogue and compromise with the west over the nuclear programme, it was less confrontational than some western observers had feared. Ahead of the speech European diplomats had warned that if it was too aggressive it could jeopardise the chances of striking a deal on opening formal negotiations.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad also used the speech to again display his millennialist approach to world affairs, starting and wrapping up his speech by praying for the return of the last Imam of Muslim Shia, Mahdi, who is supposed to save the world.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad adopted populist language on Middle Eastern issues, including Iraq, the Palestinian territories and Lebanon, but he did not repeat his earlier controversial comments about "wiping Israel off the map" and questioning the truth of the Holocaust, which brought him popularity in the Islamic world

Iran's Leader Relishes 2nd Chance To Make Waves (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

When President Bush and his advisers decided to allow President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran into the country to address the United Nations, their strategy was simple: containment.

There would be no visits to other cities where he could denounce Washington or question Israel's legitimacy. There would be no opportunities, beyond his speech to the General Assembly, to turn questions about his nuclear intentions into repeated diatribes about America's nuclear arsenal.

It turned out that Mr. Ahmadinejad had a Plan B.

The scope of his determination to dominate not only the airwaves but the debate became evident yesterday evening, when he entered a hotel conference room on the East Side with a jaunty smile, a wave and an air of supreme confidence.

Over the objections of the administration and Jewish groups that boycotted the event, Mr. Ahmadinejad, the man who has become the defiant face of Iran, squared off with the nation's foreign policy establishment, parrying questions for an hour and three-quarters with two dozen members of the Council on Foreign Relations, then ending the evening by asking whether they were simply shills for the Bush administration.

Never raising his voice and thanking each questioner with a tone that oozed polite hostility, he spent 40 minutes questioning the evidence that the Holocaust ever happened — "I think we should allow more impartial studies to be done on this," he said after hearing an account of an 81-year-old member, the insurance mogul Maurice R. Greenberg, who saw the Dachau concentration camp as Germany fell — and he refused to even consider Washington's proposal for Russia to provide Iran with nuclear reactor fuel, and take it back once it is used. (Without the capacity to enrich fuel on its own soil Iran would be unable to make fuel suitable for a nuclear weapon.)

He traced the history of 50 years of unfilled deals with the United States, Germany, France and others — skipping over the Iranian revolution and the hostage-taking that followed — and concluded, "How can we rely on these partners." His solution? The United States should shut down its own fuel production and "within five years, we will sell you our own fuel, with a 50 percent discount!" He settled back into his seat with a broad smile that some in the group described as a smirk.

The decision by the council's president, Richard N. Haass, to invite Mr. Ahmadinejad to the session touched off a rare outcry protest in an organization whose meetings are usually as staid as the portraits of long-forgotten diplomats on its walls.

Mr. Haass, who ran the policy planning branch of the State Department during Mr. Bush's first term, first had to fend off senior administration officials who had argued that he should not give Mr. Ahmadinejad the legitimacy of a hearing — especially with the likes of Brent Scowcroft, who served as national security adviser under President Bush's father, or Robert D. Blackwill, who directed Iraq policy at the White House under Condoleezza Rice.

"It's fair to say that Dr. Rice thought this was a bad idea," one senior State Department official said. "A really, really bad idea."

So did leaders of several Jewish groups, whom Mr. Haass invited — and who promptly asked if the council would have invited Hitler in the 1930's. "Some of us considered quitting to make it clear how offensive this is," said Abraham H. Foxman, the national director of the Anti-Defamation League, who was one of the Jewish leaders whose attendance Mr. Haass sought.

But after a flurry of phone calls, including with Elie Wiesel, the writer and Holocaust survivor, they decided against a mass resignation — particularly after the council made the session a "meeting" rather than a dinner. (There were light hors d'oeuvres on the side; Mr. Ahmadinejad never touched them.)

"It is more offensive to break bread with the guy," Mr. Foxman said. "I thought dinner was crossing the line."

But the council pointed out that it had served as host for many world leaders equally skilled at repressing dissidents, developing suspected weapons programs, shutting down a free press and denouncing Israel.

"We've had Castro," said Lisa Shields, the council's communications director, ticking off the gallery of leaders Washington considered rogues. "We've had Arafat, and Mugabe. We've had Gerry Adams."

The greeting yesterday evening was not exactly overwhelming. There were no introductory handshakes, no diplomatic niceties. All of the Americans who were invited to attend, including four journalists, were members of the council. Iran's effort to bring in television cameras was deflected, apparently because the council feared that the session would be used for political purposes in Iran, where Mr. Ahmadinejad is presumably eager to show that even if President Bush refused to meet him, he got his message across.

In fact he did — meeting academics in the morning and religious leaders at midday, and speeding from the council meeting for another television interview. He did most of this without leaving the Intercontinental Hotel on 48th Street in Manhattan.

The council would not say how many of the invitees had refused to attend. But members said they knew of more than a half-dozen, from the publisher Mort Zuckerman to the former Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright. It is unclear why some declined. A few claimed scheduling conflicts, rather than moral objections.

The handful who had a chance to quiz the Iranian president went out of their way, within the limits of diplomatic etiquette, to make clear to Mr. Ahmadinejad that they thought his characterizations of Israel and the Holocaust were repugnant and that his nuclear strategy was self-defeating. He gave no ground.

DOJ_NMG_0066984

When Martin S. Indyk, a former American ambassador to Israel, told Mr. Ahmadinejad that Iran “did everything possible to destroy’’ efforts to bring peace between Israel and the Palestinians, the president said, “If you believe Iran is the reason for the failure, you are making a second mistake.’’ Why, he asked, should the Palestinians be asked to “pay for an event they had nothing to do with’’ in World War II, saying that they had nothing to do with the systematic killing of Jews — if those killings, he added, had happened at all.

“In World War II about 60 million people were killed,’’ he said at one point, when pressed again on his refusal to accept that the Holocaust happened. “Two million were military. Why is such prominence given to a small portion of those 60 million?’’

A few minutes later, he asked a question himself: “In the Council on Foreign Relations, is there any voice of support for the Palestinians?’’

Mr. Ahmadinejad’s habit of answering every question about Iranian policy with a question about American policy was clearly wearing on some of the members, but at the end they acknowledged that he was about as skillful an interlocutor as they had ever encountered. “He is a master of counterpunch, deception, circumlocution,’’ Mr. Scowcroft said, shaking his head. Mr. Blackwill emerged from the conversation wondering how the United States would ever be able to negotiate with this Iranian government.

“If this man represents the prevailing government opinion in Tehran, we are heading for a massive confrontation with Iran,” he said.

In fact, on the main issue speeding the two countries toward confrontation, Iran’s nuclear program, the president was unwilling to discuss specifics. He insisted that he was fully cooperating with the International Atomic Energy Agency, even though it had pages of questions his government refused to answer.

Instead, he steered the whole conversation toward Iran’s rights under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, ignoring an effort by Ashton B. Carter, a Harvard professor, to get him to answer whether the nuclear effort was worth the cost to Iranian society.

“The U.S. doesn’t speak for the whole world,’’ Mr. Ahmadinejad responded, noting that at a meeting of nonaligned nations in Cuba over the weekend “118 countries defended the right of Iran to enrich.’’

And as he left, it was with a jab to his hosts. “At the beginning of the session, you said you were an independent group,’’ he said. “But almost everything that I was asked came from a government position.’’ Then he smiled, thanked everyone and left the room with a light step.

Israel Calls Iran Its Greatest Threat (AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

The Israeli foreign minister on Wednesday warned that Iranian leaders pose the biggest threat to the world's values because they "speak proudly" of their wish to destroy Israel and pursue weapons to achieve that objective.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni told the annual U.N. General Assembly session that the international community must stand up against Iran, which she claimed is pursuing the weapons to destroy Israel, a reference to its suspect nuclear program.

"There is no greater challenge to our values than that posed by the leaders of Iran," Livni said. "They deny and mock the Holocaust. They speak proudly and openly of their desire to wipe Israel off the map. And now, by their actions, they pursue the weapons to achieve this objective, to imperil the region and to threaten the world."

She said Iran's support of the Islamic militant group Hezbollah in south Lebanon showed the threat it poses to the region. The world must ensure that it enforces the U.N. Security Council resolution that ended more than a month of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah, Livni said.

"There is no place for such a regime in the family of nations," she said.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has said in the past he wants to wipe Israel off the map and dismissed the Holocaust as a myth. In his own speech to the General Assembly on Tuesday, Ahmadinejad said Israel was created by driving millions of people from territory that was rightfully theirs, something he called "a great tragedy with hardly a precedent in history."

He also harshly criticized Israel's policies, saying the country was a source of insecurity in the Middle East that was "waging war and spilling blood and impeding the progress of regional countries."

While Livni spoke, a lone Iranian diplomat sat in the back row of the section of six seats reserved for the Islamic republic in the General Assembly hall. After her speech ended, the diplomat moved up to the front row to listen to the following official, from Belgium.

Livni struck a more conciliatory tone toward the Palestinians, saying the two did not necessarily have to remain at odds and the only way to resolve their conflict was at the "bilateral negotiating table."

"We have no illusions about the difficulties before us — we must face them and not ignore them," she said.

Livni met with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas at the U.N. a day before the General Assembly session began, and both described the meeting as positive. In her speech, she reiterated their desire to reopen a serious dialogue, including with the creation of a permanent channel "to pursue ways to advance together."

On the sidelines of the summit on Wednesday, President Bush called Abbas a "man of courage" for trying to revive Mideast peace talks despite a continued political stalemate with Hamas militants. Abbas has been weakened since January when Hamas, which seeks the destruction of Israel, won the Palestinian elections.

Prospects for a return to active peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians have looked dim this year, partly because the political upheaval in both governments kept leaders' attention focused inward.

Israel has new leadership too as Ariel Sharon remains incapacitated after his sudden massive stroke on Jan. 4. The new prime minister, Ehud Olmert, is on the defensive at home because of widespread dissatisfaction with the conduct and outcome of Israel's summer war against Hezbollah.

Lessons From U.N. Week (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

One of the lessons of this past week is that the international system is broken. The world community might make declarations — on preventing Iranian and North Korean nukes, disarming Hezbollah, or preventing genocide in Darfur — but when it comes to actually uniting to take action, words and resolutions lead nowhere. Thanks to a combination of American errors, European escapism, and Russian and Chinese greed, the worst people in the world now drive events while the best people do nothing.

The second big lesson of the past week is that five years after 9/11 we are farther from reaching a consensus on the nature of the threat than ever before. Instead of clarity, there is a cacophony of theories that attempt to explain the extremists — emphasizing religion or ideology or feelings of historic humiliation or some combination of all three.

The core of the dispute is: Do the extremists play by the normal rules of geostrategy, or are their minds off in some mystical sphere that is utterly alien to our categories?

Do they respond to incentives and follow the dictates of what we call self-interest? Can they be deterred by normal threats to their security? Or, alternatively, are they playing an entirely different game? Are the men who occupy the black hole that is the Iranian power elite engaged in a religious enterprise based on an eschatological time frame and driven by supernatural longings we can't begin to fathom?

The definition of the threat determines the remedies we select to combat it, and yet what we have now is a clash of incongruous definitions and an enemy that is chaos theory in human form — an ever-shifting array of state and nonstate actors who cooperate, coagulate, divide, feud and feed on one another without end.

The third lesson is that a huge gap is emerging between the way ordinary Americans see the Arab world and the way members of the political, media and intellectual elites see it.

Elite debate is restrained by a series of enlightened attitudes that amount to a code of political correctness: be tolerant of cultural differences, seek to understand the responses of people who feel oppressed, don't judge groups, never criticize somebody else's religion.

As anybody who has traveled around the country or listened to talk radio of left, right and center knows, these genteel manners do not inhibit the masses. Millions of Americans think the pope asked exactly the right questions: Does the Muslim God accord with the categories of reason? Are Muslims trying to spread their religion with the sword?

These millions of Americans believe the pope has nothing to apologize for. They regard the vicious overreaction to his speech, like the vicious overreaction to the Danish cartoons, as another sign that some sort of intellectual disease is sweeping through the Arab world.

What these Americans see is fanatical violence, a rampant culture of victimology and grievance, a tendency by many Arabs to blame anyone other than themselves for the problems they create. These Americans don't believe they should lower their standards of tolerable behavior merely for the sake of multicultural politeness, and they are growing ever more disgusted with commentators and leaders who are totally divorced from the reality they see on TV every night.

The fourth lesson is that we are drifting toward a policy that does not match the threat we face. Extremism is not an isolated cult in the Muslim world. It is a diverse and vibrant movement, which inspires the smartest of the young and treats the psychological wounds of those who are trapped between tradition and modernity.

The Muslim millenarians possess a habit of mind that causes them to escalate conflicts. They seem confident they can prevail, owing to their willingness to die for their truth. They don't seem to feel marginalized, but look down on us as weak, and doubt our ability to strike back.

With America exhausted by Iraq, with the threat of Iranian sanctions dissolving before our eyes, Western policy is drifting toward the option that most resembles passivity. That is containment — accepting Iranian nukes and trying to deter their use with our arsenal.

In other words, a policy that was designed to confront a secular, bureaucratic foe — the Soviets — will now be used to confront a surging, jihadist one. The survival of Tel Aviv, and maybe New York and Washington, will depend on the Clausewitzian rationalism of the Iranian mullahs, or the angry younger brothers who will replace them.

Letter To America (WP)

By Akbar Ganji

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

My brief journey to your beautiful and amazing country began in New York City with a symbolic hunger strike in front of United Nations headquarters. Its purpose was to bring to the world's attention the plight of political prisoners in my country, Iran. We demand that all political prisoners in Iran be freed. I am certain that you appreciate our desire for freedom; it was, after all, the main principle upon which your country was founded.

My American journey commenced shortly after I was released from prison in Iran. I spent six years behind bars on the bogus charge of endangering national security. I came here bearing a message from a movement whose members are hard at work promoting the values of democracy, human rights, social justice and civil liberties. We want our country to play a positive role in promoting peace, security and cooperation in the region. To achieve our goals, we need the support of the entire world, particularly your vast and powerful country.

To end the tensions between our countries, we appeal to your natural sense of independence, liberty and fairness -- to your belief that the pursuit of happiness is not just the prerogative of some classes or nations. Happiness, peace and security can be achieved and sustained when we succeed in making these values universal. The sense of physical pain as well as injury to our sense of human dignity and self-esteem are common to us all. No less common is our shared sense of peace, security, joy and laughter.

The history of the United States as a nation begins with the establishment of a polity based upon a constitution. In modern Iran, that is still a relatively new idea. Although it dates to our Constitutional Revolution of 1906, we have in fact achieved only some of the goals of that revolution. We are, a century later, still struggling to create a polity based on a constitution and the rule of law.

Even the 1979 revolution could not turn this dream into reality. The political and ideological forces that came to dominate that revolution denied the people the right to exercise their free will. The official ideology of the ruling clerical regime considers all humans to be less than adult and says that without the supervision of the clergy, they will act like children, if not madmen. According to this clerical theory, the people are most virtuous when they are most docile.

This is similar to the concept of the ruler as shepherd and guardian, and the people as flock. The official ideology of the Islamic regime calls for fully implementing this idea in the political domain. The idea is not, of course, limited to the world of Islam. Religious fundamentalism, whether it appears in Islamic, Christian, Jewish or Buddhist hue, shares the desire to humiliate the people and deny them their rights.

In Iran, we hope to achieve our goal of a new polity and a new constitution not by violence but by following a peaceful and democratic path. And in this struggle we need moral support from all freedom-loving people around the world -- particularly the United States.

We want the world to know that our rulers do not represent the Iranian people and that their religion is not the religion of the entire nation. We ask that in shaping its policies toward the Iranian regime, the United States not overlook the interests of Iranian civil society. In particular, we hope that America listens to those in Iran who fear that policies intended to contain the current crisis might in fact lead to a greater crisis, and to war.

We are convinced that the outbreak of a new war in the Middle East, particularly against a large and populous country such as Iran, would destabilize the region and the world. And it would deprive us of the chance to found a peaceful and democratic political order. We are also against policies, such as economic sanctions, that bring extraordinary hardship to the lives of ordinary Iranians.

It is both possible and desirable to solve the problems between the United States and Iran through direct talks. Such diplomacy will best serve the interests of the American and Iranian people if it is conducted in a transparent fashion. This transparency would not only make it impossible for advocates of war to increase tensions but also would help isolate them. Iranian democrats are opposed to secret diplomacy.

If, in the 1980s, the United States had pursued a policy of never establishing ties with enemies of human rights, and if it had given priority to the interests of civil society, it could be reaping the benefits of a successful foreign policy today. And the danger of terrorism would have been less than it is now. In fighting nuclear proliferation, all countries must be treated equally. The Iranian people do not accept double standards in this matter.

We believe the government in Tehran is seeking a secret deal with the United States. It is willing to make any concession, provided that the United States promises to remain silent about the regime's repressive measures at home. We don't want war; nor do we favor such a deal. We hope that the regime will not be allowed to suppress its people, foment a crisis in the region or continue with its nuclear adventurism.

But the dangers of the Tehran regime are not limited to the nuclear question. The regime is dangerous mostly because it is willing to brutally trample on the democratic and human rights of the Iranian people. It is dangerous because it is willing to create gender apartheid in the name of religion and to suppress religious and ethnic minorities. Finally, it is dangerous because it considers all forms of dissent unforgivable sins. The real goal of the nuclear program is to make these policies permanent. In its negotiations with the Iranian regime, the West must not overlook this important fact.

Today I stand among a large number of Iranians who live in the United States. Most are now citizens of this country, educated and successful. They owe their success not just to their resourcefulness and hard work but also to the admirable ability of American society to accept strangers and immigrants on its shores, and to America's cultural tolerance. The large community of Iranians in America is imbued with affection for it. They, as well as the people of Iran, hope that political conflicts will be resolved and replaced by bonds of friendship and peaceful cooperation.

A Bush-Ahmadinejad Debate? Why Not? (USAT)

By Lionel Beehner

USA Today, September 21, 2006

The presidents of the United States and Iran squared off at the United Nations, yet nothing of substance materialized. They spoke hours apart Tuesday, sticking to their usual talking points. Alas, this might be as close as these men ever get to meeting in a public forum. And that's unfortunate.

Just last month, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad challenged President Bush to a televised debate. Though the White House scoffed at the request, perhaps it's not so crazy after all. Sure, it would make for intriguing TV, but more important, it would offer a public airing of both leaders' views on perhaps the most daunting issue of our time: nuclear proliferation.

Here's how it might work. Unlike the "Kitchen Debate" between Vice President Nixon and Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev in 1959, the participants would debate live via satellite with simultaneous, uncensored translation. The moderator would be a prominent yet impartial diplomat from a third-party state.

A debate is in both countries' interests. Iranians rarely get unfettered access to American politicians' views, while Ahmadinejad's anti-U.S. screeds usually hit the Iranian press unfiltered and unchallenged.

State Department spokesman Tom Casey has said it was "somewhat odd for the president of a country that represses all debate within its own society to be talking about free and open exchange of ideas." But if anything, this exchange could spur greater political discussion and freedom of speech in Iran, not less. In the process, Iranians just might learn why the world opposes their nuclear program.

The face-off also would make sense for Bush, whose approval ratings have been sagging for months and might receive a boost from such a debate. It could also burnish Bush's foreign policy credentials at home, while demonstrating to moderates in the Middle East the folksiness many Americans admire about the president. It might also salvage his faltering Middle East policy during an important election year.

Iran is one issue where the president's no-nonsense approach seems to resonate with voters (no one supports a nuclear Iran). Yet he is short on solutions. Bush has dismissed Ahmadinejad's longwinded letter in May to him, ignored the Iranian leader's quirky blog, and demurred on directly engaging Tehran until it first suspends its uranium-enrichment activities.

Of course, Bush's supporters will say he should not dignify a request to debate a Holocaust denier. But Ahmadinejad is not going away. And the nuclear issue will not likely be resolved through intermediaries in Europe or bureaucrats at the U.N. Like President Nixon's decision to deal with Communist China in 1972, Bush should directly engage his enemies, no matter how muddled their political philosophies or grotesque their views on history.

Some policymakers might say agreeing to a public debate would establish a bad precedent or open up a dangerous can of worms. World leaders groping for a soapbox to stand on — Venezuela's Hugo Chavez or North Korea's Kim Jong Il come to mind — might challenge their foes to debates, creating needless sideshows that would distract from serious disagreements on issues of foreign policy. It might also create havoc for diplomats should their leaders misspeak or misrepresent their positions in the heat of debate.

Even so, the benefits would far outweigh the risks. Regular televised debates would provide a forum for world leaders to openly exchange views, unencumbered by underlings and diplomatic niceties, while educating their respective publics in the process. Much like President Roosevelt's "fireside chats" in the 1930s, live debates would bring leaders and their citizenry closer together, as well as hold world leaders accountable for their actions and statements. In the process, leaders might become more humanized. Americans would see Ahmadinejad not as the unruly dictator hawks make him out to be, while Iranians might see Bush not as the Christian cowboy he is portrayed as in the Middle East.

A similar gulf in perception divided the Americans and "10-feet-tall" Soviets at the height of the Cold War. As Nixon shrewdly put it to Khrushchev in 1959, "We should hear you more on our televisions. You should hear us more on yours." Same goes for Bush and Ahmadinejad in 2006.

Ideals And Realities Clash In Bush 'Freedom Agenda' (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

At the United Nations lectern this week, President Bush hailed the spread of democracy. "From Beirut to Baghdad," he said, "people are making the choice for freedom." Yet even as he spoke, tanks were rolling through the streets of Bangkok as a military coup toppled the elected leader of Thailand, who at that moment was in New York for the U.N. session.

Bush made no mention of the dramatic events on Tuesday and left New York yesterday without ever seeing the deposed prime minister, much less offering any public support for a onetime strong ally of the United States. The president's spokesman later provided a strikingly mild response only after being asked by a reporter, pronouncing the White House "disappointed" by the coup.

The timing of Bush's address on democracy to the U.N. General Assembly and the overthrow of a democratically elected government underlined the complexities and contradictions in his "freedom agenda." With the president's attention focused on the Middle East, the state of democracy elsewhere in the world does not rate as high on his priority list. In the case of Thailand, the situation is complicated by growing U.S. unease with the ousted prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra.

"The president's freedom agenda is inherently selective," said Thomas Carothers, head of the democracy project at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "We care very much about democracy in Afghanistan and Iraq, but . . . Thailand's just not part of the story, so this falls off the map a bit."

Thailand is hardly the only example. Bush strongly supports Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the Pakistani president who took power in a military coup, and plans to meet with him at the White House twice in the next week. Bush will also host Kazakhstan's president, Nursultan Nazarbayev, at the end of next week despite the suppression of opposition parties, newspapers and human rights groups in the oil-rich Central Asian republic.

The administration has likewise embraced autocratic leaders in such disparate places as Azerbaijan and Ethiopia while generally tempering criticism of anti-democratic policies in Russia and China. Even in the Middle East, Bush has treaded lightly in nudging allies such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia to reform.

On the other hand, the White House ratcheted up its pressure this month on the repressive government in Burma. After meeting with a dissident, Bush personally lobbied to get the U.N. Security Council to put Burma on the agenda last week for possible sanctions. And first lady Laura Bush hosted a roundtable at the United Nations on democracy in that country.

When the president talks about promoting democracy, as he did in New York on Tuesday, he focuses mainly on Iraq and Afghanistan. Some other countries that he once highlighted as success stories have been dropped from his speeches, most notably Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan.

In Ukraine, the popular coalition that led the "Orange Revolution" of December 2004 has splintered and the new prime minister is the same one the street protests targeted. In Kyrgyzstan, the brother of the president who took office after the revolution of March 2005 has been accused of trying to frame an opposition leader by planting a heroin-filled wooden doll in his luggage.

The coup in Thailand poses the latest challenge to Bush's commitment to "ending tyranny in our world," as he vowed in his second inaugural address. Aides said yesterday that he did not mention the coup in his U.N. speech because they were still gathering information, but they did not explain why he said nothing later in the day as it became clear that the military had ousted Thaksin.

"We're disappointed in the coup," White House press secretary Tony Snow said yesterday aboard Air Force One on the return flight to Washington. "We hope those who mounted it will make good, and make good swiftly, on their promises to restore democracy."

Thaksin had been a U.S. favorite for years, but relations soured recently when he was accused of abusing power for profit and undermining the parliament, the opposition and the media. Although Thaksin won reelection handily last year, the opposition took to the streets this year to protest the sale of the prime minister's family holdings in a telecommunications and satellite company for $1.9 billion -- tax-free. Thaksin announced he would step down, but he stayed in office with elections scheduled for this fall.

The distaste for Thaksin may have colored the tepid U.S. response. "Nobody wants to go to bat for Thaksin. He's just an odious figure," said Michael A. McFaul, director of Stanford University's Center on Democracy, Development and the Rule of Law. "But there's the problem -- democracy's not about picking winners and losers, it's about defending institutions."

Lorne W. Craner, former assistant secretary of state under Bush and now president of the International Republican Institute, agreed that U.S. concerns with Thaksin did not justify a coup. "You can't sanction a coup just because you don't like the guy if you're going to stand up for democracy," he said. "It's unconstitutional."

Analysis: Bush Policy Tempered (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, September 21, 2006

President Bush sees the world as a struggle between good and evil, but his push for democracy often collides with geopolitical reality.

Free elections handed power to Palestinian militants and led to a fractious government in Iraq. And he associates with leaders from Kazakhstan, Azerbaijan and authoritarian Mideast states that don't necessarily practice what he preaches.

In his speech to the U.N. General Assembly, Bush depicted the U.S. as leading the charge to defeat the forces of darkness and to spread freedom and democracy, particularly in the Middle East. "It is the calling of our generation," he said.

The refrain was echoed by Vice President Dick Cheney. "We know that the hopes of the civilized world ride with us," Cheney told an audience in Washington.

But the formulation doesn't always serve U.S. interests.

Bush commonly brushes aside the democracy debate to stand with hardline leaders who happen to be terror-war allies or economic partners.

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf — a general who seized power in a coup — will be at the White House on Friday and again next week. The president of Kazakhstan, Nursultan Nazarbayev, will be there Sept. 29. The president of Azerbaijan, Ilham Aliev, visited in April.

DOJ_NMG_0066989

Human rights groups have criticized all three leaders. No matter. The two former Soviet republics are oil-rich allies in the war on terrorism and Musharraf is the leading U.S. partner in the Muslim world.

"The United States turns a blind eye to human rights abuses when it seems politically expedient," said Sam Zarifi of Human Rights Watch.

"The failure to uphold standards of democracy and push for some of the issues that President Bush has identified as being top in his mind erodes the U.S.'s ability to criticize other countries like Iran," said Zarifi, the group's Asia research director.

On Pakistan, human rights activists have said Bush should press Musharraf to restore civilian rule, end discrimination against women and stop using torture and arbitrary detention in counterrorism operations.

Bush remains on chummy terms with Russian President Vladimir Putin, despite Putin's moves to centralize authority and to restrict press and political freedoms. And in pushing for wider trade with China, Bush ignored complaints of democracy activists and evangelicals about Beijing's religious persecutions.

Meanwhile, democracy has not always turned out the way Bush had hoped.

A military coup suspended democratic government in Thailand this week. The militant Hamas group, sworn to Israel's destruction, swept Palestinian parliamentary elections in January. Iraq's elections produced a wobbly government that took months to form and fundamentalist Shiite leaders wield far-reaching influence amid rising sectarian violence.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai warned Thursday that efforts to build democracy in his country had suffered setbacks and that terrorism was rebounding, especially in the volatile south.

Emile A. Nakhleh, a recently retired top CIA expert on Islamic politics and institutions, said the U.S. "lost a generation of goodwill" in the Muslim world.

"The president's democratization and reform program for the Middle East has all but disappeared, except for official rhetoric," Nakhleh said in an interview posted on Harper's Magazine Web site Wednesday.

In Bush's good vs. evil world, there are certain leaders he refuses to meet, among them Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Syrian President Bashar Assad and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

In a General Assembly speech, Chavez on Wednesday called Bush "the devil.... He came here talking as if he were the owner of the world."

The day before, Ahmadinejad criticized U.S. policies in Iraq and Lebanon and accused Washington of abusing its veto power in the Security Council after Bush sought to assure Muslims he is not waging war with Islam.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the administration stands by its hope that "all the people in the region will be able to achieve a democracy in which they're able to speak freely and pursue their destinies freely."

Bush refused throughout his first term to meet with longtime Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, who died in 2004. Bush did meet in New York on Wednesday with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, a moderate with limited authority since the Hamas victory.

Bush still is pushing for a democratic Palestinian state alongside Israel. But, Deputy National Security Adviser Elliott Abrams told reporters: "He's well aware of the fact that conditions may, in the end, not exist to make it possible."

Bush, Cheney, and other administration officials often exaggerate the nature of the battle against Islamic terrorists, suggested Dan Benjamin, a Middle East analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"I don't think it's a struggle for civilization," Benjamin said. "I don't see any states being seized by jihadists anytime soon."

Bush At The U.N.: Another Political Masterstroke? (TIME)

By James Carney

Time, September 21, 2006

President Bush has been so busy lately giving speeches and taking questions about terrorism and Iraq and the ideological battle against Islamo-fascism that he's practically owned the airwaves. Which is exactly the way Karl Rove planned it. Bush's address at the United Nations General Assembly today may have been a long-scheduled, annual diplomatic event. But it was also a key piece in an elaborate Labor Day political strategy devised by the man whose job it is to keep Republicans in control of Congress in November and thereby salvage the President's legacy. In the past two and half weeks Bush has given a major address on detainee policy, a series of speeches surrounding the five-year anniversary of the 9/11 attacks and an extensive press conference — all of them covered as Presidential rather than political events by the cable channels and, for the most part, the broadcast networks. ABC even broke into its daytime programming to carry Bush's United Nations speech this morning. The result has been saturation coverage of the President talking tough on terror, just as Rove planned.

Democrats and some observers have argued that the old strategy — that making the election about national security, a traditional GOP strength — wouldn't work this time because voters have gotten wise to it and are generally fed up. But this morning's Gallup Poll numbers in USA Today suggest otherwise; Democrats may have reason to panic. Bush's approval at 44% isn't great, but it's a 12-month high. Still better news for the GOP is the so-called " generic " — in which likely voters say whether they plan to vote Republican or Democratic in congressional races this fall. The result — a 48-48% tie — is potentially catastrophic for the Democrats. Recent polling history suggests the Dems need at least a 5-point advantage in the generic just to break even in the mid-terms. This is just one poll, and it's just a snapshot. The Democrats' advantage may reappear. But for now, it's clear that Rove's strategy is working.

As politics, the President's United Nations speech was genius. It almost didn't matter what he said as long as he talked tough. He lectured the bad guys — Syria, Iran, Hamas, etc. — and promised to stay the course in Iraq. He invoked 9/11. He said he hoped for a diplomatic solution to the nuclear crisis with Iran but offered no new means to achieve it. He was Presidential. Expect another bump up in the polls.

Chavez Calls Bush 'Devil' At U.N. (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

NEW YORK -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez yesterday used his annual address to the United Nations to call President Bush "the devil himself" and "world dictator," topping the rhetorical blast of his Iranian counterpart the previous day.

Echoing Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's criticism of the current U.N. structure, Mr. Chavez said American dominance and a Security Council with veto-holding permanent members had made the world organization "worthless."

"The hegemonic pretensions of the American empire are placing at risk the very existence of the human species," Mr. Chavez said.

"The devil himself is right in the house. The devil came here yesterday, ... talking as if he owned the world," Mr. Chavez said. Then he crossed himself and added: "It still smells of sulfur today."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice declined "to dignify" the Venezuelan leader's comment, saying only, "I think it's not becoming for a head of state."

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, called the remarks a "comic-strip approach to international affairs."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said the Venezuelan people should "determine whether President Chavez represented them in a way they would have liked to have seen."

The "devil" comment elicited some giggles among the audience of presidents, prime ministers and diplomats from around the world, and Mr. Chavez's speech won light applause, although no one publicly sided with him. Still, it was not clear how much support his argument gathered among delegates.

Several diplomats said they were not surprised by Mr. Chavez's style and did not take him seriously. Others noted that the issue of U.N. reform deserved attention, but there are more appropriate ways to express one's opinion about Security Council members.

"I don't think anybody in this room could defend the system," Mr. Chavez said. "Let's be honest. The U.N. system born after the Second World War collapsed. It's worthless."

Mr. Ahmadinejad said in his speech to the General Assembly on Tuesday that some of the governments objecting to his country's nuclear program, which he insisted was for peaceful purposes, "have abused nuclear technology for nonpeaceful ends including the production of nuclear bombs."

"The question needs to be asked: If the governments of the United States or the United Kingdom, who are permanent members of the Security Council, commit aggression, occupation and violation of international law, which of the organs of the U.N. can take them to account?" the Iranian president said Tuesday night.

"As long as the council is unable to act on behalf of the entire international community in a transparent, just and democratic manner, it will neither be legitimate nor effective," he added.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett yesterday rejected the notion that the United States and Britain "are causing problems for the rest of the international community."

Also yesterday, the five veto-wielding Security Council members gave Iran a new deadline of early October to suspend uranium enrichment and begin negotiations on a package of incentives in order to avoid a nuclear showdown, European diplomats said.

Meanwhile, the Iranian president told Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi he is ready for nuclear talks with major powers but flexibility is needed on all sides.

"Ahmadinejad indicated that Iran is willing to negotiate but there needs to be flexibility on both sides," Mr. Prodi said in a written statement issued after his meeting with the Iranian leader during the U.N. general debate.

Mr. Chavez and Mr. Ahmadinejad have become good friends in the past year, and the Iranian leader made a much-publicized visit to Venezuela before flying to New York.

U.S. officials said that Mr. Chavez's speech yesterday had given the United Nations a glimpse of what it might expect if Venezuela succeeded in its bid for one of Latin America's two rotating seats on the Security Council, which is currently held by Argentina and will become available in January.

The Bush administration supports Guatemala's candidacy, and officials said their efforts to keep Mr. Chavez away from another U.N. forum would increase in the coming weeks and months.

The Security Council consists of 15 members. Ten are elected for two-year terms and do not have the veto power, which is reserved for each of the five permanent members -- the United States, Britain, China, France and Russia.

Chavez Launches Bush Broadside At U.N. (AP-Y)

By Ian James

AP, September 21, 2006

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez called President Bush "the devil" in a speech to the United Nations on Wednesday, making the sign of the cross in a dramatic gesture and accusing him of "talking as if he owned the world."

The fiery speech by the leftist leader, one of the Bush's staunchest critics abroad, was harsher in tone than that of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who sparred with Bush the previous day over Tehran's disputed nuclear program but avoided any personal insults.

"Yesterday, the devil came here," Chavez said, referring to Bush's address before the U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday. "Right here. Right here. And it smells of sulfur still today, this table that I am now standing in front of."

He then made the sign of the cross, brought his hands together as if praying and looked up at the ceiling.

Lest anyone wasn't listening, Chavez continued:

"Yesterday, ladies and gentlemen, from this rostrum, the president of the United States, the gentleman to whom I refer as the devil, came here, talking as if he owned the world. Truly. As the owner of the world," Chavez said.

Chavez's words drew tentative giggles at times from the audience, but also applause at the end of the speech and when he called Bush the devil — a word he used no fewer than eight times.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Chavez's remarks were "not becoming for a head of state."

"I am not going to dignify a comment by the Venezuelan president to the president of the United States," Rice told reporters in New York. The main U.S. seat in the assembly hall was empty as Chavez spoke, though the U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told The Associated Press that a "junior note-taker" was present, as is customary "when governments like that speak."

The address appeared to be one of Chavez' boldest moves yet to lead an alliance of countries firmly opposed to the Bush administration. The speech came after the leftist leader crisscrossed the globe this summer visiting like-minded nations from Iran to Belarus.

The Venezuelan has become Latin America's leading voice against the U.S. government, and his speech was reminiscent of crusading addresses by his mentor Fidel Castro of Cuba and the late Argentine revolutionary Ernesto "Che" Guevara.

In his 23-minute address, Chavez also called Bush a "spokesman of imperialism" who was trying "to preserve the current pattern of domination, exploitation and pillage of the peoples of the world."

"An Alfred Hitchcock movie could use it as a scenario. I would even propose a title: `The Devil's Recipe,'" Chavez said.

He accused the U.S. of planning and financing a failed 2002 coup against him, a charge the U.S. denies. And he said the U.S. tries to impose its vision of democracy militarily in countries like Iran and Iraq.

"We appeal to the people of the United States and the world to halt this threat, which is like a sword hanging over our head," he said. "The imperialists see extremists everywhere. It's not that we are extremists. It's that the world is waking up."

At the start of his talk, Chavez held up a book by American writer Noam Chomsky, "Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance," and recommended it to everyone in the General Assembly, as well as to the American people.

"The people of the United States should read this ... instead of the watching Superman movies," Chavez later told reporters.

He called U.S. consumerism "madness," saying Americans have wasteful habits in using oil and energy. He held up a satellite photo showing the world at night, with bright light emanating from the U.S. and other wealthy countries.

Consuming less should be an environmental priority, he said, "instead of looking for oil" through the war in Iraq.

The United States continues to be the top buyer of Venezuelan oil, bringing the South American country billions of dollars in earnings that help fund Chavez's popular social programs.

Accusing Bush of neglecting the poor, Chavez started a program last winter for Venezuela's U.S.-based oil company Citgo to sell discounted heating oil to poor American families. It distributed more than 40 million gallons of oil last winter to low-income Americans, and Chavez announced a doubling of that this winter.

Chavez also lambasted the U.S. government for trying to block Venezuela's campaign for a seat in the U.N. Security Council. He said if chosen over U.S.-favorite Guatemala in a secret-ballot U.N. vote next month, Venezuela would be "the voice of the Third World."

The council currently consists of five permanent members with veto power — the United States, Britain, Russia, China and France — and 10 non-permanent members who serve two-year terms and have no power to veto resolutions.

The U.S. argues that Venezuela — closely allied with Iran, Syria and Cuba — would be a disruptive force. The campaign for a U.N. seat is shaping up to be a formidable diplomatic test for Chavez, gauging his ability to lobby head-to-head against the United States.

Chavez said the U.N. in its current system "doesn't work" and is "antidemocratic." He called for the world body to be overhauled, saying the U.S. government's "immoral veto" had allowed recent Israeli bombings of Lebanon to continue unabated for more than a month.

DOJ_NMG_0066992

The Mideast was in the spotlight, with ministers from the Quartet that drafted the stalled so-called "road map" peace plan — the U.S., the U.N., the European Union and Russia — planning to meet. The Security Council also was scheduled to hold a ministerial meeting Thursday that Arab leaders hope will help revive the peace process.

On Wednesday, Bush met with Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas and described him as "a man of peace" who can help move forward the stalled peace process.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai also addressed the General Assembly, warning that terrorism is rebounding in his country. He said efforts to build democracy there had suffered setbacks over the past year as violence increased, especially in the volatile south where NATO forces have been battling Taliban militants in some of the fiercest battles since the hard-line government was toppled in 2001.

"We have seen terrorism rebounding as terrorists have infiltrated our borders to step up their murderous campaign against our people," he told the General Assembly.

He also expressed concern about "the increased incidents of Islamophobia in the West," saying it does not "bode well for the cause of building understanding and cooperation across civilizations."

Chávez Refers To Bush As 'the Devil' At The U.N. (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, September 21, 2006

NEW YORK — Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez called President Bush "the devil" Wednesday in a rare personal attack on the floor of the U.N. General Assembly. The fiery speech challenged Bush's assertive foreign policy in an effort to galvanize anti-American sentiment.

"Yesterday, the devil came here … and it smells of sulfur still today," said Chávez, whose international reputation has grown largely on the strength of his opposition to U.S. policy. Chávez said Bush was "talking as if he owned the world."

His remarks came one day after Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad gave a speech at the United Nations in which he defended his country's nuclear program. The United States has demanded that Iran stop its uranium-enrichment program.

The United States dismissed Chávez's remarks. U.N. Ambassador John Bolton called Chávez's speech a "comic strip approach to international affairs."

"Too bad President Chávez doesn't extend the same freedom of speech and the press to the people of Venezuela," he said.

In his remarks Tuesday, Bush urged member nations to back efforts to forge democracy in the Middle East, including new governments in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"From Beirut to Baghdad, people are making the choice for freedom," said Bush, who ended his three days of diplomacy in New York after meeting Wednesday with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Israel got its opportunity to rebut critics at the U.N. podium Wednesday when Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni warned that Iranian leaders pose the biggest threat to international values. "There is no greater challenge to our values than that posed by the leaders of Iran," Livni said.

"They deny and mock the Holocaust," she said. "They speak proudly and openly of their desire to wipe Israel off the map. And now, by their actions, they pursue the weapons to achieve this objective, to imperil the region and to threaten the world."

Chávez scoffed at Bush's foreign policy goals. "They say they want to impose a democratic model," he said. "It's the false democracy of elites, and, I would say, a very original democracy that's imposed by weapons and bombs and firing weapons.

"What type of democracy do you impose with Marines and bombs?"

The vitriolic attack was rare, historians say. "It's pushing the envelope," said Stephen Schlesinger, author of Act of Creation: The Founding of the United Nations. "He's obviously trying to bait Bush."

Stanley Meisler, author of United Nations: The First Fifty Years, said he could not recall another example of such a personal attack.

The closest, he said, came when Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev banged his shoe on his desk at the General Assembly in 1960 to protest an anti-Soviet speech by a Filipino diplomat. Khrushchev, from the floor of the hall, called the diplomat, Lorenzo Sumulong, "a jerk, a stooge and a lackey of imperialism."

"There have been instances when countries have gone after other countries," said Linda Jamison, a senior fellow with the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "But personal attacks are unusual. It is, to some degree, unprecedented. And it's also shocking."

Chávez has become a leading Bush antagonist. He has established close ties with Cuban leader Fidel Castro and Ahmadinejad and given aid from oil revenue to regimes hostile to the United States.

Venezuela is the fourth-largest supplier — after Canada, Mexico and Saudi Arabia — of crude oil, gasoline and other petroleum imports to the USA, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

During his speech, delegates nodded their heads and smiled at some of Chávez's remarks. At times there were tentative giggles from the audience.

Chávez held up a book by American leftist writer Noam Chomsky titled Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance and recommended it to everyone in the General Assembly.

He likened Bush's policy to a scary movie.

"An Alfred Hitchcock movie could use it as a scenario," Chávez said. "I would even propose a title: The Devil's Recipe."

Chávez Rails Against 'devil' Bush At UN (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, September 21, 2006

Hugo Chávez, the Venezuelan president, assured his place in UN history on Wednesday by calling George W. Bush, the US president, "the devil" and saying he could still smell the "sulphur" hanging around the General Assembly chamber.

His diatribe against US "imperialism," and calls for a re-foundation of the United Nations, may be nothing new, but the grandeur of his stage and the applause he won hammered home the mounting sense of developing world anger at an organisation many countries believe to be irretrievably under the sway of rich western powers.

Mr Chávez's invective came one day after Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, the Iranian president, slammed the inequities of the Security Council, and Evo Morales, the indigenous Bolivian leader, brandished a coca leaf before the hall and called for an end to injustice.

While the 15-member Council has returned to centre stage in trying to resolve many of the world's most intractable crises, the General Assembly – of 192 countries – has found itself deadlocked over efforts to reform the way the UN is managed and how its resources are spent.

It cannot agree on a definition of terrorism, and has proved incapable of agreeing a strategy on nuclear non-proliferation.

All countries claim the UN needs reform, but the developing world is deeply sceptical of US efforts to overhaul its systems in the wake of the oil-for-food scandal, and believe the secretariat incapable of resisting the demands of its industrialised paymasters.

Even more moderate leaders such as Thabo Mbeki, the South African president, warned that unless the UN gave a greater voice to the poor it risked losing legitimacy. "For the UN to continue occupying its moral high ground, it has to reform urgently, and lead by practical example as to what it means to be democratic."

Mr Chávez was less forgiving. "Let's be honest," he said. "The UN system born after the second world war collapsed. It's worthless."

He suggested: "We could call a psychiatrist to analyse Wednesday's statement by the president of the United States," referring to Mr Bush's upbeat assessment of the situation in the Middle East.

"The hegemonistic pretensions of the American empire are placing at risk the very existence of the human species," he said. "We appeal to the people of the United States and of the world to halt this threat which is like a sword hanging over our heads."

Chavez Slams Bush, U.N. Before General Assembly (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez called President Bush "the devil" and pronounced the U.N. "worthless" in a fiery speech to the General Assembly on Wednesday, giving a preview of clashes to come if Venezuela wins a seat on the Security Council next year.

Standing at the lectern where Bush had delivered his speech the day before, Chavez said, "yesterday, the devil came here. Right here." He crossed himself. "Right here. And it smells of sulfur still today." Many diplomats in the vaulted chamber laughed and clapped.

Chavez criticized the United States for using the U.N. as a tool to dominate other countries, saying that "the government of the United States doesn't want peace. It wants to exploit its system of exploitation, of pillage, of hegemony through war."

The world body needs to be completely renewed if it is to be able to counter Washington's control, he said, declaring that "the U.N. system born after the Second World War collapsed. It's worthless."

To applause from the packed room, he objected that developing nations, "have no power to make any impact on the terrible situation in the world. And that is why Venezuela once again proposes, here, today, 20 September, that we re-establish the United Nations."

Many diplomats came just to hear what has become the most provocative bit of showmanship in an series of foreign policy speeches that are often soporific. The crowd in the hall did not include any senior U.S. diplomats, however. They boycotted the speech, leaving a young note taker to occupy one of the otherwise empty group of U.S. seats.

A White House spokesman said that Chavez's performance did not merit comment. U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said the speech was "insulting" and called it a "comic-strip approach to international affairs."

But Washington will have to take Venezuela seriously if it wins a vote this fall for the seat on the Security Council that by tradition goes to a Latin American nation. Of the 15 council seats, five are up for rotation every year, and Venezuela is competing with Guatemala to represent its region.

The campaign has divided Latin American. Guatemala has won the backing of the United States, along with Mexico, Nicaragua, Honduras, El Salvador, Costa Rica and Colombia.

Venezuela has won support from other nations that oppose U.S. policy and has used its oil money to bolster its likely vote total. Cuba, Bolivia, Brazil, Argentina, Paraguay, Uruguay and 15 Caribbean nations now back the Venezuelan bid.

DOJ_NMG_0066994

Chile and other countries caught between the U.S. and Venezuela are searching for a compromise candidate. But so far, potential candidates, including the Dominican Republic, have been unwilling to risk Chavez's wrath by entering the race.

If the Latin American nations fail to reach a consensus, the entire General Assembly will hold a secret ballot next month to break the deadlock. The winner in that case would need to garner two-thirds of the General Assembly's 192 votes.

Chavez said the U.S. has launched "an immoral attack" to prevent his country from joining the Security Council. He accused the CIA of trying to kill him and described how his personal doctor and security chief had to stay in his locked airplane when it landed this week because U.S. immigration authorities would not allow them to enter the country.

Whether Chavez's speech helped or harmed his nation's bid was the subject of considerable discussion Wednesday.

More than half the U.N.'s member states are developing countries, many of whose leaders may find appeal in Chavez's message. And even among wealthier nations, his defiant speech struck a chord among those nursing resentment over Washington's treatment of the world body. Some simply found his speech entertaining.

Guatemala's ambassador to the U.N., Jorge Skinner-Klee, said that despite the laughter and applause, Chavez's speech helped Guatemala more than Venezuela.

"You can not attack what you want to be part of," he said. "We need to address the world in a rational manner, not a confrontational way."

Chavez has promised that if his country wins a seat, he will come often to the U.N. to use the bully pulpit of the Security Council to press for change and to stand up to the United States.

"It will be fun to have Venezuela in the Security Council," said Cesar Mayoral, the ambassador from Argentina, which strongly supports Venezuela. "But it will mean the end of consensus."

That prospect may make some nations uncomfortable, said one expert from an independent think tank on Latin America.

"I think he's playing a risky game," said Michael Shifter, vice president for policy at the Inter-American Dialogue.

"It's true that the U.S. is not very popular, but this kind of vitriolic discourse doesn't win a lot of support," he said. "The applause and warm reaction were understandable in that moment. But when countries have to confront the really polarizing, poisonous politics going on, they may think twice about their support for him."

In Venezuela, Chavez's speech produced divided reactions. In Caracas, the capital city, the official government television network installed a giant screen in Plaza Bolivar downtown to broadcast the address.

Luis Mercedo, an office worker, described the speech as "a dignified position that confronts imperialism." By contrast, Cristina Maldonado, 35, a bank employee, said that calling Bush the "devil" was a "shame because it doesn't represent the majority view of Venezuelans."

Political leaders of all persuasions jumped into the fray, supporting or criticizing the speech. Oswaldo Alvarez Paz, an ex-legislator and director of COPEI, an opposition party, said the speech was a calculated effort "to make an impact before the world" as part of Chavez's Security Council campaign.

Chavez's principal opponent in the Dec. 3 presidential elections, Manuel Rosales, slammed Chavez for "constantly generating a violent discourse, of aggression and permanent bellicosity."

Special correspondent Mery Mogollon in Caracas contributed to this report.

Iran Who? Venezuela Takes The Lead In A Battle Of Anti-U.S. Sound Bites (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 20 — In the end, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran lost the much-hyped war of words waged against President Bush at the General Assembly. A stealth opponent swooped in and took the prize.

Speaking on Wednesday from the same lectern Mr. Bush had occupied the day before, President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela announced, to gasps and even giggles: “The devil came here yesterday, right here.

“It smells of sulfur still today, this table that I am now standing in front of,” he said.

Just hours before, Mr. Ahmadinejad took issue with the great Satan, too. But what a difference. Where Mr. Chávez was Khrushchevian, waving around books and stopping just short of shoe-banging, Mr. Ahmadinejad was flowery, almost Socratic in his description of behavior that only the devil would condone.

“By causing war and conflict, some are fast expanding their domination, accumulating greater wealth, while others endure poverty,” Mr. Ahmadinejad lectured. “Some seek to rule the world relying on weapons and threats while others live in poverty. Some occupy the homelands of others, interfering in their affairs and controlling their oil and resources, while others are bombarded daily in their own homes, their children murdered in the streets.”

Mr. Ahmadinejad, who has been known for inflammatory language in his sound bites at home, suggesting that Israel should be wiped off the map and denying the Holocaust, was much less direct in his United Nations speech, asking question after question.

DOJ_NMG_0066995

An example: “The question needs to be asked: if the governments of the United States or the United Kingdom, who are permanent members of the Security Council, commit aggression, occupation and violation of international law, which of the organs of the U.N. can take them to account? Can a Council in which they are privileged members address their violations? Has this ever happened?”

Mr. Ahmadinejad’s speech received all the buildup beforehand, particularly since he was scheduled on Tuesday, the same day as Mr. Bush. At the end of his speech, Mr. Ahmadinejad, as Mr. Bush did before him, received polite, diplomatic-style applause from the assembled officials, junior note-takers and various United Nations bureaucrats.

And for Mr. Chávez?

The gasps. The horrified giggles. The loud applause that lasted so long that the organization’s officials had to tell the cheering group to cut it out.

President Bush’s defenders noted that at least the United States had let Mr. Chávez and Mr. Ahmadinejad come here and say whatever they pleased without being thrown in jail. John R. Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations, who said that someone at the “junior note-taker” level was chronicling Mr. Chávez’s speech for the United States, offered: “You know, it’s a phenomenon of the United States that not only can he say those things in the General Assembly, he could walk over to Central Park and exercise freedom of speech in Central Park, too, and say pretty much whatever he wanted. Too bad President Chávez doesn’t extend the same freedom of speech to the people of Venezuela.”

For her part, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Mr. Chávez’s comments were “not becoming of a head of state.”

But compared with Mr. Ahmadinejad, Mr. Chávez was just more colorful. He brandished a copy of Noam Chomsky’s “Hegemony or Survival: America’s Quest for Global Dominance” and recommended it to members of the General Assembly to read. Later, he told a news conference that one of his greatest regrets was not getting to meet Mr. Chomsky before he died. (Mr. Chomsky, 77, is still alive.)

At that same news conference, just after his speech, he made eyes at a pretty Colombian journalist who asked him why he went around calling President Bush names. “Are you Colombian?” Mr. Chávez asked, performing a quick merengue move with his upper body and flashing her a grin.

He suggested that Americans read Mr. Chomsky’s book instead of spending all their time “watching Superman and Batman” movies.

Minutes later, at the same news conference, Mr. Chávez offered to double the amount of heating oil Venezuela donates to poor communities in the United States. He reminded reporters that Citgo, which is owned by Petróleos de Venezuela S.A., delivered free and discounted oil to Indian tribal reservations and low-income neighborhoods in the United States, including the Bronx.

“We are ready to double our oil donations,” Mr. Chávez said. “That is a Christian gesture.”

Mr. Ahmadinejad did not offer any Iranian oil to poor United States neighborhoods.

Venezuelan Leader Demonizes Bush (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 20 -- President Hugo Chavez, the combative Venezuelan leader, denounced President Bush in a U.N. speech Wednesday as a racist, imperialist "devil" who has devoted six years in office to military aggression and the oppression of the world's poorest people.

Speaking from the lectern where Bush spoke a day earlier, Chavez said he could still smell the sulfur -- a reference to the scent of Satan. Even by U.N. standards, where the United States is frequently criticized as the world's superpower, Chavez's remarks were exceptionally inflammatory. They were also received with a warm round of applause.

Chavez's address followed a series of strident speeches by U.S. adversaries, including Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir. Together, they represent an emboldened alliance of oil-rich states that defy U.S. demands to change their policies on a range of issues, including the development of nuclear technology and the role of U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur.

"Yesterday, ladies and gentlemen, from this rostrum, the president of the United States, the gentleman to whom I refer as the devil, came here, talking as if he owned the world," Chavez told the chamber of international diplomats. "I think we could call a psychiatrist to analyze yesterday's statement made by the president of the United States. As the spokesman of imperialism, he came to share his nostrums, to try to preserve the current pattern of domination, exploitation and pillage of the peoples of the world."

Bush administration officials dismissed Chavez's remarks as the ravings of a reckless political leader. "I'm not going to dignify a comment by the Venezuelan president towards the United States," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said. "I think it's not becoming for a head of state."

In an effort to bolster his case, Chavez waved a copy of Noam Chomsky's book "Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Domination" and recommended that everyone read it. The book, written by the American linguist and longtime critic of U.S. foreign policy, argues that the United States' pursuit of political supremacy is having devastating consequences for the majority of the world's people.

"The president of the United States came to talk to the peoples -- to the peoples of the world," Chavez said. "What would those peoples of the world tell him if they were given the floor? . . . I think I have some inkling of what the peoples of the south, the oppressed people, think. They would say, 'Yankee imperialist, go home.' "

DOJ_NMG_0066996

"The world is waking up," he added. "I have the feeling, dear world dictator, that you are going to live the rest of your days as a nightmare because the rest of us are standing up, all those who are rising up against American imperialism."

Chavez's U.N. appearance is part of a Venezuelan campaign to gain election to the Latin American seat on the U.N. Security Council, a post that would place it in a position to challenge U.S. policies. The United States, which vigorously opposes Venezuela's candidacy, is supporting a competing bid for the post by Guatemala, a poor Central American republic with little political influence at the United Nations.

In portraying the United States as an imperial power, Chavez sought to evoke memories of the Cold War, when Third World revolutionaries such as Cuban President Fidel Castro (an ally and mentor of Chavez) and Zimbabwean leader Robert Mugabe delivered scathing attacks against the United States.

U.N. experts said that though Chavez's speech may resonate with delegations who oppose a new world order built around American power, it was so undiplomatic that it may undermine his chances of getting into the Security Council. It "confirms the worst stereotypes about the U.N. General Assembly being a circus sideshow filled with venom and rabid anti-Americanism," said Edward Luck, an expert on the United Nations at Columbia University. "I never thought anyone could make Ahmadinejad look like a moderate, but Chavez has done it."

Although Chavez is renowned for his caustic views on the Bush administration, some senior U.N. diplomats were startled by his statement. Asked if Chavez had gone too far, China's Foreign Minister Li Zhao Xing said: "He really said that? Are you sure? He would go that far?"

Britain's Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett suggested that the Chavez comments went beyond the pale of diplomatic protocol at the United Nations. "Even the Democrats wouldn't say that," she said.

Some of the world's poorest countries, such as Bolivia, sought to prove they could stand up to the United States. Bolivian President Evo Morales, a close ally of Chavez, chastised the Bush administration for adding his nation to a list of major drug-producing countries because it permits the cultivation of coca, which is consumed by many Bolivians as tea but is also used to make cocaine.

Holding a coca leaf in his hand, Morales told the General Assembly he would never yield to U.S. pressure to criminalize coca production. "With all respect to the government of the United States, we are not going to change anything. We do not need blackmail or threats," Morales said.

Anti-Americanism Is A Big Hit At U.N. (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS -- A day after President Bush's speech at the same lectern here drew tepid applause, Venezuela's leader earned laughter and ovations from the world leaders on hand by calling Mr. Bush "the devil" and comparing the U.S. to a "sword hanging over our heads."

While President Hugo Chávez's anti-American jabs were hardly new, they marked a theatrical high point for an annual U.N. gathering where full-bore anti-Americanism is not only back in fashion, but also much appreciated by many in attendance.

The leaders of Iran, Venezuela and Bolivia have all delivered full-throated harangues this week against Mr. Bush and U.S. foreign policy. Less expected were persistent pokes delivered by more-centrist leaders from places such as Brazil or Mexico.

Speeches by leaders of 57 nations over the past two days -- and many more to come -- reveal a world body awash in grievances over trade, the Iraq war, perceived U.S. unilateralism, Washington's drug policy in Latin America and the "great powers" structure of the U.N. itself. All illustrate, some observers say, a rising chorus of discontent with the world order envisioned by the U.S.

"In their inflammatory and provocative way, Chávez and the others are expressing a sentiment that is deeply resentful of the way the U.S. uses its power," said Julia Sweig, a scholar at the Council on Foreign Relations and author of "Friendly Fire," a recent book on the rise of anti-Americanism.

"People who say these guys are just outliers are wrong," said Mark Weisbrot, a Latin America specialist at the Center for Economic and Policy Research, a left-leaning think tank in Washington. "They are saying things that many other leaders only think."

The U.N. has seen much U.S. bashing over the years. Cuba's Fidel Castro gave a famous stemwinder on U.S. imperialism in September 1960, just before Nikita Khrushchev famously pounded his shoe on his desk in a fit of pique at the General Assembly.

But this week's U.N. confab has put on full display a new generation of leaders in the Castro mold who revel in lobbing rhetorical missiles at Washington and lambasting U.S. policies abroad. And in the case of the Iranian and Venezuelan presidents, their fiery populism comes backed by soaring oil wealth, a lever Castro never had.

Bolivia's populist President Evo Morales, a former coca grower elected in December, drew a rousing response Tuesday when he pulled a coca leaf from his pocket during his speech to the General Assembly, then blasted the U.S. for its "neocolonialist" efforts to eradicate coca production.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad then took to the podium for a far more scathing and almost scholarly critique of the use of U.S. power, accusing the Bush administration of employing its nuclear and military might to intimidate other countries and to control the U.N. Security Council.

"Some seek to rule the world relying on weapons and threats, while others live in perpetual insecurity and danger," he said. In a theme echoed by many speakers, Mr. Ahmadinejad said that the U.S. and other powers, such as Britain, had turned the U.N. Security Council into "an instrument of threat and coercion" that now has to be reorganized.

Yet no one found a more receptive audience than Mr. Chávez, who got laughs right off when he raised high -- and highly recommended -- a copy of leftist professor Noam Chomsky's 2003 tome, "Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance."

According to Mr. Chávez, the book told everything one needs to know about the world. Then he lashed into Mr. Bush. "The devil came here yesterday. Right here," he said, pointing at the lectern before him. "It smells of sulfur still."

In his speech the day before, Mr. Bush had sought to speak directly to the citizens of undemocratic countries such as Iran and Syria, and to express U.S. support for a future free of extremism.

Mr. Chávez lashed into what he described as Mr. Bush's obsession with extremists, suggesting it was racist. "He looks at your color, brother, and he sees an extremist," he said to an audience made up largely of diplomats from Africa, the Middle East and Asia.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters that Mr. Chávez's remarks were "not becoming for a head of state." The U.S. ambassador to the U.N., John Bolton, called Mr. Chávez's antics "insulting" and said it was "too bad President Chávez doesn't extend the same freedom of speech to the people of Venezuela."

Mr. Chávez is campaigning heavily to win for Venezuela next year a rotating seat on the U.N. Security Council, and U.N. watchers say Mr. Chávez may well garner the 128 country votes needed to prevail.

Bush Praises Abbas As 'Man Of Courage' (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, September 21, 2006

President Bush on Wednesday called embattled Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas a "man of courage" for trying to revive Mideast peace talks despite a continued political stalemate with Hamas militants.

On the sidelines of a U.N. General Assembly meeting, Bush tried to breathe new life into negotiations to resolve the long-running conflict between the Israelis and Palestinians. Supporting the moderate Abbas was Bush's final undertaking before returning to Washington.

"In order to achieve this vision, there must be leaders willing to speak out and act on behalf of people who yearn for peace, and you are such a leader, Mr. President," Bush said after his 40-minute meeting with Abbas at a New York hotel. "I can't thank you enough for the courage you have shown."

Israel wants to reopen a serious dialogue with Abbas and work with him to establish a Palestinian state. But Abbas has been in a weakened position since January when Hamas, which seeks the destruction of Israel, won the Palestinian elections.

Abbas retains his position as president but he is caught between Hamas and the West, which considers Hamas a terrorist group and refuses to underwrite it with vital international aid. Abbas has tried to persuade Hamas leaders to moderate their anti-Israel policies and join with his Fatah Party in a coalition government, but the United States and Israel are leery of the plan.

"We look forward to your support and your help and your aid because we are in dire need for your help and support," Abbas said to an audience that included Bush and TV viewers. "Mr. President, we will always be faithful and truthful to peace and we will not disappoint you."

While Bush said Tuesday in a speech to the U.N. General Assembly that he views achieving Mideast peace as one of his presidency's "great objectives," he realizes it's an uphill battle.

"He's well aware of the fact that conditions may, in the end, not exist to make it possible," deputy national security adviser Elliott Abrams told reporters. "But he wants it understood that his interest, his commitment, his view that the establishment of a peaceful, democratic Palestinian state is very, very much in the interest of Palestinians and Israelis alike — none of that has changed."

Prospects for a return to active peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians have looked dim this year, partly because the political upheaval in both governments kept leaders' attention focused inward.

Israel has new leadership too following Ariel Sharon's sudden massive stroke. The new prime minister, Ehud Olmert, is on the defensive at home because of widespread dissatisfaction with the conduct and outcome of Israel's summer war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon.

Still, the Bush administration is focusing fresh attention on the Israel-Palestinian question as a foundation for initiatives in other areas of the Mideast.

Arab nations, including the few moderate states that are key to U.S. goals in Iraq, Iran and Lebanon, view improving the Palestinians' lot as essential. The festering grievances of the stateless Palestinians feed unrest and radicalism elsewhere.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is likely to travel to friendly Mideast nations next month, her first visit since a U.N.-brokered cease-fire ended the monthlong cross-border war in Lebanon. She met with moderate Arab nations Wednesday on the sidelines of the U.N. meeting.

Hamas has given no sign that it will meet international demands that would resolve the stalemate with Abbas and allow aid to flow: Renounce violence, recognize Israel and abide by agreements made by the previous secular Palestinian leadership.

Rice suggested to reporters that Hamas risks losing political traction among its own supporters as a result.

"It has been difficult for the Hamas-led government to actually deliver on its promises of a better life," Rice said.

Diplomats from the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations met Wednesday to take stock of the Mideast peace process. The group is the would-be shepherd for a U.S.-backed peace plan that would eventually establish an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel.

In a statement, the group welcomed the prospect of a meeting between Abbas and Olmert and welcomed Abbas' efforts to form a unified national government.

The group said it hopes any Palestinian national unity government would reflect the group's principles. European diplomats said that language could allow wiggle room for Hamas to moderate its position without taking the dramatic step of fully recognizing Israel, but U.S. officials disputed that.

US Gives Boost To Abbas' Unity Drive (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Mark Turner

Financial Times, September 21, 2006

Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president, on Wednesday received a significant diplomatic boost to his efforts to form a unity government after the Bush administration made its second concession in as many days to the European powers over a Middle East crisis.

The "Quartet" of the European Union, Russia, the United Nations and the US agreed to ease sanctions imposed on the Palestinians, called on Israel to release revenues due to the Palestinians and, most significantly, softened the language regarding international demands of the new government, once it is formed.

"The Americans have shown understanding and openness," Benita Ferrero-Waldner, the EU external relations commissioner, told the FT after the Quartet meeting in New York.

A day earlier, President George W. Bush had relented at the UN over Iran, putting his sanctions efforts on hold to give the Europeans more time to find a way to resume negotiations with Tehran over its nuclear programme.

Some European diplomats and UN officials saw the Bush administration adopting a more realistic foreign policy in the Middle East. At the same time the European powers appear more assertive, seeking to undo what they see as the damage caused by the US through its invasion of Iraq, the fallout from the Lebanon conflict and the continued Israeli-Palestinian impasse.

"There is a message to the Israelis that they should transfer to the Palestinians their due money," Ms Ferrero-Waldner said, referring to €500m ($760m) held by Israel in customs revenues and taxes. The Quartet also agreed to expand and extend the Temporary International Mechanism that passes aid and funding to the Palestinians while bypassing the Hamas government which the US and EU refuse to recognise.

A senior US official denied the US was going soft over the militant group Hamas which swept Palestinian parliamentary elections in January.

"There is not an erosion or softening of our position, but a strengthening of the common position," he told reporters. The Quartet was still demanding that a new Palestinian government that would include Hamas must adopt certain conditions, including recognition of Israel, he said.

"There is no nuance here," he said, referring to the Quartet statement which expressed the hope that a government of national unity would "reflect" the conditions previously set out by the Quartet, including recognition of Israel.

Mr Bush, meeting Mr Abbas in New York, described him as a "man of peace".

"We are in dire need of your help and support," Mr Abbas said.

Separately, the Palestinian president has floated a four-stage plan within the UN that would restart the peace process with Israel, starting with prisoner releases on both sides. Officials said he had not raised the plan with Mr Bush.

Margaret Beckett, the British foreign secretary, said there were growing questions over negotiations between Mr Abbas and Hamas, cautioning that "it was not quite clear whether the basis for discussions (on a unity government) still remains".

The new Abbas plan also envisaged an international conference, attended by the Quartet and Arab countries. Jacques Chirac, the French president, endorsed the conference idea during his speech to the UN General Assembly on Tuesday.

U.S. Supports Abbas In Bid To Assemble Unity Cabinet (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 20 — The Bush administration expressed support on Wednesday for the efforts by the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, to establish a national unity government with Hamas, but said the United States would continue to withhold aid from the Palestinian Authority.

DOJ_NMG_0066999

Washington's European allies have been pushing President Bush to engage more fully in peace efforts in the Middle East. An announcement on Wednesday by the four powers of the so-called quartet that have been working to promote peace negotiations — the European Union, the United States, Russia and the United Nations — that they supported Mr. Abbas's efforts came as part of talks on the periphery of the General Assembly.

"The quartet welcomes the efforts of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to form a government of national unity, in the hope that the platform of such a government would reflect quartet principles and allow for early engagement," Secretary General Kofi Annan and foreign ministers of the quartet said in a statement.

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, said Wednesday that he believed the Palestinians were close to establishing a unity government. But he said he and his Hamas movement were not prepared to accept the demands made by Israel and Western countries.

His statements underscored the uphill battle facing Mr. Abbas as he seeks to restore international aid. "Conditions are being imposed on the Palestinian people," Mr. Haniya said as a rally in Gaza, according to Agence France-Presse.

Western countries have cut off money to the Palestinian Authority, and Israel has not turned over the $50 million a month in taxes and customs receipts that it collects on the Palestinians' behalf. The cutoffs came when Hamas won elections in January and then took over leadership of the Palestinian government.

The West and Israel want the Palestinian Authority to agree to three conditions: to recognize the right of Israel to exist, to forswear violence and to accept all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

"They want us to condemn the resistance and recognize agreements," Mr. Haniya said. But Hamas is committed to a platform that "does not recognize the legality of the occupation and reaffirms the legality of the resistance," he added.

The proposed unity government is intended to bring about a restoration of Western aid. But with increasing friction, the internal Palestinian talks were put on hold while Mr. Abbas is abroad, and some in his party are questioning the rationale for such a government if Hamas is not willing to meet the demands that could restore assistance.

President Bush met with Mr. Abbas in New York on Tuesday. Elliott Abrams, the deputy national security adviser, said Mr. Abbas had told White House officials that Hamas would strike a deal only under terms that allowed for some public ambiguity over its stand on Israel, even if it agreed to recognize previous agreements and Israel's right to exist.

But Mr. Abrams said the United States had argued that the Hamas leadership was being quite explicit in its anti-Israel stand and its support of terrorist tactics.

Abbas Appeals To Bush, Cites 'Dire Need' For Help (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 21, 2006

NEW YORK -- Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas pleaded with President Bush yesterday that his government is "in dire need" of U.S. aid and support as the two leaders sought to jump-start the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

Hours later, the Bush administration joined the European Union, the United Nations and Russia in calling on Israel to release $500 million in tax revenues it has collected on behalf of the Palestinian Authority but has refused to free up -- a move one U.N. official privately said was a concession by the White House.

"We look forward to your support and your help and your aid, because we are in dire need for your help and support," Mr. Abbas said after a 40-minute meeting with Mr. Bush. "Mr. President, we will always be faithful and truthful to peace, and we will not disappoint you."

"I can't thank you enough for the courage you have shown," Mr. Bush told Mr. Abbas.

Mr. Abbas, a member of the Fatah party, is trying to form a coalition government with Hamas, the terrorist group that won a majority in legislative elections earlier this year but has refused to renounce violence or recognize Israel's right to exist -- conditions the international community has set for major members to resume aid to the Palestinian Authority.

In the afternoon, foreign ministers of the Quartet -- composed of the United Nations, Russia, the United States and the European Union -- met for more than an hour to assess progress on the somewhat tattered "road map" to Middle East peace.

The statement they released afterward showed an incremental easing of pressure on the Palestinian Authority. The Quartet called on Israel to release the $500 million and endorsed a three-month continuation and an expansion of a separate EU-affiliated program.

The EU program collects and disburses through nongovernmental organizations money earmarked for humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people and funds to help the PA pay its civil servants.

"The Quartet noted that the resumption of transfers of tax and customs revenues collected by Israel on behalf of the Palestinian Authority would have a significant impact on the Palestinian economy," the group said.

The Quartet meeting, hosted by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, was attended by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, Finnish Foreign Minister Erkki Tuomioja on behalf of the European Union, as well as EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana and EU external relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner.

"This is a strong statement," said a U.N. official involved with Middle East affairs, adding that "the Americans have conceded a bit," particularly in urging Israel to release the tax revenues.

Mr. Bush was wrapping up 48 hours in New York that included his address to the U.N. General Assembly and meetings with seven world leaders. In addition to trying to rally opposition to Iran's nuclear program, Mr. Bush spent much of his time trying to persuade Mr. Abbas and other Middle Eastern leaders he considers moderates to face radical Muslim movements in their countries.

That includes Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who is trying to keep order amid sectarian violence. The administration yesterday strenuously rejected reports that it is losing confidence in Mr. al-Maliki.

"That's absolutely false," said White House spokesman Tony Snow. "The man has been in power for barely more than 100 days and, frankly, there has been significant progress."

Mr. Bush, in an interview with CNN's Wolf Blitzer yesterday, said that both Army Gen. George Casey, the highest-ranking U.S. military official in Iraq, and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad have confidence in Mr. al-Maliki.

In Reversal, Germany Will Join Lebanon Force (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

BERLIN, Sept. 20 — German warships will set sail for the Mediterranean on Thursday, after Parliament voted Wednesday to send up to 2,400 troops to patrol the waters off Lebanon. Haunted by the Holocaust, Germany had resisted sending soldiers to the Middle East for fear of potential clashes with Israeli troops.

The deployment, the country's first in the Middle East since World War II, was approved by a three-to-one ratio. It thrusts Germany into an uncertain phase of its steady development into a nation that projects military force outside its borders.

Chancellor Angela Merkel, whose government pushed for the deployment despite the deep misgivings of many Germans, described the mission as having a "historical dimension."

"There is perhaps no other area of the world," Mrs. Merkel said in Parliament, "where Germany's unique responsibility, the unique responsibility of every German government for the lessons of our past, is so clear."

German soldiers now patrol dusty towns in northern Afghanistan, jungles in central Africa and wooded hills in Bosnia and Kosovo.

To avoid conflicts with Israeli soldiers, this deployment will include no ground troops — only two frigates with helicopters, two supply ships and four fast-patrol boats. Even with a full complement of 2,400 troops, it would rank third in size for Germany's foreign deployments, after Afghanistan and the Balkans.

Still, Mrs. Merkel said it was Germany's duty to support the foreign peacekeeping force being assembled in southern Lebanon, to enforce a truce between Israel and the Hezbollah militia.

The German ships, which will try to prevent the smuggling of weapons to Hezbollah, are part of a maritime force that includes ships from Denmark, Norway, Sweden and the Netherlands. The German sailors will be authorized to stop ships suspected of carrying weapons — by force if necessary — board them, and turn them over to Lebanese authorities.

On Tuesday, the foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, said, "We in the international community are obliged to draw on our strength to help Lebanon as long as it is not itself in a position to do so."

Whether Germany should play any military role in the Middle East conflict has been a source of debate here for weeks. Parliament approved the mission a day after the chief of the Israeli military said Israel hoped to pull its last forces out of Lebanon by sundown on Friday.

The vote in the lower house of Parliament — 442 to 152, with 5 abstentions — was not a surprise, given the commanding majority of Mrs. Merkel's "grand coalition."

But opposition leaders voiced strident criticism, warning of the risks of sending troops to a volatile region where Germany has built up good will with its diplomacy rather than its military might.

"We should be under no illusions just because this is a navy mission and not a ground mission," said Guido Westerwelle, the leader of the opposition Free Democratic Party. Oskar Lafontaine, a leader of the Left Party, said Germany was risking terrorist attacks.

Germans have been on edge since August when the police discovered suitcases with unexploded bombs on two trains in western Germany. Two Lebanese men who had been living in Germany were arrested, and intelligence officials said the timing of the bungled plot might have been linked to the war.

Some critics said Mrs. Merkel's avowed support of Israel — combined with the decision to commit troops — would jeopardize Germany's traditional role as a go-between in the Middle East.

"In the past, Germany could be a mediator between Israel and the Palestinians," said Günter Meyer, director of the Center for Research on the Arab World at the University of Mainz. "But by clearly siding in this mission with the Israelis, we are alienating the rest of the Arab world."

The German public opposes the deployment, polls indicate, though people differ on how vociferously. Some of the opposition, experts say, is a reflexive tendency in postwar Germany toward pacifism. Some, they say, also reflects anger at how Israel conducted the war in its early days.

DOJ_NMG_0067001

Critics fault Mrs. Merkel for not initiating a national debate about Germany's proliferating military engagements. The lack of discussion outside the capital could come back to haunt her, they say, should this deployment or, more likely, the Afghanistan mission, become messy.

"A lot of people are having doubts about these missions," said Rainer Arnold, a spokesman on military issues for the Social Democratic Party, which is in a coalition with Mrs. Merkel's Christian Democrats. "I'm very concerned about the risks to German soldiers in Afghanistan."

On Thursday, Parliament is expected to extend the army's mission in Afghanistan by a year, though.

Mr. Arnold said the German military would soon reach the limits in resources for foreign deployments, not because it lacks troops — 8,000 out of 250,000 military personnel are serving in foreign missions — but because it lacks the specialists these missions require.

"If you compare that with the United States, it's a smaller percentage," said Sascha Lange, an analyst at the German Institute for International and Security Affairs. "But we are in a transformation to make it possible to deploy troops outside of Germany, and this is only the beginning."

Israel: Pullout Unlikely Before Weekend (AP)

By Ravi Nessman, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

Israel's army chief said Wednesday his nation's troops were unlikely to withdraw from Lebanon by the weekend, as he initially predicted, because final details remained to be worked out with the U.N. peacekeepers taking their place.

The delay came even as the international peacekeeping mission grew to 5,000 troops, the number Israel said was needed before it could pull out of southern Lebanon. The force, known as UNIFIL, will eventually number 15,000.

Israel's troop presence in southern Lebanon had been as large as 30,000 during the fighting against Hezbollah guerrillas. But the army has slowly withdrawn the soldiers since a cease-fire took effect on Aug. 14, and international peacekeepers and the Lebanese army began deploying in the area. There are currently about 9,000 Lebanese soldiers there.

The Israeli army will not say how many of its troops remain in Lebanon, but the number is believed to be several thousand concentrated in three pockets along the border. The full withdrawal of Israeli troops will remove a remaining point of friction and help bolster the cease-fire.

Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz told Israeli lawmakers Tuesday that he hoped to bring the last soldier home before the start of the Jewish New Year, which begins Friday evening.

But Wednesday, he said that timetable did not appear realistic because of ongoing talks with the U.N. peacekeepers.

"We very much hoped it would happen by Friday, but in the dialogue we have been holding with the United Nations and the Lebanese army, there are a few issues to be wrapped up," he said.

"I hope it will take place in the next few days, but it looks likely to be after the holiday," he said. The New Year holiday ends Sunday evening.

The fighting between Israel and Hezbollah began July 12 when the Lebanese guerrilla group crossed the border and attacked an army patrol, capturing two Israeli soldiers. The fighting ended after 34 days with more than 850 Lebanese and 150 Israelis killed.

UNIFIL commander Maj. Gen. Alain Pelligrini said in a statement that a meeting took place Tuesday between senior Israeli and Lebanese officers and top U.N. peacekeepers.

"The meeting was positive, we are making progress," he said, adding the Israeli army withdrawal and the Lebanese army deployments were on track.

Commitments to the international force continued to grow Wednesday, with German lawmakers approving the deployment of warships to Lebanon's coast to stop arms shipments to Hezbollah.

Germany will send eight warships — its largest naval deployment since World War II — and lead the multinational naval force patrolling Lebanon's coast.

Wary of its Nazi past and the Holocaust, Germany ruled out sending ground troops to southern Lebanon to ensure that German soldiers do not get caught up in any confrontation with Israeli forces.

Rebuffing concern about the deployment, Chancellor Angela Merkel said Germany's history obligated it to help stabilize the region because Israel — as well as Lebanon — had given its approval for the naval mission.

That was "a signal of trust in Germany, in the country in whose name the destruction of the Jews and World War II began," Merkel said. "We should take such a signal seriously."

The German ships, which are to leave Thursday, are being accompanied by three from Denmark and are expected to take 10 to 14 days to reach the area. Greek, Italian and French warships are patrolling the Lebanese coast until they arrive.

Norway, Sweden and the Netherlands are also expected to send ships.

Also Wednesday, Malaysian officials said their country would contribute 360 members of the U.N. mission in Lebanon, after the United Nations approved the deployment.

DOJ_NMG_0067002

Malaysia had previously offered to send as many as 1,000 troops, and Deputy Prime Minister Najib Razak said it remains ready to dispatch more peacekeepers if asked to.

The deployment comes despite Israel's initial objections to the involvement of countries without diplomatic relations with the Jewish state — including Malaysia and Indonesia. Israel later dropped objections to Indonesia's participation, although it was unclear if Malaysia was acceptable to Israel.

Meanwhile, a group of reserve soldiers, angry at Israel's conduct of the war, heckled Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert during a speech to members of his Kadima Party.

"Olmert, resign!" one said. "Take responsibility?" yelled another.

Security guards escorted some of the protesters out of the hall, and Olmert brushed off their criticisms, saying most Israelis agreed with his positions.

Reserve soldiers, many of whom said they were not properly equipped or trained for the battle, have taken the lead in protesting the government's war effort.

U.S. Urges Arab Help On Darfur (AP-Y)

By George Gedda

AP, September 21, 2006

The Bush administration has begun quietly urging Arab countries to help overcome Sudan's resistance to deploying 20,000 U.N. peacekeepers and police to the troubled Darfur region, the new U.S. special envoy for Sudan said Wednesday

In a telephone interview with The Associated Press, Andrew Natsios said U.S. contacts with Arab countries have begun. He declined to identify the countries.

"We are engaging and we are going to continue to engage with them," Natsios said. The initiative is based on the premise that as the humanitarian crisis in Darfur deepens, the Islamic government in Khartoum will be more receptive to pressure from fellow Arab countries than from non-Muslim countries.

The U.N. Security Council approved a resolution three weeks ago for the deployment a U.N. force, but the Sudanese government has rejected the plan.

Natsios expressed disappointment that China, a permanent member of the Security Council, has shown little willingness to lobby Sudan to accept peacekeepers. The two countries have close economic and political ties.

"The role of China cannot be overstated," said Natsios. "They are the country with the most influence with the Sudanese government."

With the humanitarian situation in Darfur worsening by the day, President Bush appointed Natsios as special envoy this week. Natsios was deeply involved in Darfur policy as administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development, a post he held from 2001 until early this year.

The African Union agreed Wednesday to extend the mandate of its underequipped peacekeeping forces in Darfur through the end of 2006.

The United Nations and many human rights groups say that since 2003, fighting between rebels and government-backed militias in Darfur has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million.

African Union Troops Will Remain In Darfur (WP/AP)

By Nick Wadhams

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 20 -- The African Union said Wednesday that it would extend the mandate of its peacekeeping force in Darfur through the end of the year, ensuring that international troops will remain in the war-torn Sudanese province for now.

The United Nations will provide material and logistical support to the mission, though Sudan is still resisting demands that the world body take over the mission from the African Union, said Burkina Faso President Blaise Compaore, head of the A.U. Peace and Security Council.

The decision was made in a morning meeting of the A.U. body also attended by U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan and Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir. When Bashir left about halfway through the meeting, he withheld comment except to shout "No!" when a reporter asked if he would allow the United Nations to take control of the peacekeepers.

An underfunded A.U. force in Darfur has been unable to stop the violence there. Both the African Union and the U.N. Security Council have called for the United Nations, with its superior funding and resources, to run the mission.

For now, the A.U. mission will be reinforced and infused with U.N. logistical and material support, Compaore said. "Sudan is disposed to work with the United Nations," he said.

The United Nations and many rights groups say that fighting between government troops, with the support of a militia called the Janjaweed, and rebel groups has left at least 200,000 people dead and displaced 2.5 million since 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0067003

Bashir denies that there is a major humanitarian disaster there and said Tuesday that human rights groups have exaggerated the crisis in a bid for more money.

"The picture that volunteer organizations try to give in order to solicit more assistance and more aid has given a negative result," Bashir said at a news conference.

In a speech to the U.N. General Assembly earlier Tuesday, President Bush called the Darfur killings a genocide and said the A.U. force was "not strong enough" to protect the population. He called for the force to be strengthened and demanded that the United Nations take control.

The United States and its allies are weighing whether there are other options for confronting the Sudanese government, including the possibility of military intervention despite Bashir's objections.

It's The Bushes And Clintons, Finding Common Ground (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

It's not often that you see a current American president and his predecessor in New York City, on the same morning, trying to foster peace in the Muslim world, and trying to burnish their own legacies as statesmen.

Nor is it common to have the wife of one of them on hand to help out the other guy.

But there was President Bush meeting with the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, at the Waldorf-Astoria. And there was former President Bill Clinton convening a conference on global concerns at a nearby Sheraton, and listening to President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan chastise Pope Benedict XVI for the pope's remarks about Islam. And there was the first lady, Laura Bush, giving the Clinton conclave some juice by announcing a new project to deliver clean water to 10 million Africans by 2010.

Mr. Musharraf, echoing an old slogan of Mr. Clinton's, could have been reflecting the ethos of the Midtown diplomacy — not to mention the Bushes and the Clintons — when he told the conference that in dealing with all religious faiths, "This is a time to build bridges and not burn bridges."

In truth, it was just another day in the intriguing world of BushClinton (or ClintonBush, if you will): A world in which a Bush presidency begat a Clinton presidency that begat a Bush presidency that may lead to — well, one can speculate. In this world, the former presidents named Bush and Clinton are apparently thick as thieves, while son Bush and wife Clinton are regularly at odds over the geopolitical issues under discussion yesterday.

Certainly, though, no one was calling a Bush (or a Clinton) a devil as the two families overlapped at Mr. Clinton's conference. President Bush and Mr. Clinton had a pleasant-looking run-in at the United Nations on Tuesday afternoon, and Mr. Clinton warmly welcomed Mrs. Bush to his conference dais yesterday to announce the $10 million federal commitment for the water project.

She did so in front of an audience of hundreds of officials from developed and undeveloped nations, who first sat and listened to a list of Bush administration goals to support the third world. If there were Bush skeptics in the room, they were politely silent, and Mr. Clinton was beaming like a proud presidential spouse as he sat and listened to Mrs. Bush champion her husband's agenda.

The major speakers at the conference were a little less love-soaked and a good bit more opinionated, apparently to the applauding audience's delight.

Mr. Musharraf took the lead as news-making head of state. He said "a lot of tensions in the Muslim world" were caused by the furor involving Pope Benedict XVI's citation of a medieval text saying some of Muhammad's teachings were "evil and inhuman." Mr. Musharraf added that the pope's remarks "were most unwarranted."

"It is a time for interfaith harmony," Mr. Musharraf said later in the conference session. No one has the right, he continued, "to hurt anybody else's feelings, least of all at this time."

Referring to Muslims, Mr. Musharraf added: "The world thinks that we don't believe in democracy, we don't believe in modernization, we don't believe in secularism. Let me assure this house that Islam in theory believes in all of them."

Mr. Musharraf also said the continued presence of American troops in Afghanistan was contributing to the resurgence of the Taliban and was intensifying instability there.

"They are coming back because of the presence of foreign troops," he said. "There certainly is an antipathy to foreign presence in Afghanistan."

The Pakistani leader emphasized that in his view, the conflict between the Israeli and Palestinian governments remained the greatest threat to security and political stability in Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan and Lebanon.

"It lies at the core of everything," he said. "We must not open new fronts — we must start closing fronts."

Javier Solana, the foreign policy chief of the European Union, said he believed that "the Clinton parameters are still probably the best solution" to bringing peace to the Middle East, referring to the former president's aggressive diplomacy to mediate the Israeli-Palestinian disputes.

Mr. Solana also said clashes of ideology, religion, politics and economics went beyond the Israeli and Palestinian governments.

"The divide that persists in the world is more profound than we think, and we better be aware of that," he said. "It's not getting smaller, but growing."

DOJ_NMG_0067004

In remarks that seemed aimed at the news media, Mr. Solana also warned that the West should not carelessly provoke Muslims even in the spirit of free speech and open thought. He made the comment when asked about the newspaper cartoons lampooning Muhammad last winter that led to a spasm of violence worldwide.

Mr. Clinton said that so far he had secured more than $2 billion in "commitments" from businesses and others to help address the themes of his conference: energy and climate change; mitigating religious and ethnic conflict; alleviating poverty; and global health.

The conference, known as the Clinton Global Initiative, lined up $2.5 billion from 300 sponsors last year.

US-China Launch 'economic Dialogue' (FT)

By Krishna Guha, Richard Mcgregor And Raphael Minder

Financial Times, September 21, 2006

The US and China on Wednesday announced the creation of a new "strategic economic dialogue" in which both countries would aim to grapple with the long-term issues arising from China's emergence as a leading economic power.

The dialogue will be led by Hank Paulson, the new US treasury secretary, and Wu Yi, the vice-premier responsible for trade and foreign investment policy. It will not directly address the vexed issue of China's renminbi policy or other near term issues, which will continue to be dealt with through existing bilateral contacts.

Each government will establish an inter-agency group bringing together top officials in economic and foreign policy, to support the strategic dialogue.

Mr Paulson and Ms Wu will meet twice a year, and the process will continue at a senior official level.

In a joint statement, Mr Paulson and Ms Wu said they had agreed to "focus on bilateral and global strategic issues of common interests and concerns."

They said the new dialogue would "promote economic co-operation and the growth of China-US relations" and contribute to "world economic development as well as global economic stability and security."

Mr Paulson and Ms Wu said President George W. Bush and President Hu Jintao "will strongly support and take an active role in the strategic economic dialogue."

The initiative dovetails with longstanding Chinese ambitions to elevate the US-China relationship into one unencumbered by the many difficult issues that divide them, such as piracy of intellectual property, the swelling trade imbalance and, to some extent, human rights.

"Whenever you have a higher level dialogue, it will be to the benefit of the overall relationship," said Yan Xuetong, international relations professor at Tsinghua University in Beijing.

"Because of Mr Paulson's background, they will talk more about economic issues, but I would regard this as a political dialogue as well."

A US senior administration official said the mechanism was the "first of its kind" in US international economic relations. She said the US wanted to build a "mature" and long-term economic relationship with China, as it has for instance with Europe.

The official said that the idea for the dialogue had come from Mr Paulson, and Mr Bush had proposed it in a telephone call to President Hu on August 21.

The US said likely themes include innovation, globalisation, energy security and the environment.

The US hopes the process will help lock in a continuing process of economic reform in China as the nation completes the implementation of its World Trade Organisation commitments.

Speaking in Cairns, Susan Schwab, the US ttrade representative, said that the new dialogue was "not inconsistent with existing groups."

Trade issues are now discussed in the Joint Commission on Commerce and Trade, established only four years again to handle difficult bilateral disputes.

The US side is jointly chaired by the USTR and the commerce ministry, and in China, by Ms Wu, who is also the chief point person for Mr Paulson.

U.S., China Plan Regular Talks On Long-Term Economic Issues (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

BEIJING -- The U.S. and China announced a top-level economic dialogue that they vowed would move their relationship beyond such day-to-day issues as currencies and copyright piracy.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, who will lead the cabinet-level U.S. team in semiannual meetings with Chinese counterparts, said yesterday that the approach will focus on longer-term concerns and will set the tone for better relations. Most importantly, he said, top officials from both countries will have a regular opportunity to sit down and talk privately about what their nations want most from each other.

DOJ_NMG_0067005

"The key to working with the Chinese is being able to get access to all the right people at whatever level," said Mr. Paulson, who winds up a four-day trip to China tomorrow.

Among the issues the U.S. would like to broach are how China can change copycat manufacturing into genuine innovation and retool its economy to promote domestic consumption more than exports. China is particularly interested in energy conservation and environmental protection.

Whether the effort will be productive is uncertain. The U.S. had similar frustrations with Japan and its trade surplus during the late 1980s and 1990s. In the first Bush administration, the U.S. and Japan launched a "structural impediments initiative" aimed at getting Japan to deregulate and play by what the U.S. considered international rules. But it took until the Japanese economy fell into a recession, which lasted a decade, for Tokyo to make the changes.

The plan for the new meetings underscores the influence that Mr. Paulson, a former Goldman Sachs Group Inc. chief executive with long experience in China, has amassed only two months into his job. Mr. Paulson conceived the idea of the dialogue and secured President Bush's endorsement before taking office in July. Last month, the president telephoned his Chinese counterpart, Hu Jintao, to lobby for the plan. In less than a month, Mr. Paulson helped persuade the Chinese to sign on -- giving him something to bring home from this week's visit.

Administration officials believe the proposal appealed to Chinese leaders in part because it singled the country out for special treatment and, without making new demands or raising new complaints, overtly recognized its growing economic power.

The U.S.-China relationship has been fraught with perils recently, including American anger over alleged Chinese violations of U.S. intellectual-property rights, a spat over trade in auto parts, and persistent disagreement over the weak yuan, which U.S. companies say gives their Chinese competitors an unfair edge.

Washington officials said the top-level strategic discussions would elevate -- rather than distract from -- efforts to resolve those daily issues. "We hope with this dialogue we'll create confidence in and support for continued reform" of the Chinese economy, one senior administration official said.

Mr. Hu chose Vice Premier Wu Yi, considered by American officials to be an enthusiastic reformer, to lead China's side. Mr. Hu gave her "full decision-making authority across all aspects of the Chinese economy," according to the Treasury Department.

The first meeting is slated to take place in Beijing before year end, but the new approach might not be sufficient to cool anti-China ardor in the U.S. Congress. The Senate appears headed for a vote this month on a measure to impose stiff tariffs on Chinese goods to counter the alleged price advantage they receive from the country's weak currency.

"I have tremendous respect for Secretary Paulson, and if he brings back significant accomplishments from his trip, so much the better," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.). "However, we have had four years of talk. Everyone knows the Chinese are flouting the rules. We need action."

Furthermore, it isn't clear whether another discussion mechanism would necessarily improve bilateral relations. The U.S. and China already have at least nine two-way or multilateral commissions, dialogues, partnerships and forums that address particular aspects of their relationship, from health care to energy to trade policy. And Treasury officials have repeatedly asserted that they have constant contact with their Chinese counterparts over the bilateral trade deficit and other issues.

Mr. Paulson tapped Deborah Lehr, a former National Security Council official and one of his advisers at Goldman Sachs, to handle the practical and substantive details of the new dialogue.

High-level Economic Talks Planned For U.S., China (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 21, 2006

BEIJING — The United States and China agreed on Wednesday to open high-level talks aimed at managing an increasingly complex and contentious commercial relationship.

President Bush, who launched the proposal with an Aug. 21 phone call to Chinese President Hu Jintao, named Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to head the new “Strategic Economic Dialogue.” Paulson, in Beijing for meetings with Chinese leaders, unveiled the initiative during an appearance with Chinese Vice Premier Wu Yi at China's Great Hall of the People.

“We're both thinking the same way,” Paulson said. “This is a unique opportunity to create an initiative that reflects the 21st-century global economy and redefines the economic relationship between the United States and China.”

The U.S. and China already engage in at least three sets of lower-level talks about various commercial issues. But Paulson says Wednesday's announcement marks a significant reshaping of the U.S. approach to China.

“The level we have here is unprecedented. There's never been anything close to it. That indicates how serious both sides are,” he said in a late-night interview with reporters from five major newspapers.

Reflecting a negotiating style Paulson honed while CEO of Goldman Sachs, the new process will:

•Involve top decision makers in both countries, not their deputies.

•Replace the traditional scattershot tactic with a single negotiation that prioritizes economic disputes.

•Occur behind closed doors to facilitate frank brokering.

•Explicitly aim for an eventual understanding that benefits both sides.

China is the fastest-growing market for U.S. exporters. But U.S. manufacturers complain China keeps the value of its currency, the yuan, artificially low as an effective export subsidy, fueling an annual trade deficit of more than $200 billion.

Sens. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., are seeking a Senate vote next week on their proposal to slap tariffs on Chinese exports to the USA unless China revalues. On Wednesday, Schumer said: "We have had four years of talk. … We need action."

Paulson said that failing to launch a broader discussion with China raises the risk of today's irritations degenerating into "punitive actions … (or) trade wars." Chinese leaders, including the powerful Wu, likewise have become aware of the need to safeguard their most important trade link.

"They have a sense of doing some real things, including concessions to the U.S., to prevent too much protectionist pressure in the U.S.," says Shi Yinhong, professor of international relations at Beijing's Peoples' University. "If there's too much dissatisfaction, maybe the Congress will do things that really hurt the Chinese economy."

The new talks are scheduled to begin in Beijing before the end of the year. Follow-up meetings will alternate between Washington and Beijing.

Said Paulson: "We don't intend to sit around the table and write communiqués. We intend to get things done."

Why US Speaks Softly With China On Trade (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2006

America's economic point man is taking the tack of cooperation rather than confrontation on a visit to China this week, despite a widening trade deficit and disputes over everything from pirated movies to barriers that hinder US exports of auto parts.

It's a softer tone driven by China's rising economic power, by the interdependence of the two nations, and by a pragmatic approach to financial diplomacy.

But for Henry Paulson, America's new Treasury secretary, it also reflects an assessment of risk that may come as a surprise to many Americans.

For all its rapid strides, China is in some ways a fragile economy. That, trade experts say, is a danger not just to leaders in Beijing but to the world economy.

"If reform stalls, the Chinese economy will stall, and that is in nobody's interest," says Daniel Griswold, an economist at the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank in Washington. Paulson "understands that our interest is in a thriving, liberalizing China."

China has committed itself down the road to an increasingly market-based economy. Its surging output of electronics and other goods has been stunning - and unsettling to rival manufacturers in other nations.

But this doesn't mean China's path of progress will necessarily remain smooth. Among the challenges: an outdated financial system heavy on bad loans, state-owned businesses in distress, a volatile social rift between prosperous urbanites and the rural poor, and the looming burden of a rising elderly population. Paulson outlined China's challenges

Secretary Paulson pointed to many of these challenges in a major speech before heading overseas.

"The biggest risk we face is not that China will overtake the US," he said, "but that China won't move ahead with the reforms necessary to sustain its growth and to address the very serious problems facing the nation."

Paulson's stated goals for the US-China economic relationship have much in common with those of his predecessor, John Snow. Both put the issue of a more flexible Chinese currency high on their list - a move that could bolster the exports of struggling US manufacturers.

But Paulson's tone appears at once softer and more ambitious. He is not simply calling for change from Beijing officials. He expects to work with them regularly, building on the ties he established there in his career as a globe-trotting investment banker.

Wednesday, Paulson and a Chinese official announced the creation of a new high-level dialogue designed to deal with long-term issues between the two nations. At the same time, he has dampened expectations for any quick victories on issues such as the yuan-dollar exchange rate.

All this reflects a tempered approach to China at a time when critics continue to press the Bush administration for punitive measures if China is not responsive.

"Time is running out. I hope that Hank returns with tangible results," Sen. Charles Schumer (D) of New York said in a statement last week. He and Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina say they may have "no choice" but to call for a vote on their proposal that China face a 27.5 percent tariff in the US if Beijing fails to act on the currency issue.

His sentiment is backed up by many small- and medium-size manufacturing companies. Kevin Kearns, president of the US Business and Industry Council, said this week that America needs a get-tough approach. Use China's reliance on exports to the US and the threat that those sales could be lost, he suggested, to leverage concessions from Beijing. A trade war if US pushes too hard?

Many economists, however, caution that a trade war could harm both nations and the world economy. Their arguments include:

DOJ_NMG_0067007

• The US and China, currently the twin engines of global growth, have become increasingly interdependent. Supporting gradual reforms, and a healthy Chinese economy, is more important than winning concessions.

• China's increasing clout makes it likely that its leaders will continue to make decisions based on perceptions of their own interests, not outside pressure.

• Even if the yuan were to rise sharply against the dollar, it is unclear how much impact that would have on the mammoth US trade deficit. America might simply import more from other nations, or pay more for imports from China.

Moreover, a large revaluation of the yuan might destabilize China.

"If they did it suddenly, their financial system might not be able to withstand the adversity," says Michael Cosgrove, an economist in Dallas who publishes the Econoclast newsletter.

A recent study, prepared for Congress's Joint Economic Committee, outlines a collection of challenges China confronts. It calls the banking system "dysfunctional," dominated by four state-owned banks and wrestling with a tide of nonperforming loans. One estimate, by the US accounting firm Ernst & Young, reckoned that the bad loans totaled $911 billion, or 41 percent of China's gross domestic product, at the end of last year.

China also has a jobless or underemployed "floating population" of some 140 million. By 2015, a decline in the working-age population promises to shore up the labor market.

But the flip side of that trend is an aging population without a social safety net. Already, this has distorted the economy by pushing China's domestic savings rate sky high. That's hindering the nation's hoped-for shift from an export-driven economy to one fueled more by domestic consumption.

"They themselves have come to the view that their current growth path is not sustainable," says Nicholas Lardy, an expert on China at the Institute for International Economics in Washington.

He says China is making headway with financial and other reforms.

Now it needs to find a way to boost domestic consumption while reducing runaway investment in industrial production - and to achieve this in lock step so that the economy doesn't slump. "The whole strategy is fraught with risk," Dr. Lardy says.

A more flexible exchange rate could help, he says. That would allow the central bank to focus more on domestic conditions and less on maintaining the yuan.

Paulson echoed that view in his recent speech on the global economy.

He spoke of "freeing up an inflexible currency regime" that hinders the development of a balanced economy. A more nimble monetary policy and financial system in China, he said, could "keep its economy from veering out of control." IMF pushes US, China on imbalance

Member nations of the International Monetary Fund are also nudging China and the US to do more to address imbalances in the world economy. To many, that means exchange-rate shifts in the dollar and yuan. It also means more saving (and less borrowing) in the US, and more consumption within China.

Lardy and others say China isn't fragile to the point of breaking. But it faces some tough transitions.

The reforms "will be when they feel it is in their interest to do so," Lardy says. "Paulson, at the margin, could help them see their way to the decision."

Thai Leader Says No Elections For A Year (AP)

By Sutin Wannabovorn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 21, 2006

Thailand's new military ruler, winning crucial royal backing for his bloodless coup, announced Wednesday that he would not call elections for another year. The U.S. and other Western nations expressed disapproval and urged a swift restoration of democracy.

Army commander Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, appearing relaxed and confident in his military uniform at his first news conference since seizing power Tuesday night, said he would serve as de facto prime minister for two weeks until the junta — which calls itself the Council of Administrative Reform — chooses a civilian to replace him and drafts an interim constitution.

Sondhi sealed the success of his coup by receiving royal endorsement as leader of the new junta, while ousted Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra, who watched events unfold from abroad, pondered his future and the threat of possible prosecution at home.

Receiving the imprimatur of revered King Bhumibol Adulyadej legitimizes the takeover, and should effectively quash any efforts at resistance by Thaksin's partisans. Thaksin's ouster followed a series of missteps that prompted many to accuse the prime minister of challenging the king's authority — an unpardonable act in this traditional Southeast Asian nation that is a popular vacation destination for Westerners.

There appeared to be a sense of relief among many Thais at the resolution of political tensions that had hung over the nation since the beginning of the year, when street demonstrations demanding Thaksin step down for alleged corruption and abuse of power gained momentum. Thailand has had no working legislature and only a caretaker government since February, when Thaksin dissolved parliament to hold new elections in an effort to reaffirm his mandate.

The presence of tanks and armed soldiers on the streets of Bangkok, a city of more than 10 million, was taken with good humor in an almost holiday atmosphere. Schools, government offices and the stock market were closed Wednesday but were to reopen Thursday.

There was also hope that a new regime could more effectively address an Islamic insurgency in the south that has resulted in more than 1,700 deaths in the last two years.

One insurgency leader voiced support for the coup in a statement released early Thursday.

"It is the right thing that the military has taken power," said Lukman B. Lima, an exiled leader in one of several groups fighting the central government for a separate Muslim state. "We hope that the political (situation) can be resolved."

In an e-mailed response to questions from The Associated Press, Lukman said that Sondhi was the "only one who knows the real problems" of the Muslim-dominated provinces of southern Thailand. Lukman, exiled in Sweden, is vice president of the Pattani United Liberation Organization.

Sondhi, a 59-year-old Muslim in a predominantly Buddhist country, had proposed several weeks ago opening talks with the separatists, but Thaksin's government vehemently opposed such a move.

"Thaksin's government has totally failed to quell the violence, so we are pinning our hope on the Council of Administrative Reform," said Srisompob Jitpiromsri, a political scientist from Prince of Songkhla University in the southern province of Pattani.

Outside Thailand, the coup drew criticism from several foreign governments and human rights groups, who expressed dismay at the overthrow of a popularly elected government.

The Bush administration denounced the coup and hinted that U.S. aid, military cooperation and improved trade relations might be in jeopardy.

"There is no justification for it," State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said. "It is a step backward for democracy."

Casey said U.S. assistance programs for Thailand had been put under review. At the White House, spokesman Tony Snow said negotiations on a free trade agreement with Thailand depended on restoration of democracy.

"We hope those who mounted it make good and make good swiftly on their (promise) to restore democracy," Snow said.

One of the stronger reactions came from the European Union, which demanded "that the military forces stand back and give way to the democratically elected political government."

Human Rights Watch said the military "should immediately restore fundamental human rights and protect those exercising their rights to free expression, association and assembly."

The economic fallout was still hard to judge. The stock market was closed, but in currency markets the Thai baht fell sharply, its weakness rippling out to other Asian currencies, including the Singapore dollar, Malaysian ringgit and Philippine peso. The International Monetary Fund, which bailed Thailand and some of its neighbors out of a financial crisis in the late 1990s, believed the region would be little affected, said the IMF's chief, Rodrigo de Rato.

"Thailand's economy is fundamentally strong," he said.

The swift and bloodless nature of the coup gave hope that the effects on Thailand's large tourist industry might be minimal, though several nations advised caution.

The U.S. Embassy, in an e-mail to its citizens living in Thailand, said while there had been no reports of violence, Americans should "monitor the situation closely, avoid large gatherings and exercise discretion when moving about" Bangkok.

"At this point, we are not advising Americans to leave Thailand; however, Americans planning to travel to Thailand may wish to carefully consider their options before traveling until the situation becomes clearer," the e-mail read.

Britain told its citizens in Thailand to stay in their homes, while Japan, Australia and Canada similarly advised caution.

Sondhi made two public appearances Wednesday, the first to make a brief formal announcement:

"We would like to reaffirm that we don't have any intention to rule the country and will return power to the Thai people as soon as possible," he said, flanked by the three armed forces chiefs and the national police chief.

His second appearance came at a news conference attended by about 300 Thai and foreign journalists. Seated on a stage, he spoke calmly but with confidence and smiled occasionally.

Sondhi said Thailand's foreign policy and international agreements will remain unchanged, and that new general elections will be held by October 2007.

He said the coup, the country's first in 15 years, was necessary to heal rifts in Thai society, and to end corruption, insults to the king, and what the general called Thaksin's attempts to destroy democratic institutions.

Although Thaksin handily won three general elections, opponents accused him of emasculating democratic institutions, including packing the state Election Commission with cronies and stifling media that were once among Asia's freest.

Thaksin had a power base among the rural majority, a previously neglected segment who benefited from his populist policies of government assistance.

The junta warned farmers and workers not to stage protests, and military roadblocks were set up on the outskirts of Bangkok, reportedly to keep Thaksin's supporters from reaching the capital.

Two minor pro-Thaksin demonstrations were briefly staged in Bangkok before being gently broken up by the authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0067009

Thaksin flew from New York, where he had been attending the U.N. General Assembly, to London, where he maintains a residence. He did not comment on his plans.

With Thaksin out of power, speculation has been rising on whether a new government might try to prosecute him for alleged corruption.

Asked if there would be moves to confiscate Thaksin's vast assets, Sondhi said "those who have committed wrongdoing have to be prosecuted according to the law."

Associated Press reporters Jocelyn Gecker, Grant Peck, Rungrawee C. Pinyorat and Alisa Tang contributed to this story.

Coup Leader Vows To Restore Democracy (FT)

By Amy Kazmin And Tom Burgis

Financial Times, September 21, 2006

Thailand's monarch on Thursday confirmed coup leader Sonthi Boonyarataklin as the head of the interim government.

The army chief behind Thailand's coup said on Wednesday he would step down in two weeks and promised fresh elections next year.

A day after ousting Thaksin Shinawatra, the country's controversial prime minister, General Sonthi Boonyaratkalin said he would appoint an interim prime minister to run the country until parliamentary elections under a new constitution in October 2007.

Gen Sonthi said that the Council for Administrative Reform – the name the coup leaders have given themselves – had "no intention of running the country by itself, and will return power, under the constitutional monarchy, to the people as soon as possible".

He added that the military was considering possible candidates for prime minister. "We want a person who loves democracy and constitutional monarchy," he told a news conference.

An announcement broadcast on Thai television on Wednesday night said that Thailand's revered King Bhumibol Adulyadej backed the country's new leadership. But the US appeared to take issue with the coup leaders' decision to hold no new elections for more than a year.

"We very much urge that democratic elections be held as soon as possible," the State Department said.

While tanks remained in position at Thailand's Government House on Wednesday, other parts of Bangkok were quiet as Thais stayed at home on what was declared a holiday. The military has banned gatherings of more than five people, and human rights activists expressed concern about civil liberties.

Mr Thaksin, who had been visiting New York for the annual meeting of the United Nations, flew to London, where he owns a flat and his daughter attends university. Diplomats said the ousted prime minister could face prosecution if he returned home.

The British government said it had no reason not to allow Mr Thaksin into the country and has not to date received any request for his extradition. A spokeswoman declined to comment on whether the British government considered Mr Thaksin the legitimate prime minister. However, the European Union called for the military to "give way to the democratically elected political government".

Gen Sonthi told foreign diplomats that there would not be a "witch hunt" against Mr Thaksin's loyalists. But Chitchai Wannasathit, a deputy prime minister, and Thammarak Issrangkura Na Ayutthaya, the defence minister, both members of Mr Thaksin's inner circle, are said to be in army custody as are several other of his key allies.

Mr Thaksin "caused an unprecedented rift in society, widespread corruption, nepotism and he interfered in independent agencies, crippling them," Gen Sonthi said on television.

Foreign investors indicated that Thailand would quickly get back to business.

"Thailand's economy is fundamentally strong and financial market reactions have been limited," said Rodrigo Rato, International Monetary Fund managing director.

Thai Coup Leader Delays Elections For A Year (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman And Ratchada Chitrada

USA Today, September 21, 2006

BANGKOK — A day after grabbing power in a bloodless coup, Thailand's army chief announced Wednesday that the military will postpone elections for a year while a constitution is drafted.

Despite international criticism, Thailand's king endorsed the military takeover that deposed Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra while he was out of the country Tuesday.

The army chief, Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, who led the coup, promised that the Thai armed forces will quickly surrender authority to a "neutral" caretaker prime minister.

"We will be in power for two weeks," Sondhi told reporters at military headquarters here. During that time, the country will be ruled by a six-member Council of Administrative Reform, made up of military and police officials. Parliamentary elections, which had been scheduled for this fall, will be pushed back until about October 2007, said Sondhi, 59.

Tuesday night's coup has been criticized by several countries, including the United States. "We hope those who mounted it will … make good swiftly on their promises to restore democracy," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

The takeover has been welcomed in the Thai capital. The urban elite have turned against Thaksin, even though he won re-election in February 2005.

King Bhumibol Adulyadej appointed Sondhi, a Muslim in a predominantly Buddhist country, as head of the council "in order to create peace in the country," according to an announcement Wednesday on state-run television.

Sondhi said the king, who is influential but has no official political role in Thailand, had not been involved in planning or executing the coup. "I am the one who decided to stage the coup," he said. "No one supported me."

The capital was calm Wednesday. Backpackers on Kao San Road barely noticed the political upheaval. "Nobody's up in arms about it," said Amy Farquhar, 21, a recent college graduate visiting from Aberdeen, Scotland.

The U.S. Embassy on its website advised Americans "to monitor the situation closely," but added, "At this point, we are not advising Americans to leave Thailand."

The political crisis had been building for months. Many of the capital's residents were tired of Thaksin's governing style and the way the former telecommunications tycoon blurred his private and government business.

In January, Thaksin's family maneuvered to skip taxes on the $1.9 billion sale of a controlling stake in its telecommunications empire to the investment arm of Singapore's government.

"He takes care of his cronies, and he looks out for his family," said grocer Thongdee Wonghaew, 64. When army tanks rolled into the prime minister's office complex Tuesday night, Wonghaew said, she brought the soldiers coffee and snacks.

A standoff between Thaksin and his opponents had paralyzed the Thai government for months. After intensifying street protests in January and February, Thaksin scheduled a snap election for April 2, hoping to win another popular mandate and silence his critics.

The opposition staged a boycott. Thai courts jailed three election commissioners accused of favoring Thaksin's political party and annulled the election as undemocratic and unconstitutional. New elections had been scheduled for October or November.

Thaksin was in New York for a meeting of the United Nations General Assembly when the coup occurred. He flew to London on Wednesday. It's unclear whether he will try to return to Thailand.

He still has strong support in the countryside. "He promised to give free cows, and he did," said Sutatip Sritao, 44, a farmer in Khonkaen in northeastern Thailand's Isan province, a Thaksin stronghold. "If Thaksin is not around, I won't vote for anyone else." Rural Thais have not come out strongly against the coup.

Political scientist Neil Englehart of Bowling Green State University warned that support for the coup could disappear if the military doesn't hand power to an elected government.

"If the military can keep up the impression that they have acted for the good of the nation, then opposition is likely to be muted," he said. "If it appears that they want to stay in power, opposition will get stronger."

Thai Coup Uproots A Thin Democracy (CSM)

By Simon Montlake And Daniel Ten Kate

The Christian Science Monitor, September 21, 2006

BEIJING AND BANGKOK

A bloodless coup in Thailand has upended the country's fragile democracy, to the delight of many middle-class activists who had campaigned for months for the removal of Thaksin Shinawatra, the populist prime minister. But the manner of his removal by Army officers loyal to the Thai monarch exposes the shallow roots of the democratic institutions that grew in the shadow of past military regimes.

Mr. Thaksin, whose party has won three elections since 2001, had repeatedly accused his opponents of plotting a coup. Wednesday, Thailand's king endorsed the military coup leaders, who have pledged to restore civilian rule within weeks.

The readiness of self-styled democrats to condone the military action reflects the conservative grounding of Thailand's urban political culture, which is shaped more by royalist hierarchy than well-defined checks and balances on a strong executive.

"They should use the rule of law to pin him down, rather than use a gun to get him out," says Pasuk Phongpaichit, coauthor of a critical biography on Thaksin. "I think it's important now that the coup group puts in place a new Constitution very quickly, or it could backfire and impact the economy."

Other critics of Thaksin, however, say that given his lock on the political system, and gutting of institutional checks and balances, there was no other way to end the stalemate. Thaksin packed courts with allies, politicized the nominally nonpartisan Senate, and muzzled television news. During a 2003 antidrugs campaign, Thaksin cheered when over 2,000 suspected dealers were shot dead in what rights groups called extrajudicial killings.

"There was no peaceful solution because Thaksin didn't play by the rules of the game, he only played by his own rules. We've tried all possible means to remove Thaksin," says Kasit Piromya, a member of the opposition Democrat Party and former ambassador to the US. "Thailand has not been a democracy for the past five years. Thaksin turned the whole democratic system into an authoritarian regime."

The coup leaders described their action as a response to deepening social rifts and to widespread corruption. "The government's rule was widely tainted with corruption and to benefit cronies," said Army commander Sondhi Boonyarataklin. "Letting that situation continue could have hurt the nation's security and economy."

The new ruling council has the power to censor domestic and foreign news reports and ban public gatherings of five or more people. But General Sondhi vowed to restore constitutional rule and undertake political reforms - a rallying cry of the opposition parties in Parliament - within two weeks. He said no action would be taken against members of the ousted government. However, several Army officers loyal to Thaksin have reportedly been detained, including the head of the civilian intelligence agency.

As for Thaksin himself, it remains unclear if he would return immediately to Thailand or seek diplomatic support as the leader of a government-in-exile, said an aide. Thailand is a close US ally and Thaksin has positioned himself as a trusted partner in the US-led war on terror. Thai news reports said Thaksin flew Wednesday to London where his daughter is enrolled in university.

The coup leaders might face a situation down the road where Thaksin returns - and wins another election.

On the streets, Bangkok residents wearied by months of political gridlock struck a note of cautious support for the coup. But many also said they would again vote for Thaksin if he returns to politics. "I was glad we had a coup because the political problem had gone on for such a long time," said Rittiporn Yomrum, a motorcycle driver. "But I would still vote for [him] again."

Analysts say the coup-prone military has to move quickly to install a civilian administration under royal endorsement in order to preempt any public backlash. The last time the military seized power in 1991, the public mood soured after the coup leader clung to office, then ordered a violent crackdown on protesters in Bangkok the following year. King Bhumibol then intervened to steer the country back from the brink of further civil strife.

Memories of that bloody event were revived this year by a wave of anti-Thaksin protests in the run-up to an April election that was later annulled by the Constitutional Court. A new vote was due to be run in November by a newly elected commission.

Analysts had predicted another win for Thaksin, who commands the loyalty of millions of rural Thais. He gained their support with subsidized healthcare, a freeze on farmers' debts, and cheap loans to villages.

But middle-class voters began turning their backs, angered by reports of widespread corruption in Thaksin's cabinet and his brash style of governing and refusal to countenance public criticism. Urban elites were dismayed by the appointment of his family to key roles in the military and police, and his attempts to radically overhaul the top-heavy government bureaucracy.

Unable to win at the ballot box, Thaksin's opponents now seem ready to turn the clock back on the gains of the 1990s, when the Constitution was changed to promote more stable parliamentary politics, a shift that spawned Thaksin's winning party machine, at the expense of the royalist old guard.

Thaksin made few efforts to woo the palace during his first term, ignoring protocol that for decades has put the monarchy above elected officials. The king offered only indirect criticism of Thaksin, leaving it to his aides to deliver public rebukes.

Foreign diplomats were caught off-guard by the coup timing, given the unfavorable light it casts on Thailand at the UN and the preparations to rerun the elections.

"It seems almost idiotic to do this right as Thaksin is about to get up on the biggest stage in the world," a Western diplomat says. "There was no real obstruction to reform or a national election."

Many In Bangkok Embrace Military Takeover (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

BANGKOK, Sept. 20 -- Jubilant crowds in this sultry capital embraced Thailand's new military leadership on Wednesday, as Thais showered soldiers with flowers, posed for photos with tanks and welcomed a bloodless coup that deposed Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra a day earlier.

Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratkalin, the army chief who led the rebellion and who is now acting prime minister, vowed that an interim leader would be appointed within two weeks. But in an indication that the restoration of democracy is a long way off, he made clear that elections may wait until October 2007, after the drafting of a new constitution.

For now, the military remains in control of a country that had become one of the strongest beacons of democracy in Southeast Asia. Provincial governors -- including many still loyal to Thaksin -- are being forced to report to four regional army commanders. To prevent any uprisings among Thaksin's supporters, based in the rural north and northeast, the provisional military authority also advised farmers to "remain calm" and banned political gatherings of five or more people. Some television and radio reports have been blocked or censored.

Despite the new period of uncertainty, ushered in by a coup that was denounced by the United States and other foreign governments, many Thais in the capital appeared overjoyed.

"Democracy has won!" said an ecstatic Orathai Dechodomphan, 59, a tailor and Thaksin opponent who joined hundreds of people handing out roses to soldiers near the army headquarters. "Thaksin tried to steal power and did not respect our king. He never would have left on his own. What happened yesterday is our first step toward recovering a real democracy."

DOJ_NMG_0067012

King Bhumibol Adulyadej, who was seen by many here as having effectively allowed Thaksin's removal, endorsed Sonthi, appointing him the official head of a new governing council charged with creating "peace in the country," according to an announcement televised nationally.

Sonthi is close to the king, and there had been speculation that the monarch played a role in the coup. Sonthi dismissed those suggestions Wednesday, telling reporters: "I am the one who decided to stage the coup. No one supported me."

The general, who only a week ago had ruled out the chance of a coup, said the military had been forced to act because Thaksin's moves to remain in power had divided the country. At the same time, Sonthi said, Thaksin's actions were dangerously bordering on lese-majeste, a powerful charge in a country where the king is widely revered.

The ousted prime minister, a billionaire tycoon who rose to power in 2001, was extremely popular among rural Thais largely because of a series of lucrative local programs he backed. But allegations of corruption and abuse of power earned him the hostility of the country's elite, mostly in Bangkok. He had been accused of monopolizing the media, altering the constitution to enhance his powers and stocking electoral commissions with his supporters. He was also scorned for mishandling the increasingly violent Islamic insurgency in the south of Thailand, a mostly Buddhist country.

In a public opinion poll released Wednesday by Rajabhat Suan Dusit University, almost 84 percent of respondents supported the coup. The overwhelming majority of those taking part in the poll were from the capital.

Sonthi suggested that Thaksin could face prosecution if he returned to Thailand. Thaksin, for his part, did not immediately appear ready to stage a comeback. "I volunteer to work for the country," he told the Thai News Agency in London, where he arrived Wednesday after departing early from the opening session of the U.N. General Assembly. "If they don't want me to do that, I won't."

Thaksin received international support. The European Union demanded "that the military forces stand back and give way to the democratically elected political government." The Bush administration denounced the coup and said negotiations on a free-trade agreement with Thailand depended on restoration of democracy.

Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, called the developments a "step back for democracy."

Sonthi insisted the military had no interest in maintaining power. "We have two weeks; after two weeks, we step out," he said, referring to his search for a caretaker prime minister, who analysts say would probably still operate under the scrutiny of the military.

While activists who had long sought Thaksin's ouster cheered the military's move, some opposition leaders acknowledged that Thailand must find some way out of its political crisis.

"Of course we would have liked to see this handled another way, but we also recognize that Thaksin's abuse of power had grown to the breaking point," said Abhisit Vejjajiva, head of the main opposition Democrat Party. "Now, at least, we will see a new constitution written and the path of a clean electoral process. That is what the people of Thailand want and deserve."

Diplomatic sources and Thai officials said there was little indication that the remaining Thaksin loyalists in the military and police would attempt to resist the coup. Although analysts said such a response could not yet be ruled out, Bangkok newspapers reported that at least two high-ranking military figures linked to Thaksin had pledged allegiance instead to Sonthi's "political reform council."

[Early Thursday, Lukman B. Lima, an exiled leader in one of several groups fighting the central government for a separate Muslim state, told the Associated Press that "it is the right thing that the military has taken power" and that Sonthi was the "only one who knows the real problems" of the Muslim-dominated provinces of southern Thailand.]

Thailand has suffered 17 successful or attempted military takeovers, but Tuesday's was the first in 15 years and something of a shock for Thais who thought they had left the days of coups behind. Many leading opposition figures have called this coup different in nature from the others -- mostly because the military is being trusted to simply act as a caretaker and restorer of democracy -- but others here recalled the coup in 1991. A year after that takeover, when pro-democracy activists began demonstrating against the interim military commander, at least 50 people were gunned down by troops.

"We are entering another vicious circle in Thailand -- of coups, democracy, corruption and more coups," said Thitinan Pongsudhirak, a political analyst at Bangkok's Chulalongkorn University. "We had hoped that we would get beyond this. We went 15 years without a military intervention, but clearly recent events have shown that we have yet to escape that cycle."

U.S. 'Disappointed' In Thailand Coup (AP-Y)

By Barry Schweid

AP, September 21, 2006

The Bush administration on Wednesday denounced the military coup that seized control of Thailand and hinted that U.S. aid and improved trade relations might be in jeopardy.

"There is no justification for it," said State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey, adding, "It is a step backward for democracy."

Casey said U.S. assistance programs for Thailand had been put under review. At the White House, spokesman Tony Snow said negotations on a free trade agreement with Thailand depended on restoration of democracy.

"We hope those who mounted it make good and make good swiftly on their (promise) to restore democracy," Snow said as President Bush returned to Washington from a speech and meetings at the United Nations in New York.

DOJ_NMG_0067013

The coup leaders Tuesday seized control from a government headed by Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra, suspended the Constitution and declared martial law in Bangkok, the capital.

The army commander who led the coup said elections would be held by October 2007.

The military took control while the prime minister was in New York preparing to address the special session of the U.N. General Assembly.

"The most important thing is to see a restoration of constitutional rule as soon as possible," Casey said.

Thailand's Leap Backward (WP)

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

THAILAND'S ARMY commander claimed yesterday that the military coup against the country's democratic government on Tuesday was necessary to end corruption and domestic political conflict. In fact the principal result of his condemnable action will probably be to worsen both. Thailand has a history of military coups, but for the past 15 years the army had appeared to accept the fact that such interventions invariably harmed rather than helped the country. Now the lesson will have to be learned again.

Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratkalin, who led the coup, said yesterday that the military did not want to rule; he promised to restore civilian government in a couple of weeks. But his intervention, which apparently had the support of King Bhumibol Adulyadej, was clearly intended to end the career of Thailand's most popular civilian politician, Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra. Mr. Thaksin was a bad leader who himself weakened Thai democracy by trying to intimidate and monopolize the media and by supporting brutal tactics in campaigns against drug traffickers and Muslim separatists. But it's pretty clear that he was supported by a majority of Thais and that his party would have won the parliamentary election that was to have been held this fall.

Gen. Sonthi said yesterday that the parliamentary election would be put off for a year while Thailand's constitution -- which he suspended -- is rewritten. That agenda may have the support of some Thai political parties, whose members have been trying all year to force Mr. Thaksin from power through such undemocratic means as street demonstrations. The coming constitutional reforms will probably be aimed at preventing prime ministers from monopolizing power, as Mr. Thaksin tried to do. But such reform could have been achieved through the democratic system; now it will be overseen by military officers or civilian politicians who didn't -- or couldn't -- win an election.

Thailand's democratic allies should not tolerate this rupture. The Bush administration designated Thailand as a major non-NATO ally because of its cooperation in the war on terrorism, but now it must respect the U.S. law mandating a suspension of military aid in the event of a coup. The administration should join with allies such as Australia, Japan and the European Union in insisting that the interruption of democracy by the Thai military is unacceptable. The White House made a start yesterday by indicating that talks on a free-trade agreement would be suspended. It should go further: Any government appointed by the Thai military should be shunned and U.S.-Thai relations frozen until a free and fair election is held.

For King And Country? (WSJ)

By Colum Murphy

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

BANGKOK -- The teenage soldiers standing outside the Erawan Shrine here on Tuesday night seemed unusually calm, given the task at hand. With yellow ribbons tied to their machine guns -- signifying loyalty to King Bhumibol -- they chatted idly while guarding a key intersection. And in doing so, they played a bit part in Thailand's 18th coup -- the first in 15 years.

Hours earlier, talks mediated by the king's right-hand man, Privy Council President Gen. Prem Tinsulanonda, broke down between a section of the army that supported former Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra's government and sections that favored his ouster. Mr. Thaksin got wind of the plot from New York, where he was at the U.N. General Assembly, and declared a state of emergency. But by 11 p.m. back home, Army Chief Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratkalin took over Government House with little to no resistance.

Earlier that day, Gen. Prem, one-time prime minister and former commander-in-chief of the army, granted a rare interview at the white, modern Thai-style building that is home to the Privy Council. If he had an inkling of what was about to occur, the 86-year-old didn't show it. The crisply dressed general was unruffled and characteristically tight-lipped about the political turmoil that has plagued Thailand since February. But he reiterated what he said to the Royal Military Academy's graduating cadets this summer: "In this country, we belong to the king. The armed forces belong to the king." Ethics and moral standards, he added, are of paramount import for the governing class.

So how did the situation deteriorate so quickly? Mr. Thaksin's opponents accused him of corruption, cronyism and the hijacking of independent political institutions, such as the Election Commission. That led opposition leaders to band together and protest in the streets of Bangkok. Mr. Thaksin countered by holding a snap election in April. He won 57% of the vote.Since the opposition parties boycotted the election -- and technical reasons prevented a government from being formed -- on April 25 the king called on the courts to sort out the "mess." Between then and Tuesday evening, Thailand was under the authority of a caretaker government. Fresh elections were planned for later this year.

As late as July, few analysts foresaw that the situation would deteriorate into a coup d'etat. One exception is Ukrist Pathmanand, assistant director of the Institute of Asian Studies at Chulalongkorn University in Bangkok. According to Mr. Ukrist, division within the army was just a natural progression of the social divisions that were becoming more pronounced throughout Thai society -- divisions, he says, fostered by Mr. Thaksin and his Thai Rak Thai party. "It's bad to ban the constitution and ban the democratic process including elections," Mr. Ukrist said. "But I think this is a very special situation" -- namely, that the coup took place ahead of an opposition protest march originally scheduled for yesterday, but subsequently canceled. If it had proceeded, the demonstration surely would have drawn a crowd of pro-Thaksin supporters, resulting in clashes and the possible loss of lives, Mr. Ukrist believes.

Former Prime Minister Anand Panyarachun, who served under the previous military junta of 1991-92 and was head of the Constitution Drafting Assembly (1996-97) agrees. "I think you make two steps forward and retreat one step, you hope that you can catch up the steps you lose and that future steps would become even faster," he explained on a surprisingly calm afternoon, less than 24 hours after the coup. "It's not that every country has to emulate American democracy," he added. "It should be homegrown."

The idea of "Thai-style democracy" resonates with many Thais. It rests upon the authority of the king, who typically intervenes whenever a major critical crisis occurs. This is the only system that will work for Thailand, says Gen. Prem. "We will never be a republic or without a king," he said in his interview before the coup. "That is the only thing that induces the people together. . . . So long as we have this particular, very, very good king, we will go ahead either slowly or rapidly, but united."

However, a Thai-style solution to the current crisis runs the risk of treating the symptoms -- such as removing Mr. Thaksin -- without addressing the causes. As Mr. Ukrist suggested, Thai society has split between the urban elite and the rural poor, between an increasingly sophisticated middle class and a political system characterized by weak institutions and corruption.

Though painful, Thailand would be better off grappling with its political turmoil without resorting to the deus ex machina of military or royal intervention. The coup itself may not undermine confidence in Thailand's political stability. But the deep divisions in Thai society remain unresolved. Even if the junta can deliver free elections within a year, what guarantee is there that the same social conflicts won't resurface? That would herald a much more serious crisis -- because the Thai people have already tolerated a coup for change. If it fails, what comes after that won't be easy.

Abe Vows To Continue Policies For Japan Pursued By Koizumi (WSJ)

By Sebastian Moffett

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

TOKYO -- Shinzo Abe, chosen yesterday as leader of Japan's ruling party, pledged to continue the small-government policies pursued by current Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi.

The Liberal Democratic Party gave Mr. Abe 66% of its votes in a leadership election involving two other candidates. The LDP controls Parliament, so he is almost certain to become prime minister next Tuesday, when a special session meets to choose the next Japanese leader.

Mr. Abe immediately said he would broadly continue with the remodeling of Japan undertaken by Mr. Koizumi, who cast his vote for Mr. Abe in the election. Mr. Koizumi demanded after he took office in 2001 that the change-shy country "reform," and cut public spending to try to curb Japan's growing national debt. He privatized government-run bodies, notably the post office, and started to cut the number of public employees.

Yesterday, Mr. Abe said he would continue to rein in spending, while generating higher tax revenues by fostering economic growth. He said he would only later consider a rise in sales tax, which economists say is inevitable at some point, to cope with Japan's aging population.

"We must absolutely not stop reforming," he told reporters after the vote. "We must accelerate reforms."

The Japanese public generally likes Mr. Abe for his apparent combination of assertiveness and a calm demeanor. He first became popular when he negotiated the release of Japanese kidnapped by North Korea, and acquired an image as a robust defender of national interests.

But he is inexperienced for a Japanese prime minister. At 52 years old, he would be Japan's youngest premier since World War II. He has held his only major cabinet post -- Mr. Koizumi's chief cabinet secretary, an amalgam of spokesman and chief of staff -- for less than a year. What's more, he has a tough act to follow. Mr. Koizumi gave Japan its most vigorous leadership for decades, taking on vested interests in the LDP, forcing banks to clean up their bad loans, and making Japan more assertive abroad.

One area where Mr. Abe might stand out is foreign affairs. He favors a continuation of Japan's new assertiveness. But he is expected to be less brusque than Mr. Koizumi, who angered China with his annual visits to a controversial war shrine, and was not invited to visit Beijing.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang said he hopes Mr. Abe "works diligently at improving and developing China-Japan relations," according to a statement carried on the ministry Web site.

Mr. Abe indicated to Japan's national broadcaster, NHK, that he would like to find a way out of the problems between the two countries and set up a meeting with Chinese leaders. "It is quite regrettable that the summit meetings between Chinese and Japanese leaders haven't happened," he said. "It is necessary for both sides to make efforts and take a step ahead."

DOJ_NMG_0067015

Better relations with China would go down well with a lot of Japanese, many of whom are hoping for a continuation of Mr. Koizumi's economic policies, but do not like the way relations with the country's Asian neighbors have soured.

"Koizumi was forceful but Abe is not, which I think is a good thing about him," said Kazuo Taguchi, 59, a Tokyo accountant. "He's well-balanced person, and does not look like he's going to do something extreme to make us worried or afraid. I think he will be able to restore Japan's relations with China and South Korea."

Set To Lead, Japan's Next Premier Reconsiders Postwar Era (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, September 21, 2006

TOKYO, Sept. 20 — After securing the Liberal Democratic Party's presidency on Wednesday, Shinzo Abe will become Japan's first prime minister born after World War II, with a clear eye toward re-examining the postwar era.

Mr. Abe, who will turn 52 on Thursday, received two-thirds of the votes in the election for the presidency of the Liberal Democratic Party. Because of the party's grip on the lower house of Parliament, which chooses the prime minister, Mr. Abe is now assured of succeeding Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi in a parliamentary session on Tuesday.

In a race that was his to lose, Mr. Abe (pronounced AH-bay) avoided specific comments about how he would pursue economic changes or how he would repair Japan's strained relations with China and South Korea.

Instead, he spoke of revising the United States-imposed Constitution, which forbids Japan to have a full-fledged military, passing legislation to allow Japanese troops to be deployed overseas and making it possible for Japan to exercise the right to collective self-defense with the United States. He also wants to revise the other legal document of the postwar American occupation, the Fundamental Law of Education, and emphasize moral values, patriotism and tradition in schools.

"By entrusting our national security to another country and putting a priority on economic development, we were indeed able to make great material gains," Mr. Abe wrote of the postwar era in his campaign book, "Toward a Beautiful Country." "But what we lost spiritually — that was also great."

The emergence of a prime minister with no personal experience of World War II is considered a turning point in Japan, where the absence of a consensus on the war still troubles relations with the rest of Asia.

Considered politically inexperienced, Mr. Abe, who will be the youngest prime minister in postwar Japan, rose to political stardom by talking tough on North Korea, China and national security. In Japan and in the rest of Asia, Mr. Abe is regarded as even more hawkish and conservative than Mr. Koizumi.

To his supporters, Mr. Abe is a politician unburdened by Japan's past, capable of forging a newly independent and strong path for the nation. To critics, he is a potentially dangerous ideologue ready to jettison the postwar values that have brought stability, peace and wealth to Japan.

Hakubun Shimomura, a Liberal Democratic lawmaker and an ally of Mr. Abe's, said the next prime minister would "look back objectively at the postwar period, removed from its trauma and able to make choices as part of the postwar generation."

"I think the symbolic start of the independent nation of Japan will be Mr. Abe's revision of the Constitution," Mr. Shimomura said.

But Shusei Tanaka, a professor at Fukuyama University and a former Liberal Democratic lawmaker, worried that Mr. Abe's greatest influence was from his grandfather, Nobusuke Kishi, a wartime cabinet member imprisoned as a Class A war crimes suspect but never tried, who became prime minister in 1957. Recently, Mr. Abe has avoided commenting on Japan's wartime past.

Only five years ago, few would have predicted that Mr. Abe would become prime minister. He was known mainly as the grandson of Mr. Kishi and the son of Shintaro Abe, a former foreign minister, whom the son long served as secretary.

Mr. Abe took over his father's parliamentary seat in 1993, after Shintaro Abe's death, and became quite popular among voters, earning a reputation as a strong leader by voicing national anger at North Korea's admission in 2002 that it had kidnapped several Japanese citizens in the 1970's and 1980's. Since then, he has kept his hard line against North Korea, and against China. After North Korea launched missiles in July, he suggested that Japan debate whether it should acquire the military capacity for a pre-emptive strike.

One of Mr. Abe's most pressing problems will be to restore normal relations with China, which has refused to hold high-level talks because of Mr. Koizumi's annual visits to the Yasukuni Shrine, the Shinto memorial where 14 Class A war criminals are enshrined. The shrine, also a memorial to Japan's 2.5 million war dead, is considered a symbol of Japanese militarism in the rest of Asia.

The visits have worried American politicians that Japan is provoking China, and hurting American interests in the region. Mr. Abe, despite past support of the visits, has said he would pursue a policy of ambiguity, neither confirming nor denying whether he has visited the shrine.

On wartime history, Mr. Abe has allied himself with Japan's right-wing politicians, news media and scholars. Unlike Mr. Koizumi, he has doubted the validity of the postwar Tokyo trials in which Japan's wartime leaders were condemned.

In the past he has indicated that he rejects the mainstream, postwar view that Japan waged a war of aggression and invasion in Asia. But he has not publicly embraced the hard-line position that Japan waged war in Asia to liberate it from Western imperialism. Unlike Mr. Koizumi and other prime ministers, Mr. Abe, though pressed many times, has avoided endorsing a landmark apology issued in 1995 by the Japanese government to Asian countries.

DOJ_NMG_0067016

Japanese hard-liners regard him as a true believer, while they looked askance at Mr. Koizumi for trying to negotiate with North Korea and for proposing to change the Imperial Household Law so that a woman could ascend the throne. While Mr. Koizumi made decisions on his own, dividing people between enemy and ally, Mr. Abe emphasizes harmony.

"People tend to like Mr. Abe's personality," Mr. Shimomura said. Lacking Mr. Koizumi's larger-than-life personality, Mr. Abe has instead cultivated a soft image that has taken the sharp edges off his strong views. Mr. Abe, a teetotaler who is married but has no children, appeared on a talk show to announce that his favorite food was ice cream.

"In his appearance and his way of speaking, he's soft," Mr. Shimomura said. "But in the inside, he's rock solid. He sticks to his principles and won't compromise."

For Some In Yemen, Dashed Hopes (WP)

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

SANAA, Yemen, Sept. 20 -- Former presidential candidate Sumayya Ali Rajja, her two children in tow, plodded from polling station to polling station Wednesday trying to take part in what she considered a historic moment: Yemen's first competitive presidential elections. But Rajja's frustration mounted when she was turned away from the third station and again told her name was not on the list of registered voters.

Despite apologies by election officials for what they said was a mistake, Rajja insisted that her name was intentionally removed from the list. The 51-year-old consultant, who dropped out of the presidential race last month, wrote an editorial this week criticizing President Ali Abdullah Saleh and announcing she would vote for his main opponent.

"This is proof that the government intends to do whatever it takes to win this election, that there's no real democracy here," she said as she walked out of the Tareq bin Ziyad middle school. "We're nothing but a corrupt dictatorship run by a mafia."

Whatever the reason behind Rajja's missing registration, her frustration and disappointment were real, echoed by many who had held high hopes for Yemen's democratic experiment, which had been closely watched as a barometer of pluralism in the Arab world. The country's announcement in 1990 that it would unify north and south and embrace democracy had inspired hope across the region.

Today, Rajja joins a growing chorus who believe President Saleh, in power for more than 28 years, has moved the country away from democratic ideals toward an authoritarian system based on patronage.

"Every election, instead of representing a step forward, was actually a step back," said Abdul-Wahhab al-Anisi, an official with Islah, an Islamic opposition group. "People have been losing faith in democracy because they see their lives deteriorating and oppression increasing during democracy."

Abdul-Ghani al-Iryani, a political consultant, said that eight modifications made to the constitution since 1990 had all served to increase the president's powers and make him less accountable. Saleh "is an authoritarian ruler who has subverted and sabotaged laws and established a system of patronage not conducive to democracy," said Iryani, driving around Sanaa. At a traffic light, three young boys rushed to his car begging for money to buy food. "People are actually going hungry," he said. "There's been an increase in poverty. Forty percent of the people are now living under the poverty line."

The main problem plaguing one of the Arab world's poorest countries is endemic corruption, critics say. "The government came to be seen as a place through which you could become wealthy and provide for yourself, your friends and your family," said Robert Burrowes, a political science professor at the University of Washington and author of several books on Yemen. "The people in the system don't want democracy if it limits their ability to use the state as a source of personal wealth."

Sanaa was quiet Wednesday, a national holiday to allow people to vote, as shops were shuttered and long lines formed at some of the polling stations. Soldiers in camouflage uniforms and red berets carried Kalashnikov assault rifles and frisked men entering the schools.

At the Shuhadaa al-Sabeen middle school, opposition supporters traded stories about how people affiliated with Saleh's ruling party canvassed neighborhoods, warning people that a vote for opposition candidate Faisal bin Shamlan would cause the country to slide toward Somalia-like anarchy. Those who agreed to vote for Saleh were offered cash, they said.

Early results show Saleh leading by more than 80 percent of the vote. But the opposition coalition has accused the ruling party of intimidating and arresting opponents and of forging voter lists.

"They came around to my father-in-law's house last night and offered money to the registered voters. My wife refused because she believes in reform, like I do, but my brothers-in-law took about 2000 riyals each," or about $10, said Muhammad Abdullah, an accountant at the Finance Ministry.

Despite the growing poverty, many people fear an alternative to Saleh, the only leader they've known for nearly three decades. At the Tareq bin Ziyad middle school, Amal Mohsen, a homemaker, wiped purple ink from her finger after voting. Behind her trailed her three young daughters, in threadbare clothes and bare hennaed feet, only the eldest wearing tattered sandals.

"We don't want change," she said, only her eyes visible behind a black veil and long black robe. "We want stability."

But without an overhaul of the government, the country will only get poorer and more backward, said Iryani, who believes that Saleh's administration has neither the will nor the ability to get Yemen back on the road to democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0067017

Others still have faith in the system, believing it can be salvaged from within. Jalal Yaqoub, 38, a Planning Ministry official in charge of reform, left a well-paid job in the private sector for a monthly salary of about $250 because he's convinced Saleh is serious about reform. He said that earlier this year, just months after he suggested the judicial system be reformed, Saleh divested himself of the position of head of the judiciary.

"He's not corrupt," Yaqoub said. "He has the will to change. But it's not going to happen overnight. We're a 16-year-old democracy, teenagers, still going through the hardships of puberty. I'm optimistic."

Blue Danube: Turmoil In Hungary Spotlights Troubles In Eastern Europe (WSJ)

By Joellen Perry

The Wall Street Journal, September 21, 2006

BUDAPEST -- The streets here are boiling with violence not seen since Soviet tanks rolled along the city's medieval cobblestones in 1956. This time, it is a capitalist who is pushing people to the brink.

Demonstrators protested outside Hungary's Parliament for a third straight day yesterday following clashes earlier in the week with police armed with water cannons. The protests were triggered by Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsány's admission that he had lied "morning, evening and night" about the state of the economy ahead of April elections that returned him to power.

In a recording laced with expletives and leaked Sunday to local radio, the multimillionaire advocate of free markets is heard telling fellow Socialist Party officials that the "moment of truth will come swiftly" for the economy he has rushed to link to the outside world. "It was divine intervention, the abundance of cash in the world economy and hundreds of tricks...which helped us survive so far," he said. The 45-year-old prime minister, a favorite of Western investors, has confirmed the authenticity of the tape.

Hungary has huge budget and current-account deficits. Its plan to switch its currency to the euro from the Hungarian forint has suffered repeated delays.

While Hungary's economy is in more-serious straits than Poland's or the Czech Republic's, its problems highlight a troubling state of affairs in Eastern Europe. After economic crises in the 1990s, emerging economies in East Asia and Latin America learned to let their currencies float to reflect economic conditions and avoid excessive foreign debt. Many countries formerly behind the Iron Curtain haven't fully followed those lessons.

Poland, the Czech Republic and Hungary are trying to keep their currencies fairly close to the euro, in the hopes of joining the euro zone. Foreign investors, anticipating the euro conversion, have poured money in. The danger: If the countries keep postponing the conversion date, the foreigners all could try to rush for the exits at once, triggering a rapid weakening in local currencies. In this respect, many Eastern European countries "look like the Asian countries did in their run-up to their crisis in 1997," says Harvard professor Kenneth Rogoff, a former chief economist of the International Monetary Fund.

So far, Hungary's woes appear to be contained mostly within its borders, and Hungary itself doesn't appear on the verge of an Asian-style crisis. Yesterday, the forint was practically unchanged against the dollar and the Budapest stock market fell 2.2%. The country sold more debt successfully on global markets. "Events would really have to escalate" to trigger a broader crisis, said Barbara Nestor, a currency strategist at Commerzbank in London.

Still, a few emerging countries, including Turkey and South Africa, had their bonds and currencies weaken somewhat as a result of the unrest in Budapest. A coup in Thailand, a major emerging market, also raised some concerns. "The ugly scenario is Hungary gets into serious trouble, and there are problems in Turkey, and global conditions get worse," said Nouriel Roubini, an often-bearish professor at New York University's Stern School of Business.

Yesterday at the end of Europe's trading day, Fitch Ratings changed its outlook on Hungary's foreign and local currency debt to "negative" from "stable," a move it ascribed to the protests.

To repair Hungary's budget deficit, which is expected to balloon to more than 10% of national output this year, Mr. Gyurcsány has introduced an austerity campaign. He is raising taxes, laying off public workers and asking universities to charge tuition. People soon will have to pay fees to visit a doctor -- a jolt to those long accustomed to free service.

"I understand we have to go through rough times to make the country better, but I don't trust this government with the money," said protester János Erdelyi, a 37-year-old sales representative for a Budapest construction company, wrapped in the red-white-green Hungarian flag. "We want a new election."

Mr. Gyurcsány got his start in politics as a Communist youth leader. After the collapse of the Soviet bloc in 1989, he went into business, running an investment firm that profited handsomely from privatization projects.

His political philosophy is hard to pin down: While he leads the Socialist Party, the major left-leaning party in Hungary, he also is an enthusiastic capitalist and, more recently, a proponent of orthodox fiscal policy. He is friendly both with Russia's Vladimir Putin and Britain's Tony Blair.

Mr. Gyurcsány has offered an array of explanations for his remarks at the party meeting in May, when he acknowledged his lack of candor and said, "I almost died when for a year and a half we had to pretend we were governing." He said in his Web log, or blog, that he was referring to the dishonesty of the entire political elite since 1989, and on Hungarian television that he was criticizing politicians' unwillingness to persuade people of the need for painful changes.

It remains unclear who leaked the tape of the meeting. Some say the prime minister himself might have been behind it, perhaps to convince Hungarians of the direness of the situation prior to regional elections on Oct. 1 in which his party trails.

If that was the intention, it clearly backfired. Zoltan Istok, a 32-year-old sales manager for a medical-equipment maker who has attended demonstrations all three days this week, pointed out that the government campaigned on a platform of tax cuts. "There was a 180-degree turnaround before the election and after, so they have no credibility," he said.

Although violence made headlines, the crowds before Hungary's Parliament building have been overwhelmingly peaceful. Many are supporters of the leading conservative party. Tuesday, protesters lined up at a makeshift wooden cart where a bearded, large-bellied man pulled beer from a tap and scooped out cups of cinnamon-mulled wine. Hungarian flags fluttered above the crowed as thousands sang along to Szózat, the country's second anthem, which begins: "To your homeland without fail/Be faithful, O Hungarian!"

Andrew Olasz, a 57-year-old father of three, was particularly upset about the government's plan to introduce university fees. Wearing a cloth band around his neck labeled with the name of a bitter Hungarian herbal liquor, he said he is protesting against "the campaign of lies."

Shaky Fundamentals

Economic fundamentals across Eastern Europe are increasingly shaky, two years after Hungary and seven other Eastern European nations joined the European Union. Slovakia and Croatia have big budget deficits that are getting worse. Several nations, including Hungary, have foreign-currency debt coming due that exceed their reserves of hard currency.

There are some similarities between the Eastern Europe of today and Southeast Asia in the late 1990s. Then, high interest rates and rollicking growth attracted throngs of investors. The money helped spark domestic credit booms across the region. And exchange rates linked to the dollar in Thailand, Indonesia and South Korea encouraged banks and corporations to borrow abroad.

Then, as interest rates rose in the developed world -- much as they are doing again today -- investors started to back away from developing nations. The retreat turned into a rout after Thailand devalued its currency in July 1997, as investors rushed to pull out of nearby countries where they perceived similar weakness.

Eastern Europe's situation isn't identical to Asia's a decade ago. Poland and the Czech Republic have significantly reined in deficits in their current account -- a broad measure of money flows that includes trade in goods and services. Also, unlike the key Asian nations in the 1997 currency crisis, Eastern European countries haven't committed to keep their currencies within a tight band versus the euro, giving them more flexibility.

In some respects, Hungary more closely resembles a group of countries including developed nations such as Iceland and New Zealand that have attracted foreign money with high interest rates despite concerns about a large current-account deficit. Iceland's currency plunged this year when some of that hot money withdrew.

After a long hot streak, emerging markets fell hard in May and June, suffering their worst selloff since 1997 and 1998. They have snapped back in recent weeks and most are up comfortably for the year and are outperforming the developed-nation markets.

Mr. Gyurcsány is vowing not to flinch from his austerity plan. "The policy of raw emotions and radicalism are in no way a viable path," he said yesterday.

Unusually Sensitive

Ordinary Hungarians are unusually sensitive to the risk of their currency weakening because many of them borrow in foreign currencies. Over half of Hungary's housing loans are in euros or Swiss francs. Sixty percent of corporate debt, and a third of the government's, is denominated in foreign currencies.

Agi Cöveky, a 53-year-old widow and obstetric nurse, is struggling to keep up. From her apartment next to an apple orchard on Budapest's outskirts, she explains that the monthly payments on her car and pickup truck -- both of which she bought using Swiss-franc loans several years ago -- have risen by 7,000 Hungarian forints (about $35) since April, as the forint's value has weakened. A government subsidy for her 10-year mortgage was halved in 2004, raising her monthly payments to about $359.

The combination meant she had to take up part-time work last year. "I haven't bought anything new in years," she says.

Still, such cases haven't stopped Hungary's economy from consistently expanding at a 3% to 5% clip over the past few years. One reason: generous public spending. Hungary doubled its minimum wage to $240 a month and boosted public-sector salaries 50%. In 2002, the current ruling coalition decided to add a 13th month of pay to pensioners' annual allowances. "Fiscal policy has been indulgent," says György Kopits, a member of the National Bank of Hungary's monetary council and a former International Monetary Fund official.

While protesters call Mr. Gyurcsány's cuts too severe, some international observers say his plan, although heavy with new taxes, doesn't go far enough in shaving pensions and health-care spending. After he introduced it in June, Standard & Poor's responded by downgrading Hungary's debt.

Jean Christophe de Beaulieu, who runs Boston-based State Street Global Advisors' $7 billion emerging-market fund, sold his $125 million holdings in Hungarian equities this spring. "The macroeconomic situation is preventing us from putting any money to work in the country," he says.

Euro-zone policy makers fret about the impact unstable economies could have on the currency club. Lithuania's bid for entry was rejected by the European Commission in May because its inflation rate was just above the limit for admission.

Hungary still has a number of things going for it. The banking system, largely owned by Western parents, is sound. Foreign direct investment last year totaled $6.7 billion. János Kóka, the minister of economics, called this in a recent interview "the best long-term indicator of the country's economic expectations."

To date, Hungary's prospects of joining the euro zone have given it some protection by reducing the perception of risk in investing in the country. If Hungary weren't slated to join the euro, said National Bank of Hungary Gov. Zsigmond Járai in an interview, "international investors would absolutely have given up on us a long time ago."

The power of that buffer is fading. In July, after backsliding repeatedly, the Hungarian government dropped its latest formal target of switching to the euro in 2010. It now hopes to switch before 2012. Last week the Czech Republic also abandoned its euro-entry target. Governments in Eastern Europe, prodded by popular sentiment, have chafed at the targets on budget deficits and other economic indicators that are required to join the common European currency.

Protest In Hungary Draws 15,000 (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, September 21, 2006

BUDAPEST, Sept. 20 -- Thousands of Hungarians surrounded the parliament building here for the third straight night to demand the ouster of the country's prime minister after he admitted to lying "morning, noon and night" to win reelection in April.

In what he thought was a private meeting, Ferenc Gyurcsany said in May that he had won reelection only by duping voters about how badly his party had run the country. "We have screwed up," he said. "Not a little, but a lot. No country in Europe has screwed up as much as we have. . . . It was perfectly clear that what we were saying was not true."

On Sunday, someone leaked to Radio Hungary and other media a tape recording of the socialist prime minister's confession. The immediate result: round-the-clock protests demanding Gyurcsany's removal. On Monday night, rioters temporarily took over the state television station. Over the next day or so, 150 police officers were injured.

The political violence is the worst in the East European country since Soviet tanks crushed a revolt in Budapest in 1956.

By midnight Wednesday, an estimated 15,000 protesters had gathered in a square overlooking the Danube River, the largest crowd to materialize since the tape recording became public.

Instead of resigning in shame or apologizing for having lied, Gyurcsany, 45, has tried to spin the scandal to his political benefit. He not only acknowledged making the comments but posted a transcript of the entire recording on his blog. He said his statements showed he was merely being honest about the sorry state of Hungary's public finances, something voters and politicians alike have been loath to accept.

"We will work without reversing course," the millionaire businessman and former communist vowed at a cabinet meeting Wednesday. "The government will hold firm on the only track possible: the policies of reform to ensure development and economic stability."

The uprising in Hungary has rattled neighbors in Europe, which until this week had counted the nation of 10 million people as the only East European country stable enough to reelect a government since the fall of communism in 1989.

Leaders of the European Union, which admitted Hungary and nine other new member states in 2004, said they were monitoring the crisis closely. Finnish Prime Minister Matti Taneli Vanhanen, whose country holds the rotating presidency of the bloc, said the E.U. would not intervene, "at least not today." But he added, "I hope things will calm down."

Many of the unpopular economic policies that the government began to implement after the election were required by the E.U. to keep the country on track for eventual adoption of the euro common currency.

Student leaders who had planned a major demonstration for Thursday called it off, saying they were afraid of the potential for more riots. But authorities said they expected other protests to continue.

Demonstrators who gathered outside parliament Wednesday waved red, white and green Hungarian national flags. Others carried banners. "We Need Truth For Peace," read one. Props included a mock coffin with Gyurcsany's photo and a black cloth draped over it.

"Like everyone else, I think he should resign," said Nikolett Boncz, a 24-year-old university student from the capital who was there to listen to the speeches. "It was obvious that he's been lying all along."

With municipal elections scheduled for Oct. 1, Hungarian opposition parties were quick to take advantage of the truth-telling scandal. Viktor Orban, head of the center-right Fidesz party and the prime minister's chief rival, called Gyurcsany "a sick, lying dilettante."

Few people, however, were predicting that Gyurcsany would yield to the pressure and step down. Political analysts and lawmakers from several parties said most Hungarians were disgusted with the prime minister's admission that he had lied to win reelection but were equally upset by the outbreak of violence, which they blamed on his political opponents.

"This has been shocking for Hungarian society, because for the last 16 years we've never had anything like this, never any violent actions," said Krisztian Szabados, managing director of Political Capital, an independent political research and consulting firm in Budapest. "People are faced with a choice between a liar or a guy who burns down the whole city."

DOJ_NMG_0067020

Attila Gosze, 23, a Budapest schoolteacher, said he was upset not only by Gyurcsany's duplicity but by the numerous obscenities in his tape-recorded remarks. But he said he could live with the lies and the foul language as long as the prime minister and his party prove able to fix Hungary's ailing economy.

"Perhaps he made a mistake, but he shouldn't resign," Gosze said. "That's his character, and we have to accept him for the way he is. If he does his job right, we'll stand by him."

Campaigning before April's national elections, Gyurcsany and his Socialist Party colleagues promised tax cuts and higher spending on social programs -- a popular platform with voters who had resisted calls to trim a long pattern of deficit spending in Hungary.

A few weeks after winning reelection, however, Gyurcsany told party allies in a closed meeting that the whole campaign had been a charade.

"I almost died, because I had to pretend for 18 months that we were governing," he said, according to a transcript of his remarks posted on his blog. "We kept the secret, while we knew and you did, too, that if the election victory comes, we will have to seriously settle down to work and that we have never had such a problem."

Instead of cutting taxes, Gyurcsany and his coalition partners have moved to raise them. They have also laid off public-sector workers and tried to trim spending.

Although opposition parties have pummeled the Socialists in recent months for their unpopular economic policies, they also campaigned last spring on a platform of cutting taxes and raising spending. Analysts and other lawmakers say that if nothing else, Gyurcsany's unvarnished comments will make it more difficult for all Hungarian politicians to make promises they know they cannot keep.

"It's unfortunately true that both big parties have been lying to the Hungarian people," said Matyas Eorsi, a lawmaker with the Liberals, a free-market party. "Now, the time of truth has finally come for Hungary. The rules of the market economy are also the rules for Hungary. We cannot ignore the rules anymore."

Politics, Lies And Audiotape (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 21, 2006

IT'S ONE OF HOLLYWOOD'S FAVORITE TROPES: A cynical politician becomes weary of his own platitudes, startles the world by confessing his lies and is then rewarded with a popular groundswell of support for speaking the truth. From the Depression-era "Gabriel Over the White House" to the 1998 fable "Bulworth," the "mad as hell" mea culpa has seduced media dreamers for decades.

But does it work in the real world? Maybe not, if this week's events in Hungary are any indication. On Sunday, an unknown leaker released a 25-minute audiotape of Hungarian Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany privately chewing out members of his Socialist Party a month after their April 23 reelection. "We [deleted] up. Not a little, a lot," Gyurcsany said, arguing for the necessity of emergency post-election austerity measures. "We have done nothing for four years. You cannot tell me of any significant government measure we could be proud of…. I almost died of having to pretend for the past year that we were actually governing. Instead we lied day, night and evening. I don't want to do this anymore."

Refreshingly blunt, for sure. But did a grateful nation hoist the truth-teller on its shoulders? Not quite. Angry demonstrators set fire to the state television building, attacked and injured more than 140 police officers, torched a dozen police cars and demanded Gyurcsany's figurative head. It was the worst public violence in the streets of Budapest since the Soviet-quashed revolution 50 years ago next month.

Gyurcsany is under intense pressure to resign, or at least scale back his economic reforms, but so far he's standing firm. The leak may even make it easier for him to sell his austerity package, a theory bolstered when the prime minister quickly published a lengthy transcript on his blog. Given that the violent demonstrators number only in the low thousands, it's conceivable that the telegenic young politician may yet pull a mini-Bulworth, or at least be able to do what his Socialist predecessors did 11 years ago shortly after winning election: bring the previous government's election-year spending binge into check.

But for the first time since Hungary reinstituted free elections in 1990, the previous government is the same as the one in power. And therein lies an important lesson: Some politicians will indeed lie "day, night and evening" if they can get away with it, especially to preserve their own power. Hearing an elected leader admit as much is both refreshing and depressing. If Hollywood ever decides to tell its own version of this week's events in Hungary, which aspect it emphasizes will depend on what happens in Budapest in the coming weeks and months.

Lobbyist Access to White House Revealed in Secret Service Logs

Sept. 21 (Bloomberg) -- Anti-tax advocate and lobbyist Grover Norquist visited the White House at least 74 times over the last five years, according to Secret Service logs released yesterday that illustrate the access that he and other Bush administration allies enjoyed.

Norquist was one of nine people with links to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff who were listed in the 1,646 pages of documents showing dates and times of appointments registered with the Secret Service.

Lobbyists who worked with Abramoff, including Tony Rudy, Neil Volz, Kevin Ring and Shawn Vasell, had among them at least 70 appointments at the White House from 2001 to 2005, according an administration official who briefed reporters on the documents. Records released earlier this year show Abramoff had at least seven White House appointments from 2001 to 2004.

The records were released by the Bush administration to settle a lawsuit filed in May by the Democratic National Committee. Democrats have sought to link President George W. Bush with Abramoff, 47, a Republican fund-raiser who pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt public officials and defrauding American Indian tribes that were his lobbying clients.

``This settles the claims brought by the DNC," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said.

Battle Over Records

The DNC said that the records released aren't complete, because many other documents that would list appointments and visits were turned over by the Secret Service to the White House, becoming exempt from disclosure through executive privilege. The Bush administration initially argued that some of the Secret Service records, including those of former Christian Coalition Executive Director Ralph Reed and Norquist, didn't have to be released because they were policy advisers.

``By trying to extend a special privilege typically reserved for U.S. government employees to protect their Abramoff cronies like Grover Norquist, and Ralph Reed, the Bush administration showed just how willing they are to manipulate the law to hide the truth and protect their political interests," DNC spokeswoman Karen Finney said in a statement.

Among the appointments listed for Norquist, 49, was one on Feb. 4, 2005, with David Safavian, then the government's top procurement official. Federal Bureau of Investigation agents later interviewed Safavian, 39, about his connections with Abramoff, and Norquist's business ties to the Republican lobbyists were detailed during a June 2005 Senate hearing on the scandal surrounding Abramoff.

Before Safavian joined the government, he worked at a lobbying firm founded by Norquist called Janus-Merritt Strategies in Washington. Safavian was convicted last June of making false statements about his relationship with Abramoff.

Advisory Role

Norquist didn't return a call made after-hours to his Washington office seeking a comment. Perino said he is ``one of a number of individuals who worked to advance fiscal responsibility, which is one of the key aspects of the president's agenda."

The documents, involving visits to the White House grounds including the West Wing, the Eisenhower Executive Office Building and the South Lawn, list few details beyond names and times and dates of appointments. In some cases the records show whom the visitor was scheduled to meet.

Some of the people listed, including Safavian and Assistant Labor Secretary Patrick Pizzella, made regular trips to the White House compound as part of their jobs. Pizzella, who once worked with Abramoff at a lobbying firm, hasn't been implicated in any Abramoff-related court case or other hearing.

Purpose of Visits

Many of Norquist's visits may have been for large events. One visit on June 7, 2001, coincided with Bush's signing a $1.35 trillion tax cut. He was cleared to enter the White House grounds a total of 97 times, according to the administration official. His visits are noted in summary sheets included with the documents at least 74 times.

A person named Michael Scanlon spent more than an hour on the White House grounds on Saturday, March 6, 2004, according to the logs. The records aren't clear whether he is the same Michael Scanlon who was a business partner of Abramoff and who pleaded guilty last November to conspiring to corrupt public officials.

Rudy and Volz, who worked at Abramoff's lobbying firm, pleaded guilty to similar charges earlier this year.

Two other lobbyists from Abramoff's firm -- Greenberg Traurig LLP -- whose names were listed on the White House logs, Vasell and Ring, haven't been charged with wrongdoing.

The document release marks the third time this year that the Secret Service has released information about White House visits by Abramoff or his associates in response to demands from government watchdog groups and the Democratic National Committee.

The Abramoff corruption probe has ensnared members of Congress. Representative Robert Ney, an Ohio Republican, agreed to plead guilty last week to charges he accepted gifts and cash from Abramoff in exchange for legislative favors. Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, a Republican from Texas, resigned from Congress in part because of his relationship with Abramoff. He hasn't been charged in connection with the Abramoff case.

Bush has denied knowing Abramoff, saying at a Jan. 26 news conference, ``I, frankly, don't even remember having my picture taken with the guy." Time magazine in February published a photo of them together, which White House officials dismissed as one among hundreds of pictures the president poses for each year.

US judge orders release of info on Guantanamo detainees who were disciplined or mistreated

By LARRY NEUMEISTER

Associated Press Writer

NEW YORK_A judge has ordered the Department of Defense to release documents containing the identities of some detainees at the U.S. prison camp in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, who were released or who suffered mistreatment by their handlers or other detainees.

In ruling in a case brought by The Associated Press, U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff said the government cannot keep the names secret. He gave the government a week to provide the news organization with the information despite government claims that doing so would violate detainees' privacy.

"The public interest in disclosing government malfeasance is well-established," the judge wrote in his decision Wednesday.

David A. Schulz, who argued the case for the AP, called the judge's decision "a resounding victory for the public's right to know."

He said the identities of between 50 and 100 detainees who were ordered to be transferred or released from Guantanamo Bay after Jan. 1, 2005, will allow reporters to attempt to verify whether the government's account of events is accurate.

"The Department of Defense has made it virtually impossible for anyone to check the accuracy or thoroughness of what is going on in Guantanamo," Schulz said. "The public is supposed to be able to determine these things for itself."

A spokeswoman for federal prosecutors, Lauren McDonough, said the government had no immediate comment.

The judge said some military officers and FBI agents who have worked at Guantanamo also have questioned the treatment of detainees. The judge also noted that some detainees have initiated hunger strikes to protest what they consider abuse, while other detainees, since released, have gone public with allegations of abuse.

"In all such instances, the detainees have not hesitated to reveal their identities," he said.

Schulz said the judge also ordered the government to turn over the identities in eight files reporting investigations of allegations of abuse of detainees by military personnel and fewer than a dozen probes of abuse of detainees by other detainees.

Earlier this year, the judge ordered the Department of Defense to turn over to the AP unredacted copies of transcripts and documents related to 558 military hearings in which detainees\l "I" were permitted to challenge their incarcerations.

The government's treatment of the hundreds of prisoners at the eastern Cuba prison camp has troubled human rights groups. Most have been held without being charged since investigations were begun into the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The detainees are from Afghanistan, Russia, Persian Gulf countries and elsewhere. Many were captured in Afghanistan.

Also Wednesday, a federal judge said that the U.S. military may review thousands of legal documents seized from detainees at the Guantanamo Bay prison in a probe of suicides that may have been coordinated.

In June, three detainees were found hanged in their cells. One suicide note had been written on paper stamped "attorney-client privelege," and belonged to another detainee, according to court papers. U.S. District Judge James Robertson, in rulings issued Wednesday and last Friday, ordered an independent "filter team" to review the paperwork for evidence.

Attorneys for dozens of detainees had opposed that and demanded the government return the legal documents. Irrelevant and protected documents must be returned to the detainees, the judge ruled. He ordered the government to keep meticulous records during the process.

Robertson acknowledged that the decision likely will be appealed. Another judge in the same court opted not to set up such a filter process last month.

House apologizes for Arar's treatment; Motion passes unanimously in Commons; names removed from terrorism watch list

JEFF SALLOT AND COLIN FREEZE

OTTAWA AND TORONTO — A packed House of Commons apologized unanimously Wednesday to Maher Arar for Canadian involvement in his deportation from the United States and torture in Syria.

In a related development, the government said it has taken the names of Mr. Arar, his wife, Monia Mazigh, and their two small children off a border-watch list that is used to track terrorist suspects.

Amid sustained cheers and applause, MPs approved on a voice vote a Bloc Québécois motion that said: "It is the opinion of this House that apologies should be extended to Maher Arar for the treatment he received."

Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day and other Conservatives joined in to support the motion.

The vote came midafternoon with most MPs present. Prime Minister Stephen Harper was in New York for meetings at the United Nations.

The motion is not legally binding in the same way a bill to pay compensation would be. But the minority Conservative government has said it is in talks with Mr. Arar's lawyer to reach a financial settlement for his ordeal.

Without a doubt, Mr. Arar "suffered a serious injustice," said Conservative MP Jason Kenney, Mr. Harper's parliamentary secretary and spokesman when the Prime Minister is away from the House. "We want to come to an honourable conclusion with him."

"It is very emotional for me," Mr. Arar said when he heard the news of the House motion. "I am very grateful to the MPs who passed this motion."

Mr. Arar said he still needs an apology from Mr. Harper on behalf of the government.

He also appealed to the Prime Minister to lodge an official protest with the U.S. government for deporting him to Syria in 2002. Mr. Harper is expected to meet with senior U.S. officials while he is in New York.

A commission of inquiry exonerated Mr. Arar on Monday and said that Ottawa should formally protest to the United States and Syria for Mr. Arar's treatment.

Mr. Justice Dennis O'Connor, who headed the inquiry, said it is very likely the Americans relied on inaccurate RCMP intelligence reports when they arrested Mr. Arar at New York's Kennedy Airport and deported him in the dead of night to the Middle East as a terrorist suspect.

Judge O'Connor also said the RCMP tried to cover up the extent of its involvement with the U.S. authorities, misleading the Privy Council Office on this point at a time when the government was trying to decide whether to convene an inquiry.

Interim Liberal Leader Bill Graham, who was foreign minister when Mr. Arar was arrested, joined a chorus of opposition MPs who said RCMP Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli should be held accountable.

Mr. Graham stopped short of calling for the commissioner's resignation, though several other opposition MPs did say he should be axed.

Mr. Kenney and other government ministers did not try to defend Mr. Zaccardelli. Instead, Mr. Kenney said “we are not going to take precipitous action in regard to personnel” at the RCMP.

Mr. Graham said he accepts responsibility for not pushing hard enough to find out what the RCMP's involvement was in the case at the time the Liberal government was in diplomatic talks with Syria to try to get Mr. Arar released.

Likewise, “Mr. Zaccardelli will have to take his responsibility,” Mr. Graham said.

Mr. Zaccardelli, who has been out of the country on police business, has still not made a public statement about the inquiry's findings. And nobody else at the RCMP is talking.

The Arar case has Liberals and Conservatives pointing fingers at each other. The Conservatives say it is a scandal that they inherited after the election and they have to clean up the mess. The Liberals are pointing to statements by Mr. Harper and other Conservatives when they were in opposition castigating the government for trying to defend a “suspected terrorist” who supposedly slipped through a Canadian net only to be caught by Americans.

Judge O'Connor's report contained a major and disturbing surprise, Mr. Arar said in a telephone interview. The report says that not only had the 36-year-old computer engineer been put on a border-watch list, so had his wife and their two young children.

“Why did they do this to my children?” Mr. Arar asked as he wept.

NDP Leader Jack Layton also found it “outrageous” and demanded to know when the names would be removed. “I can report to the House that action has already been taken,” Mr. Kenney replied.

The watch list in question is an intelligence data bank maintained by the Canada Border Services Agency.

An agency spokesman said that government officials are reviewing the judge's findings. The CBSA was not prepared to comment whether the agency routinely puts the names of children of suspected security threats into its data base.

Still, a couple of retired Mounties stood up for the RCMP and its embattled commissioner.

“You have to recognize that Justice O'Connor was not critical of the commissioner. He was pointing out institutional failures that need to be addressed,” former RCMP chief Norman Inkster said in an interview.

And while certain pundits have suggested that the RCMP has lost its way, Mr. Inkster countered that “to say there is an absence of internal integrity of an entire organization is a huge leap.”

He pointed out that the RCMP is a sprawling organization, consisting of 21,000 officers who act as the local police forces for eight provinces and 200 municipalities, and who also strive to protect Canada from international terrorist threats. Problems related to the Arar case, Mr. Inkster pointed out, were found to be mostly limited to a small number of officers who had been thrust into national-security work immediately after 2001.

Mr. Inkster, who headed the RCMP from 1987 to 1994, said the judge's recommendations will be helpful, and that Mr. Zaccardelli “is a professional” who can be trusted to improve training and ways for police to share information. Regardless, “because people, without thinking, are challenging his integrity and leadership, it will be hurtful,” Mr. Inkster said.

Another RCMP official involved in 2001-era terrorism investigations took the mounting criticism with a grain of salt. “The bottom line is we should be proud of our front-line officers: If we put their necks on the chopping block it's the wrong message to send,” said Ben Soave, a retired chief superintendent who headed Toronto-area national-security investigations after 2001.

Conceding that the recommendations may prove beneficial, Mr. Soave said that the RCMP, just like many organizations after 9/11, faced incredible pressure and a steep learning curve in the past five years. Many improvements have been made, he said.

Apart from the findings, Mr. Soave wondered whether the terrorist organizations might be studying police methods revealed through the public-inquiry process, or whether international law-enforcement partners will continue to trust Canada with secrets.

“All the time the terrorists are getting much more smart and they are bloodthirsty,” Mr. Soave said.

Justice Dept. Amends Remark on Torture Case

By SCOTT SHANE

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — In an embarrassing turnabout, the Department of Justice backed away Wednesday from a denial by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales of responsibility for the treatment of a Canadian who was seized by American authorities in 2002. The man was deported to Syria, where he was imprisoned and beaten.

Asked at a news conference on Tuesday about a Canadian commission’s finding that the man, Maher Arar, was wrongly sent to Syria and tortured there, Mr. Gonzales replied, “Well, we were not responsible for his removal to Syria.” He added, “I’m not aware that he was tortured.”

The attorney general’s comments caused puzzlement because they followed front-page news articles of the findings of the Canadian commission. It reported that based on inaccurate information from Canada about Mr. Arar’s supposed terrorist ties, American officials ordered him taken to Syria, an action documented in public records.

On Wednesday, a Justice Department spokesman said Mr. Gonzales had intended to make only a narrow point: that deportations are now handled by the Department of Homeland Security, not the Department of Justice.

The spokesman, Charles Miller, said the attorney general forgot that at the time of Mr. Arar’s deportation, such matters were still handled by the Immigration and Naturalization Service, which was part of the Department of Justice.

“He had his timeline mixed up,” Mr. Miller said.

Asked why Mr. Gonzales appeared to cast doubt on the Canadian finding that Mr. Arar had been tortured, Mr. Miller said, “I wouldn’t go beyond what he said.”

He said Justice Department officials “have not fully reviewed” the commission’s report since its release on Monday, and he noted that Mr. Arar had brought a lawsuit against United States officials that was dismissed by a lower court but was being appealed.

The attorney general’s refusal to take responsibility for the government’s conduct in the case comes when the treatment of people detained in the campaign against terrorism is again at the center of public debate. The White House is in negotiations with Republican senators who believe detainee legislation proposed by the administration would damage the international standing of the United States and possibly endanger American soldiers taken prisoner overseas.

For critics of the Bush administration at home and abroad, the Arar case has become an oft-cited example of both incompetence and brutality in the offensive against terrorism. It is often described as a rendition, the legal term for the seizure of a suspect overseas and delivery to imprisonment and interrogation in another country.

But the Arar case differs technically from other instances of rendition because Mr. Arar was detained in the United States and his expulsion resulted from a formal deportation order, a distinction Mr. Gonzales made.

Asked about Mr. Gonzales's remarks, Mr. Arar said in an interview on Wednesday with National Public Radio that American officials had sent him to Syria despite his protests that he would be tortured there.

"The facts speak for themselves, you know," Mr. Arar said. "The report clearly concluded that I was tortured. And for him to say that he does not know about the case or does not know I was tortured is really outrageous."

Maria C. LaHood, Mr. Arar's lawyer at the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York, called Mr. Gonzales' comments "unbelievable."

"I had hoped that they would actually step up and say, 'We made a mistake, we accept the report's findings, we clear Mr. Arar's name and we apologize,' " Ms. LaHood said.

Mr. Arar, now 37, is a former telecommunications engineer who was born in Syria but did not live there after his teenage years.

In September 2002, as he changed planes at Kennedy International Airport in New York on his way home to Canada, he was detained because his name was on a terrorist watch list. His name was included on the basis of incorrect information from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that he was linked to Al Qaeda, the commission found.

American officials wanted more information about what threat he might pose and decided to deport him to Syria, an option legally possible because he had been born there. Officials have said that as is standard in such cases, the United States sought "assurances" from Syria that Mr. Arar would not be tortured.

In fact, he was held there in a dank cell that measured 3 feet by 6 feet by 7 feet and beaten repeatedly with a metal cable, according to Mr. Arar's description and the commission report.

In October 2003, Mr. Arar was released by Syria, where officials found no evidence that he had any connection to terrorism, and returned to Canada. In January 2004 the commission, headed by a judge, Dennis R. O'Connor, began two years of hearings and investigation. The United States refused to cooperate with the commission, declining Canadian requests for documents and testimony related to the case.

On Wednesday, Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, introduced five "resolutions of inquiry" aimed at forcing the release of government documents related to the case.

Under Congressional rules, the resolutions must be voted on in five House committees within 14 days, or Mr. Markey will be able to force a vote by the full House, his staff said.

Germany tracing US agents who seized Masri

BERLIN, Sept 21, 2006 (AFP) - German prosecutors on Thursday said Spain was helping them to identify the men who seized a German citizen who claims he was wrongly detained by the CIA for five months as a terror suspect and tortured.

The state prosecutor in Munich told AFP the Spanish authorities had handed over a list of 20 names, believed to be US agents, who may have been involved in the kidnapping of Khaled el-Masri.

"We are making specific enquiries to the Spanish authorities," state prosecutor August Stern said.

He confirmed a report in Thursday's Sueddeutsche Zeitung that the suspected kidnappers are believed to have spent a night in a hotel on the Spanish holiday island of Majorca before flying to Macedonia, where Masri was seized.

A number of secret CIA flights are believed to have passed through Majorca.

The men allegedly involved in the Masri case had used false names but the authorities had been able to identify them because the hotel made copies of their passport photographs, the German press reported.

German state broadcaster ARD reported that three of the men were pilots employed by a private company which worked for the CIA.

Masri disappeared in Skopje, the Macedonian capital, on New Year's Eve 2003 in a case that has sparked diplomatic tension between Washington and Berlin.

Chancellor Angela Merkel said earlier this year that the United States had admitted making "a mistake" in detaining Masri.

Lebanese-born Masri claims that his abductors flew him to a prison in Afghanistan for interrogation. He says he was held for five months before being taken to Albania and released.

The case heightened the controversy about the CIA's so-called rendition programme in which terror suspects were seized in one country and taken to secret prisons in other countries for questioning.

US\l "I" President George W. Bush earlier this month admitted that the US Central Intelligence Agency had covertly held prisoners in overseas prisons.

Masri sued former CIA chief George Tenet and other officials but the case was dismissed by a US\l "I" court in May.

The court ruled that a trail could compromise US security by disclosing secret information but added that if his story were true, Masri was entitled to "a remedy" from the US administration.

A German parliamentary committee is investigating the affair because of allegations that the former government had known of Masri's plight but failed to act.

Bush administration appeals OK of citizenship to Palestinian man

LOS ANGELES_The Bush administration has appealed a federal judge's ruling granting a petition for citizenship to a Palestinian man who the government has claimed has terrorist ties.

The appeal comes two months after U.S. District Judge Stephen V. Wilson ruled Aiad Barakat, 45, of Arcadia, should become a citizen. The judge said Barakat didn't lack good moral character and his application should never have been denied.

The Justice Department filed its notice of appeal on Sept. 14 without giving a reason for the action. Authorities had refused citizenship to Barakat because of his alleged terrorist links, saying Barakat lied about ties to the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a radical offshoot of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Barakat was detained in 1987, along with six other Palestinians and a Kenyan in a case that became known as the "L.A. Eight," but charges were never filed. Immigrant rights groups said the case was politically motivated.

Barakat's lawyer Marc Van Der Hout said he believes Wilson's June 28 ruling will stand.

"We don't think there is a strong appeal on the government's part," Van Der Hout said. "Judge Wilson heard the evidence and made some credibility findings. It is exceedingly unlikely a Court of Appeals will disturb that ruling."

The Justice Department declined comment.

The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine has opposed peace negotiations between the PLO and Israel, and the U.S. government considers it a terrorist organization. All of the so-called "L.A. Eight" have denied being members.

The group won a victory in 1989 when a judge struck down as unconstitutional portions of a federal law that allowed deportation\l "l" to be based on political affiliation and advocacy.

In 1997, Barakat and another Palestinian in the group were granted legal residency after the government had initially tried to deport all eight.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokeswoman Virginia Kice said two of the Palestinians were currently in deportation hearings. The immigration status of the others was not known.

BACK IN COURT, ANTHRAX CASE FOCUSES ON SINGLE ITEM: LAWYERS' FEES

Litigation over the Pentagon's anthrax immunization program fizzled toward an unexpected conclusion

early this month when U.S . District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan opted to ignore an invitation from a three-judge appeals panel to consider vacating a decision he'd issued nearly two years ago. Instead, Sullivan said at a Sept. 7 hearing in Washington the only issue he sees remaining before his court is how much the U.S. government owes the plaintiffs in attorney's fees.

The case revolves around a Pentagon effort, begun in 1998, to inoculate more than a million defense personnel with the anthrax vaccine. Defense officials said the mandatory shots were necessary to ensure troops and civilians in high-risk regions or jobs do not fall victim to potentially lethal biological attacks. The Defense Department sought to use the vaccine to protect against "weaponized" anthrax spores an adversary might spread through the air.

Six anonymous defense personnel challenged the program with a lawsuit, filed in March 2003, saying the Pentagon could not legally administer the six-shot inoculation series involuntarily because the anthrax vaccine had never been properly licensed for wide-scale protection against inhaled transmission of the disease. Under the law, a U.S. president could invoke national security concerns and override a service member's right to decline inoculations, but neither President Clinton nor President Bush did so.

Rather, the government has defended the mandatory shots, insisting the vaccine was properly licensed.

In an October 2004 summary judgment on the case, Sullivan supported the plaintiffs, declaring the Pentagon's involuntary vaccination effort to be "illegal" (Inside the Pentagon, Oct. 28, 2004, p1). Sullivan issued a permanent injunction against giving mandatory shots until such time as the Food and Drug Administration carried out a proper process to certify the anthrax vaccine, or a presidential waiver is issued.

In response, the Defense Department temporarily suspended the shots. But in May 2005, the Pentagon resumed the effort on a voluntary basis, citing the authority of a relatively new law, the 2004 Project BioShield Act (ITP, May 5, 2005, p5).

Later that month, the government challenged Sullivan's decision at the U.S. Court of Appeals (ITP, May 19, 2005, p1). As the Justice Department's appeal was pending, FDA completed the formal process the lower court judge had said was necessary before the injunction against mandatory shots could be lifted. The agency issued a "final rule and order" last December confirming its view the anthrax vaccine is safe, effective and appropriate for the prevention of inhaled spores (ITP, Jan. 5, p1).

Based on FDA's long-awaited certification, the federal appeals panel decided in February that the government appeal before it had become moot. But in an interesting twist, the higher court remanded part of the case back to Sullivan. The appeals panel suggested Sullivan might rule on the government's pending request to vacate his 2004 finding that the Pentagon's anthrax inoculation program was illegal between its May 1998 inception and the FDA certification, issued in December 2005 (ITP, Feb. 16, p1).

"By its own terms . . . the injunction has dissolved, and this case no longer presents a live controversy on which we may pass judgment," the appeals court said in its five-paragraph decision.

"The government urges us to vacate the district court's opinion" that the Pentagon vaccination program was illegal until FDA issued its final rule and order in December 2005, the three judges stated. "We decline to do so, and instead remand with instructions to the district court to consider that request."

In court early this month, Sullivan said a joint proposal co-authored in July by the complainants and defendants essentially wraps up the case. In fact, the document summarizes different views the two sides have about how Sullivan should act on the case.

"Plaintiffs request that the court refuse the defendant's request for vacatur, and adopt the findings and holding expressed in its October 2004 order that the vaccine was not a drug approved for its applied use until the FDA properly completed its review of the vaccine and issued a final rule and order on Dec. 19, 2005," the joint proposal states. The government's repeated statements that the vaccine status was safe, effective and not misbranded all along "fly in the face of this court's specific factual determinations and rulings," the plaintiffs note.

However, in the same document, the government appears to concede that it could not reasonably expect Sullivan to vacate his own earlier judgment that the Pentagon's use of the vaccine was illegal prior to last year's FDA certification.

"In light of the Court of Appeals' finding of mootness, the government does not believe that any substantive issues remain in this case and that the case should be dismissed," the document reads.

The two parties agree that, because the government did not prevail at the Court of Appeals, it now owes the plaintiffs payment for attorney's fees.

This remains the only pending issue before Sullivan, the federal judge said with little explanation at the Sept. 7 hearing.

"Can the parties resolve the issue of attorney's fees?" he asked the litigants, offering to assign the case to a magistrate.

Ronald Wiltsie, representing the Justice Department, told Sullivan he anticipates the two parties could probably sort out the issue themselves, once the plaintiffs update a petition for fees initially submitted to the court in November 2004. The attorneys said they could probably agree on payment for plaintiff attorney fees by early next year.

After the hearing, Mark Zaid, who serves as plaintiff co-counsel, told ITP he would estimate their total fee request will top $312,000. In 2004, the plaintiffs also tallied expert fees of nearly $22,000.

Despite the seemingly ambiguous disposition of the case as remanded back to Sullivan's court, those opposed to the Pentagon's involuntary program are confident the judge's 2004 declaration that it was illegal will form a strong basis for further litigation.

"The appeal was mooted," says one attorney involved in the case, speaking on condition of not being named. "It doesn't affect Judge Sullivan's [2004] order at all."

Those following the issue anticipate hundreds of service members who received dishonorable discharges for refusing orders to take the anthrax vaccine will appeal to the Pentagon to correct their records. Members of the military are not required to obey illegal orders. In addition, these individuals may request back pay through the end of their enlistment period and possibly seek damages if the blemish on their records made it hard to find work in the civilian world. A small number of personnel may ask to be reinstated into the military, according to sources.

"Were the government to have to cover all associated expenses involving service members and civilians who were unlawfully disciplined due to the illegal vaccine program, the amount would likely be in the tens of millions [of dollars]," Zaid told ITP on Sept. 7.

Appeals to a service board for the correction of military or naval records are made on a case-by-case basis and cannot be done as a class, sources say.

Meanwhile, the Pentagon continues to give anthrax inoculations to defense personnel on a voluntary basis.

Report: Suits say Feds blocked oil royalties; Four Interior Department auditors said to claim they were blocked from pursuing payments owed for Gulf drilling.

NEW YORK (CNNMoney.com) -- Four government auditors who monitor leases for oil and gas on federal property charge the Interior Department suppressed their efforts to recover millions of dollars from companies they said cheated the government, according to a published report.

The New York Times reported the accusations Thursday, citing recently unsealed lawsuits that the four brought to try to recover more than $30 million they argue is owed the federal government for oil produced in publicly owned waters in the Gulf of Mexico.

The paper reports that two of the lawsuits, brought by two senior auditors still with the Minerals Management Service office in Oklahoma City, claim that Shell Oil (Charts) had fraudulently shortchanged taxpayers out of $18 million. The suit charges that the two had been ordered by superiors to drop their claim.

The paper reports that a third auditor, also in Oklahoma City, charged that senior officials in Denver ordered him to drop his demand that two dozen companies pay $1 million in back interest.

Bobby Maxwell, who the Times reports was formerly in charge of Gulf of Mexico auditing before leaving the agency, filed a suit in 2004 that charges senior officials in Washington ordered him not to press claims that the Kerr-McGee Corp. had cheated the government out of $12 million in royalties.

Anadarko Petroleum Corp. (Charts) purchased Kerr-McGee earlier this year for $16 billion. John Christiansen, a Kerr-McGee spokesman, told the paper, "We believe the case is without merit and we are defending against it." A Shell spokeswoman said the company had not seen the suits and had no comment.

The paper said the auditors sued the oil companies under a federal law, called the False Claims Act, that allows individuals to expose fraud against the government. If they are successful in their legal effort, they will be entitled to up to 30 percent of any money recovered, while losing companies would be required to pay triple the amount of recovered money as well as back interest -potentially more than $120 million in these cases.

Interior officials issued a statement to the paper that denied the agency had suppressed any valid claims and implied that the auditors simply wanted a share of any money recovered through their lawsuits.

The paper reports that the Justice Department, which reviews such suits and sometimes joins them, declined to participate in these cases. But it did not urge the courts to dismiss the suits, as some senior Interior Department officials had wanted, according to the paper.

The Interior Department's inspector general, Earl E. Devaney, in testimony to a U.S. House subcommittee Sept. 13, blasted the department for alleged ethical failures, saying that "short of crime, anything goes" at the top levels of the Interior Department, according to the paper.

Public lands under the Gulf of Mexico have become an important source of the nation's oil, accounting for almost 30 percent of U.S. oil production and almost 20 percent of natural gas production.

In addition, advances in deep-water drilling may unlock new supplies in coming years, with Chevron (Charts), Devon Energy (Charts) and Statoil (Charts) announcing earlier this month that a joint venture of theirs had successfully extracted oil from a test well in the deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico, an achievement that could increase total U.S. oil reserves by about 50 percent.

But the three companies may avoid more than $1 billion in royalty payments on that new find due to a mistake the Interior Department made in signing offshore leases in the late 1990's, according to an earlier report in the Times.

Judge dismisses challenge to law requiring citizenship proof for government health benefit

By KEVIN FREKING Associated Press Writer

(AP) - WASHINGTON-A federal judge dismissed a challenge to a law that requires millions of Medicaid beneficiaries to prove their citizenship before obtaining health benefits.

Congress passed legislation earlier this year designed to ensure that only citizens or qualified legal immigrants gain access to Medicaid, the state-federal health insurance program for the poor. More than 50 million people get health care through the program.

Several beneficiaries contended in a lawsuit that the new documentation requirements would endanger their health care benefits. That contention was nothing more than conjecture, U.S. District Judge Ronald A. Guzman ruled.

Guzman's 21-page ruling was made public Tuesday. He did not rule on the law's validity. Instead, he said the plaintiffs made clear in their complaint that they were challenging the regulations that the Department of Health and Human Services issued concerning implementation of the law.

The contested regulations do not create the documentation requirements. They simply flesh them out, the judge noted.

"Absent a showing that their injuries can be traced to the regulations, which they have not made, plaintiffs do not have standing to pursue these claims," Guzman wrote.

Lawyers who are pursuing the case on behalf of Medicaid beneficiaries said they got a partial victory in the case when the judge said he probably will issue an injunction that would prevent 500,000 foster children from being subject to the documentation regulations.

"He said there is a strong likelihood of success on the merits for the foster children," said John Mark Bouman, a lawyer at the Sargent Shriver National Center on Poverty Law in Chicago, Illinois. "If he had also found they were about to be injured tomorrow, he would have entered an injunction. He just wasn't convinced of that part yet."

Bouman also said that one way or another the plaintiffs will pursue the case and ask the judge to rule on the validity of the statute. He described it as an interim ruling that says children in foster care are likely to win, but everyone else must overcome procedural hurdles.

In all, 15 people were listed as plaintiffs. Families USA, an advocacy group in Washington, helped organize the lawsuit. Ron Pollack, the organization's executive director, said the documentation requirements are most harmful to victims of natural disasters, the homeless and people with mental and physical disabilities who will have trouble finding documents such as passports or birth certificates.

"For many people, this documentation requirement is going to prove to be extraordinarily onerous, and many people will be unable to fulfill this requirement," Pollack said.

However, about 8 million Medicaid beneficiaries also are exempted from the documentation requirements, namely elderly and disabled people so poor they qualify for both Medicare and Medicaid, as well as those aged and disabled people who get cash to meet basic needs through Supplemental Security Income.

Congress said that, beginning July 1, documents will be needed to prove identity and citizenship.

Regulations issued by the Department of Health and Human Services say a passport would meet both criteria. A birth certificate would serve as evidence of citizenship, but a second document would be needed to prove identity. In rare cases, sworn affidavits from two citizens can be accepted, but at least one of the two cannot be related to the applicant.

CMS SUED BY ADVOCACY GROUPS OVER PREMIUM GLITCH REPAYMENT POLICY

Medicare officials violated the law by failing to tell the 230,000 beneficiaries who erroneously received a total of $50 million in premium payments that they could appeal CMS' demand to repay the government , patient advocates charge in a lawsuit filed Sept. 15 against CMS in the U.S . District Court for the District of Columbia.

CMS agreed Sept. 18 to stop sending the repayment demand letters while Judge Henry Kennedy considers briefs the Center for Medicare Advocacy filed on behalf of the Action Alliance of Senior Citizens and Gray Panthers. The groups ask him to prohibit CMS from recovering any of the mistaken payments "unless and until the [HHS] Secretary provides written notice of the right to waiver."

Department of Justice attorneys agreed, on behalf of CMS, to halt the letters and are expected Thursday to file briefs either asking the judge to dismiss the lawsuit or laying out their arguments in opposition.

"These were premium refunds made in error and this is not the beneficiaries' money," said a CMS spokesman. "Waiver of repayment is not available in this situation. Therefore, while we are not sending out any additional written material at the moment, beneficiaries have already received instruction as to how to repay, they are doing that, and we're accepting repayment."

The Center for Medicare Advocacy says that, under federal law, low-income patients for whom repaying the money would be a hardship are allowed to keep it. About 50 percent of Medicare beneficiaries have incomes under 200 percent of the federal poverty level, according to the Medicare Payment Advisory Commission. Any patient who received the checks, which averaged $215, and meets the low income criteria would be allowed to keep the money, the lawsuit alleges.

The court is considering a motion on behalf of patient advocates that would require CMS to return any repaid monies until the issue is decided. The advocacy groups also argue that if it costs the government more to collect the overpayments than they are actually worth, federal law allows the agency to waive collection activities.

To recover the mistaken payments will cost the government less than $1 million if all the money sent out in error is eventually recouped, according to a CMS spokesman.

The Center for Medicare Advocacy had earlier asked CMS Administrator Mark McClellan to redraft the premium repayment demand letter to spell out the appeals rights, but he "was unwilling to do so," according to the Center for Medicare Advocacy.

An aide to Sen. Max Baucus (D-MT) said it is his policy not to comment on pending lawsuits. Baucus, Senate Finance Committee Chair Charles Grassley (R-IA) and three other senators met with McClellan Sept. 7 to discuss the premium glitch.

Today's Events In Washington 48

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush, Dissident GOP Senators Reach Agreement On Terror Bill. The AP (9/22, Flaherty) reports, "The White House and rebellious Senate Republicans announced agreement Thursday on rules for the interrogation and trial of suspects in the war on terror. President Bush urged Congress to put it into law before adjourning for the midterm elections." Sen. John McCain, "one of three GOP lawmakers who told Bush he couldn't have the legislation the way he initially asked for it, said, 'The agreement that we've entered into gives the president the tools he needs to continue to fight the war on terror and bring these evil people to justice.'" The agreement "contains key concessions by the White House, including dropping a provision that would have interpreted Geneva Convention obligations and another allowing a defendant to be convicted on evidence he never sees if it is classified. The legislation, however, makes clear the president has the authority to enforce the treaty."

The Washington Post (9/22, A1, Smith, Babington, 748K) reports, "Yesterday's…marathon talks occurred in Vice President Cheney's little-known office on the second floor of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. McCain, Graham and Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), plus [Stephen] Hadley and Steven G. Bradbury, acting head of the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, met almost continuously from 9:30 a.m. to 2 p.m.," according to "sources," and then "moved to Frist's office around 3 p.m. to announce their breakthrough."

Much of the coverage depicts the deal as solving a political problem for Republicans heading into the midterm elections. NBC Nightly News (9/21, story 3, 2:20, Gregory, 9.87M), for example, said Bush "still has to sign a bill that has to work its way through Congress but politically the White House thinks it has a real winner here. New fodder for the Republicans tough on terror argument." On ABC World News (9/21, story 2, 1:40, Gibson), George Stephanopoulos said he thought the bill would now pass the Congress. Democrats, he added, "were cut out of this deal. They don't want to block this seven weeks from an election."

DOJ_NMG_0067041

USA Today (9/22, Jackson, Kiely, 2.27M), in a story headlined "Deal On Suspects Closes GOP Rift," says the deal defuses "a fight over national security that divided the GOP less than seven weeks before Election Day." Democrats "appeared likely to back the compromise. 'It is time to make the tough and smart decisions to give the American people the real security they deserve,' said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada."

Likewise, the Wall Street Journal (9/22, Lueck, Rogers, 2.03M) reports, "Going into the fall elections, the compromise…is crucial for Republicans, who have been embarrassed by the party split just when they had wanted to present a united front against Democrats on national-security issues. Even now, the White House faces resistance to a second legislative request, authorizing warrantless surveillance of communications in and out of the U.S. And privately, Republicans admit that completing the second measure before lawmakers go home for the elections will be difficult." The Washington Times (9/22, Hurt, Fagan, 88K) says the deal allows Republicans "to turn their attention to differences they might have with Democrats."

News reports also say the agreement is predicated on "concessions" from the White House. The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Barnes, Simon, 918K), titles its front-page story "Bush Bows to Senators on Detainees," and says the President "acceded to dissident Senate Republicans on Thursday, agreeing to new rules for interrogating and prosecuting suspected terrorists that leave intact international treaty protections against torture." In "a major concession to Arizona Sen. John McCain and other Republicans, the administration dropped its efforts to have Congress redefine US obligations under the Geneva Convention."

ABC World News (9/21, lead story, 2:05, Raddatz) said that "it doesn't seem that the President got exactly what he wanted. But he seems happy about it. Late today, the President said the compromise meets his demands." Bush was shown saying, "I'm pleased to say that this agreement preserves the single, most-potent tool we have in protecting American and foiling terrorist attacks. And that is a CIA program to question the world's most dangerous terrorists and to get their secrets." But "in some senses, the White House blinked on this. What the President had wanted was to 'clarify the language in the Geneva Conventions' about what constitutes cruel and inhuman treatment of detainees. … A White House official said, late tonight, 'We simply found a new way to achieve the same objective.' But part of that objective…was clearly to get this wrapped up before the midterm elections."

CBS Evening News (9/21, lead story,2:40, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "The President all along said the Geneva Conventions needed to be reinterpreted, redefined because language was too vague. It didn't offer any protection to American intelligence agencies who are actually carrying out all of this interrogation. He wanted those agents protected by the Geneva Conventions being furthered -- further explained, clarified. He gave that up."

The New York Times (9/22, Zernike, 1.21M) reports Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, said, "We proposed a more direct approach to bringing clarification. This one is more of the scenic route, but it gets us there." The agreement "says the executive branch is responsible for upholding the nations' commitment to the Geneva Conventions, leaving it to the president to establish through executive rule any violations for the handling of terror suspects that fall short of a "grave breach." Significantly, Senate aides said, those rules would have to be published in the Federal Register." The agreement "provides several pages describing 'grave breaches' that would not be allowed, starting with torture and including other forms of assault and mental stress. But it does not lay out specific interrogation techniques that would be prohibited."

The Financial Times (9/22, Daniel) says the compromise, "struck on Thursday after six hours of intense negotiations, marks a second moral victory for Senator John McCain, who last year took on the White House over the Detainee Treatment Act, which prohibits cruel or inhumane treatment of prisoners, and Senator Lindsey Graham and Senator John Warner." The battle "had threatened to undermine both the Republican effort to show unity on national security issues and make that a cornerstone of party re-election efforts."

McClatchy (9/22, Talev) reports Sen. John McCain, "one of three Republican senators who forced the administration to compromise, said he was satisfied with the agreement. 'There is no doubt that the integrity and sprit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved,' he said at a news conference with other senators and administration officials." Sen. Lindsey Graham, who'd joined McCain and Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner "in forcing the White House to temper its original proposal, said he believed the compromise would prohibit simulated drowning, or 'water-boarding' as a CIA interrogation technique."

NYTimes, WPost Criticize Agreement. In an editorial titled "A Bad Bargain," the New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) says "the overall bill prepared by the three senators had fatal flaws. It allows the president to declare any foreigner, anywhere, an 'illegal enemy combatant' using a dangerously broad definition, and detain him without any trial. It not only fails to deal with the fact that many of the Guantánamo detainees are not terrorists and will never be charged, but it also chokes off any judicial review." The Democrats "have largely stood silent and allowed the trio of Republicans to do the lifting. It's time for them to either try to fix this bill or delay it until after the election. The American people expect their leaders to clean up this mess without endangering US troops, eviscerating American standards of justice, or further harming the nation's severely damaged reputation."

The Washington Post (9/22, 748K) headlines its editorial "The Abuse Can Continue," and says "the senators who have fought to rein in the administration's excesses…failed to break Mr. Bush's commitment to 'alternative' methods that virtually every senior officer of the US. military regards as unreliable, counterproductive and dangerous for Americans who may be captured by hostile governments." If the bill "is passed in the form agreed on yesterday, Mr. Bush will go down in history for his embrace of torture and bear responsibility for the enormous damage that has caused."

DOJ Clarifies Gonzales Remarks On Arar Case. The Washington Post (9/22, DeYoung) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales's claim this week that the Justice Department was not responsible for sending Canadian software engineer Maher Arar to a Syrian prison in 2002 was the result of imprecise wording by Gonzales and a misunderstanding by those who reported his remarks, according to a Justice Department spokeswoman. … The matter turns on the meaning of the word 'we.'" The Post continues, "On Tuesday, a day after a Canadian government commission concluded that the Syrian-born Arar was 'interrogated, tortured and held in degrading and inhumane conditions' for 10 months after being falsely accused of terrorist ties, Gonzales was asked whether the department owed him 'an apology.' … 'Well, we were not responsible for his removal to Syria,' Gonzales replied. 'I'm not aware that he was tortured, and I haven't read the commission report.' … Gonzales was aware that in 2002 the Immigration and Naturalization Service arranged Arar's removal from the United States and his delivery to Syria after he was accused of ties to al-Qaeda, spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said. The INS has since been transferred from the Justice Department to the new Department of Homeland Security and is known as U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services." The Post adds, "Since Arar was officially deported, Scolinos said, his case was 'an immigration-related issue.' She said Gonzales was trying to 'make that point' because 'immigration matters are no longer handled by the [Justice] Department.'" The Post notes, "On the question of torture, Scolinos said, 'My understanding is that the U.S. government received what they believed to be reliable assurances that he would be treated humanely, consistent with international treaties and conventions.' Gonzales, she said, was 'emphasizing that point.'"

Maine AG Seeks Dismissal Of Phone Record Suit. The AP (9/22, Adams) reports, "Maine's attorney general asked a federal court Thursday to throw out the government's lawsuit against Maine officials over whether a phone company should release information about its handling of confidential records." The AP continues, "Attorney General G. Steven Rowe said the state's request, filed on behalf of the Public Utilities Commission, asserts the federal government has no jurisdiction in the case. The state also contends that the government is wrong to invoke 'state secrets' arguments. … 'There are no state secrets at issue here,' Rowe said at a news briefing after the motion to dismiss was filed in U.S. District Court in Bangor." The AP adds, "The litigation stems from a press release issued by Verizon and information it provided to the PUC, in which the telecommunications company claims it did not provide phone records to the government for its domestic surveillance program. The company also said in a May news release that it would not discuss any relationship with the National Security Agency program. … The PUC, prompted by a complaint by 22 Mainers, ordered Verizon to provide a sworn affirmation that Verizon's statement about the phone records is true. In response, the federal government sued, saying that the PUC's attempt to force Verizon to answer raised national security concerns."

DOJ Asks 9th Circuit For Quick Dismissal Of Eavesdropping Suit. The AP (9/22, Yen) reports,

"The Bush administration asked an appeals court Thursday to step in immediately and dismiss a lawsuit over the U.S. government's warrantless wire tapping program, calling a lower judge's ruling dangerous and wrong." The AP continues, "The Justice Department asked the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to overturn the decision earlier this month by U.S. District Judge Garr King. Government attorneys argued the decision put the disclosure of 'highly sensitive foreign intelligence information' at risk." The AP adds, "The lawsuit was filed by the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, which had a chapter that went out of business after the U.S. government labeled it a terrorist organization. … The foundation alleged that two of its lawyers and at least one official were under electronic surveillance in March and April 2004. The foundation is asking King to rule the surveillance a violation of a federal law that requires a special court to approve intelligence-related wiretapping." The AP notes, "Typically, appeals are filed at the conclusion of a case in trial court; however, in this case, Justice Department attorneys are asking the 9th Circuit to step in now given the sensitivity and urgency of national security. … In the Sept. 7 order, King declined to dismiss the case, saying he believed there may be a way for the lawsuit filed by a now-defunct Islamic charity to proceed without releasing information that could harm U.S. security. … In Thursday's filing, Justice Department attorneys argued that King's decision is flawed because classified facts needed to evaluate the case are protected under the so-called 'state secrets' privilege."

Pentagon IG Says Able Danger Didn't Identify 9/11 Terrorists. The New York Times (9/22, Shenon, 1.21M) reports, "The Defense Department's inspector general on Thursday dismissed claims by military officers and others who had insisted that" the secret Pentagon program Able Danger "identified Mohamed Atta and other terrorists involved in the Sept. 11 attacks before the attacks occurred." However, the report "was criticized Thursday by Representative Curt Weldon, Republican of Pennsylvania, who is a member of the House Armed Services Committee and who helped bring information about Able Danger to light." He described "the inspector general as having 'cherry-picked testimony from witnesses in an effort to minimize the historical importance of the Able Danger effort.'"

FBI Denies Agents Visited Cobbler In Macheteros Probe. The AP (9/22) reports, "The FBI is investigating if people posing as bureau agents visited a shoe repair store in western Puerto Rico owned by a supporter of independence for the U.S. territory, an agency spokesman said Thursday. Harry Rodriguez, FBI spokesman in Puerto Rico, denied that bureau agents visited Miguel Sanchez's shoe repair store in Mayaguez, though Sanchez said they did come to see him." The AP notes, "Rodriguez's comments come three days after FBI agents returned to the homes of two Puerto Rican activists whose properties were searched in February in an investigation into a militant independence group. … Rodriguez said the agents went to the homes as part of an ongoing investigation into the Macheteros," but "he declined to provide details."

Military Said To Have "Clever" New Procedure For Tracking Terrorists. The Washington Times (9/22, Gertz, Scarborough, 88K) "Inside The Ring" column reports US commandos "have developed a clever technical procedure for tracking terrorists in Iraq, and elsewhere, we presume. The tracking is used by a special military intelligence unit within U.S. Joint Special Operations Command," and "was instrumental in finding and killing al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi in June and in capturing a number of his lieutenants." The report offers no specifics about the procedure.

Britain Relaxes Carry-On Restrictions. USA Today (9/22, 2B, Stinson, 2.27M) reports, "Air passengers can carry a larger bag and musical instruments on board flights leaving Britain starting today, the government announced Thursday. … The slight relaxation…comes after complaints from passengers and airlines and as the government continues to try to balance security with passenger convenience." The Transport Department said in a statement that the change would "lessen the burden on passengers, while maintaining a rigorous security regime."

Jordanian Court Sentences Woman To Death In Wedding Bombing Case. The Washington Post/AP (9/22, A12, Halaby) reports a Jordanian court "sentenced an Iraqi woman to death Thursday for her role in al-Qaeda-led hotel bombings that killed 60 people in Jordan's deadliest terror attack." Sajida al-Rishawi, 35, "was intended to be one of the suicide bombers in the Nov. 9 attack. She entered a hotel ballroom with her husband, both strapped with explosives belts. Her husband set off his own belt, the explosion ripping through a wedding party in the room." Rishawi was "one of seven defendants in the case, but the six others were still at large and tried in absentia. Like Rishawi, the six were sentenced to death by hanging. Rishawi is the first woman to be sentenced to execution in Jordan on terrorism charges."

Poe Says French Government Shows "Ignorance" On Terror Threat. The Washington Times (9/22, McCaslin, 88K) "Inside The Beltway" column reports the "French government's latest reaction to the global war on terrorism is being scrutinized all over again on Capitol Hill." Freshman Rep. Ted Poe (R-TX) said recently, "'Let them eat cake' is what Marie Antoinette said to the starving French people, showing her ignorance of the world around her. Today it can be used to describe France's position on handling terror threats."

Author Says Bin Laden Should Be Treated As Criminal Defendant. In a New York Times op-ed (9/22), author Lawrence Wright writes a script for what the US should do with Osama bin Laden if he is located: "First, don't kill him. He'd become a martyr instantly, which is of course his goal. His death at the hands of Americans would be the ideal finale from a Qaeda perspective. Deny him that victory at all costs. And, please, don't send him to Guantánamo or torture him in an undisclosed location." The US "should, instead, offer him to the authorities in Kenya, where, on Aug. 7, 1998, a Qaeda suicide bomber murdered 213 people in the attack on the American Embassy." Then "take him to Tanzania, where on the same August morning Al Qaeda hit another American Embassy, killing 11 people, most of them Muslims." Once "exposed as a mass murderer of Africans who had no part in his quarrel with America, Mr. bin Laden would be ready to stand trial for the bombing of the American destroyer Cole and, of course, 9/11." By "treating him as a criminal defendant instead of a enemy combatant, we could underline the differences between a civil society and the Taliban-like rule he seeks to impose on Muslim countries and eventually the entire world." Wright says bin Laden's end should be dictated by a Saudi Shariah court.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Miami Police Chief Defends Arrest Of Terror Suspects. The Miami Herald (9/22, Clark, 310K) reports, "Miami police Chief John Timoney defended the arrest of the Miami Seven to a House homeland security committee Thursday, telling the panel that not all terrorists look like Sept. 11 ringleader Mohamed Atta." Timoney "acknowledged there had been skepticism about the June arrest of the seven men in Liberty City. … 'I was skeptical, as was the FBI, but not once did [the suspects] back off,' Timoney said. … Timoney's remarks came after Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen" noted that the arrests, "to some observers, 'hardly passed the smile test.'" The Herald adds, "Timoney told the panel that progress has been made since" 9/11 "in terms of local police working with the FBI. But he noted that it's still not clear 'who has the ultimate responsibility for intelligence gathering.' 'Somebody's got to make a decision that one agency is in charge,' he said, alluding to a turf war among the FBI, Department of Homeland Security and the 16 agencies that make up the federal intelligence community."

Collins, King Reach Agreement On Chemical Plant Security. The New York Times (9/22, Lipton, 1.21M) reports moving away from a less stringent industry-backed proposal "many other Republican senators," Sen. Susan Collins and Rep. Peter T. King agreed Thursday on a chemical plant security plan "that would give federal officials the power to shut down high-risk chemical plants that do not comply with proposed new anti-terrorism measures for that industry." Under new plan, "the regulations would apply to all high-risk plants, instead of just those defined as highest risk. The regulations would also give the Department of Homeland Security the power to review and approve plans devised by plant owners, to inspect facilities to determine compliance and to shut any noncompliant plants, according to a statement by Ms. Collins and Mr. King." However, "It is not yet clear that this language — which may be considered too stern by some Republicans and too relaxed by many Democrats — will be approved by the full conference committee, which is scheduled to meet Monday evening on the department's budget."

Cost To Implement Real ID Act Put At $11 Billion. The Washington Post (9/22, A4, Fears, 748K) reports, "The cost to consumers for helping to secure America became clearer yesterday" with the release of a report by the National Governors Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures and the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators that "estimated it would cost more than $11 billion over five years to implement the technology required by the Real ID Act." The report "does not say whether the cost of implementation will be passed on to drivers and holders of state identification cards. But Homeland Security officials said the price of similar new smart cards for 750,000 workers at ports and other transportation facilities will be about $140 each."

Pan Am Using Terrorism Lawsuit Funds To Pay Former Employees. The Washington Times/AP (9/22, Tong) reports in the "15 years since Pan American World Airways shut down, Anthony La Pera had assumed he would never get paid his leftover wages and accrued vacation. But Mr. La Pera and another 15,000 former employees can expect to open their mailboxes one day in December and find that a check has arrived, marking the end of the liquidation of an iconic airline." In July, "a federal bankruptcy judge authorized the Pan Am Corp. to distribute the money it had secured in a settlement with the government of Libya. Sending out those checks marks the end of a long process of winding down Pan Am." Pan Am "shut down on Dec. 4, 1991, after declaring bankruptcy that January. Among the last, fatal blows it suffered was the 1988 bombing of Flight 103, a now-infamous attack that ended with 270 dead when a bomb exploded on board as the plane flew over Lockerbie, Scotland." In 2003, Libya "accepted responsibility for the bombing and agreed to pay restitution to the victims. Pan Am's payments come from a separate settlement of a lawsuit its insurers brought against the Libyan government."

Pataki, Bloomberg Praise Finalized Framework For WTC Rebuilding. After "clenched teeth" negotiations, the Port Authority, as owner of the WTC site, and developer Larry Silverstein ratified the conceptual framework to rebuild Ground Zero, the timing of which prompted the New York Times (9/22, Bagli, 1.21M) to lead with, "Now, at long last, finally, for sure." Under the agreement, the PA takes responsibility for the "$2.2 billion" Freedom Tower, a development site one block away, and the "$2.2 billion transit center." These must be built by 2012, along with the "$500 million" WTC memorial and a shopping mall, according to the agreement in April. The plan says Silverstein will build three towers along the east side of the site by 2012, and if he falls behind schedule on just one tower "he risks losing them all."

Grace Period For Silverstein Hints At Possible "Rebuilding Delays." In its headline and lead, the Wall Street Journal (9/22, Frangos, 2.03M) suggests that yesterday's agreement provided for "rebuilding delays." The Journal explains that the three buildings Silverstein plans to build could take 7 instead of 6 six years to complete, under yesterday's contract that gives him a "one-year 'grace period' beyond the 2012 deadline." If rebuilding extends past "the end of 2013," he loses all the property. A Port Authority official "said Silverstein's potential construction lenders were uncomfortable with the more-aggressive timeframe." The Journal notes Pataki "hailed" the agreement, calling it "the last major hurdle toward the completed redevelopment of the World Trade Center site." Like the Times, the Journal notes the uncertainty surrounding Freedom Tower construction, given ground zero insurers and the tentative nature of federal and state leases.

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Press Musharraf, Karzai On Fighting Islamic Extremists. The Chicago Tribune (9/22, Silva, 623K) reports the "survival of Afghanistan's fragile government in the face of a resurgent Taliban threat will be high on the agenda for President Bush and the presidents of Pakistan and Afghanistan in a series of White House meetings starting Friday." While the White House "credits Pakistan for helping to capture or kill more Al Qaeda operatives than any other country since the attacks of Sept. 11, it worries about support that Pakistan's unruly regions provide for Taliban fighters intent on unseating the government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai." The White House is "counting on Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf to prevail upon tribal leaders to prevent foreign fighters from crossing into Afghanistan."

McClatchy (9/22, Hutcheson) reports Bush "will be prodding" Musharraf and Karzai "to work together against Islamic extremists." The "diplomatic arm-twisting comes at a particularly challenging time in a region that remains a spawning ground for international terrorism. In Afghanistan, a Taliban military offensive is testing the viability of the U.S.-backed government in Kabul. Neighboring Pakistan continues to serve as a haven for Taliban operatives and al-Qaida terrorists." Bush will "meet Tuesday with Afghan President Hamid Karzai before welcoming both leaders to a three-way summit over dinner on Wednesday. It could be a heartburn-inducing meal." Stephen Cohen, a South Asia specialist at the Brookings Institution, said, "Karzai and Musharraf do not like each other. Our influence with both is declining."

Pakistani Official Defends Deal With Border Tribes. The Washington Times (9/22, Behn, 88K) reports, "Pakistan's point man on a truce with tribal elders along the country's restive border with Afghanistan yesterday rejected charges that the agreement would undermine the fight against Islamic extremists." Gov. Ali Muhammad Jan Aurakzai of North West Frontier Province "also criticized the United States for being slow to deliver on critical military equipment and support needed to combat Taliban fighters." Aurakzai "said the agreement he had helped hammer out with tribal leaders of North Waziristan was part of a broader strategy to keep terrorists out." Aurakzai said, "It's not just a peace agreement. It is a larger strategy with a military arm, a political arm and a reconstruction arm." He added that the government "planned to pump $2 billion into the tribal areas over the next nine years for "massive development," he said." The Times adds, "Top officials in both Afghanistan and the United States are skeptical of the deal and of Islamabad's overall commitment to the war on terror."

White House "Frets" Over Situation In Afghanistan. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, A4, Harwood, 2.03M) "Washington Wire" says the "White House frets about Afghanistan" before President Bush meets with President Hamid Karzai. While Bush praises his Afghan counterpart, "senior officials worry Karzai isn't strong enough to quell" the Taliban threat, since he "hasn't wrested power from warlords or extended his reach much beyond Kabul."

US Plans No Troop Reductions In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (9/22, A13, Tyson, 748K) reports the US military "plans no troop cuts in Afghanistan before March, as fighting intensifies against Taliban forces that have gained influence in a political and security 'vacuum' in the southern part of the country, according to a senior U.S. commander." Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry said, "Our troop levels in Afghanistan will remain about steady through . . . February." The Post adds there "are approximately 20,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, the highest number since the U.S.-led invasion in October 2001 to overthrow the Taliban government." Eikenberry said "Taliban fighters and extremists have grown more numerous, organized and determined in some parts of the south and southeast, where foreign troops were limited and the Afghan government was weak."

British Forward Operating Base A Flashpoint In Campaign Against Taliban. NBC Nightly News (9/21, story 4, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This evening, we have fresh pictures just in to us of the fighting in Afghanistan. Specifically an ambush just today of British forces caught on videotape. It happened in the southern part of Afghanistan during a mission to resupply a forward operating base." NBC (Nealy) added the helicopter patrol twice tried "resupply British troops and failed. It seemed like the third time lucky. But lucky's not the word for it. Gunners fired as the four helicopters approached Britain's most exposed military base in Afghanistan. This gunfire was nothing to what followed there. There had been warnings of a Taliban threat to helicopters to British troops were ready but as drawn broke the Taliban were ready, too. They were hidden near the helicopters and as we landed they prepared to launch their ambush. It came seconds after we hit the ground. The Taliban fired from several positions. Our camera damaged in the chaos. The troops retaliate with massive firepower."

Musharraf Says Armitage Threatened To Bomb Pakistan "Back To Stone Age." USA Today/AP (9/22) reports Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf says former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage "threatened to bomb his country 'back to the Stone Age' after the Sept. 11 attacks if he did not help the U.S. war on terrorism." In an interview for CBS' 60 Minutes, Musharraf said, "The intelligence director told me that (Armitage) said, 'Be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age.' I think it was a very rude remark." By "agreeing to cooperate with the United States, Musharraf said, he reacted responsibly. 'One has to think and take actions in the interests of the nation, and that is what I did,' he said." USA adds Armitage "disputed the language attributed to him but did not deny his message was a strong one, 60 Minutes said."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/21, Todd) reported that the US relationship with Pakistan has "hit at a very sensitive stage." In a CBS "60 Minutes" interview Pakistani president Pervez Mushurraf "indicates they might have been bullied into" helping the US after the 9/11 attacks. Musharraf's intelligence director relayed a message from" Armitage that if "Pakistan didn't help the U.S. in the war on terror, Musharraf says 'the intelligence director told me that Armitage said be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the stone age.'" Armitage denies making that specific remarks but says he delivered a tough message to Pakistan at the time.

Albright Says Cohen, Pentagon Notified Pakistanis Of Attack Against Bin Laden. Former Secretary of State

Madeleine Albright on CNN's The Situation Room (9/21, Blitzer) described her problems with the recent ABC documentary on the 9/11 attacks saying, "And on a very particular case which had to do warning the Pakistani of the facts were totally wrong. It was Secretary Cohen and the Defense Department that wanted to make sure that the Pakistanis did not think they were being attacked by India at a time that we were launching cruise missiles against Osama bin Laden. So when the missiles were already in the air, Joe Ralston Vice President of the Joint Chiefs was with the Pakistanis."

Conferees Approve $70 Billion In Iraq, Afghanistan War Funds. The AP (9/22, Taylor) reports House-Senate negotiators "approved a new $70 billion infusion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan as they wrapped up talks on a $447 billion Pentagon funding bill." The additional war funds "would bring the total approved by Congress for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan since Sept. 11, 2001, to more than $500 billion, with another installment likely to come next spring." Meanwhile, the White House "beat back an attempt by Republicans on the appropriations committees to take an additional $2 billion from defense programs to ease cuts to domestic programs such as education and grants to local governments." The bill 'would be the first of 11 spending bills to clear Congress for the budget year beginning Oct. 1. With progress so slow on other bills — the homeland security bill is the only other spending measure likely to pass before Congress adjourns next week to campaign for fall elections — the Pentagon measure will also carry a stopgap funding bill to keep open agencies whose funding bills won't have passed."

The Wall Street Journal (9/22, A4, Rogers, 2.03M) reports together with "prior appropriations for Iraq, the total U.S. commitment will now approach $375 billion, and final concessions to the White House could squeeze billions from domestic spending bills delayed until after the November elections." Together, "the defense and homeland-security budgets, are two of the last major legislative packages Republicans hope to complete before sending members home next week to campaign, and each will be used to carry additional legislation." The defense bill, "for example, will incorporate a stopgap funding bill to keep domestic agencies operating through Nov. 17, buying time for a lame-duck session after the elections."

CQ (9/22, Cahlink, Higa) reports, "Contrary to the wishes of House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, the conference report on the $447.4 billion measure also includes a continuing resolution that will fund programs in bills not completed by the Oct. 1 start of the new fiscal year. The stopgap spending measure, which will last until Nov. 17, will fund those programs at the same level as in fiscal 2006." Lewis had "preferred that the measure be passed individually, as is usually the case."

The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Levey, 918K) reports the "agreement on the 2007 defense appropriations bill — expected to be approved by the full House and Senate next week — spares Republicans the embarrassment of leaving Washington without funding the cash-strapped military." But it "marked another grim milestone for wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that by one estimate have already cost two-thirds as much as the Vietnam War, which lasted more than twice as long as the current conflicts have so far." The "prolonged and difficult negotiations over next year's Pentagon funding underscored the financial toll of war-related costs on other military-related services. On the same day Republican leaders hammered out their agreement, advocates for military families came to Capitol Hill to talk about cutbacks in military-base libraries, child-care centers and other services for armed forces personnel and their kin."

Democrats Say Administration Shortchanging Army Base Operation Funds. McClatchy (9/22, Brown) reports House Democrats said the Army "is $500 million short of the money it needs to operate its bases this year because of the war in Iraq, forcing many posts to cut back on training, force protection and family support programs." Since June, "some Army installations have had to close mess halls, reduce training time and cut back on ammunition, equipment, food and fuel to non-deploying units. Funds for family support activities, including child care, gyms, bus services and other programs have also been cut, hurting morale for families whose loved ones are fighting overseas, the congressional Democrats said at a press conference." The Democrats said the "Bush administration failed to anticipate the Army's needs and budget enough money to cover those expenditures, the group said."

Casey Says Iraq Conflict Becoming Internal Struggle. The AP (9/22, Becatoros) reports Gen. George Casey, the top US general in Iraq, said the "conflict in Iraq is changing from a fight against U.S.-led coalition forces to an internal struggle for political and economic power." Casey "acknowledged the security situation has become more difficult in the past few months, and said Iraqi leaders must find common ground on key issues if progress is to be made." Casey said, "We're starting to see this conflict here transition from an insurgency against us to a struggle for the division of political and economic power among the Iraqis." The AP adds Casey said "reducing violence in the capital is crucial to any possible success in Iraq."

Bush Assertion On Iraqi Civil War Disputed. In response to Wednesday's interview with President Bush who stated that Iraq was not in the midst of a civil war, CNN's The Situation Room (9/21, Ware) reported, "Well it certainly feels like a civil war to the people on the street." If "Bush talks about the sources of information, these people, everyone within the U.S. forces here live in a bubble. They couldn't be further distanced from the Iraqi reality than humanly imaginable."

Clinton Suggests Motivation For Toppling Saddam Was Based On GOP's 1980s Iraq Ties. Former President Bill Clinton in an interview on Larry King shown from Wednesday night shown on CNN's The Situation Room (9/21) said, "And I think they thought it might clean their own skirts a little since most of what Saddam did was really terrible when he had the full support of the Republican Administration in the '80s of which Dick Cheney was a part. To be fair to them, it was the example of the old adage that the enemy of my enemy is my friend."

UN Official Says Use Of Torture In Iraq May Be Worse Than It Was Under Saddam. The AP (9/22, Engeler) reports Manfred Nowak, the U.N. special investigator on torture, said "torture in Iraq may be worse now than it was under Saddam Hussein, with militias, terrorist groups and government forces disregarding rules on the humane treatment of prisoners." Nowak "made the remarks as he was presenting a report on detainee conditions at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay as well as to brief the U.N. Human Rights Council, the global body's top rights watchdog, on torture worldwide." Nowak said "reports from Iraq indicate that torture 'is totally out of hand,'" adding, "The situation is so bad many people say it is worse than it has been in the times of Saddam Hussein."

Group Of Anti-War Activists Arrested At White House. The Washington Post (9/22, A8, Montes, 748K) reports a "group of ministers, veterans and peace activists attempted to deliver a 'declaration of peace' to the White House yesterday, kicking off a week of vigils and other activities in 350 communities across the country calling for the prompt withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq." Thirty-four people "were arrested here and charged with disorderly conduct after they demanded to speak with President Bush, then refused to leave the west gate of the White House. As part of an initiative of more than 400 groups, many of them religiously affiliated, the activists said they had to 'bear moral witness' against the U.S. military role in Iraq." The "day's activities also featured vigils for peace in dozens of cities and towns."

Army Makes Recruiting Goal, Optimistic About Next Year. The AP (9/22, Burns) reports that Army Secretary Francis Harvey said "The Army is ending its best recruiting year since 1997 and expecting similar success in 2007," in "a considerable turnaround from last year." This "trend in recruiting is particularly important for the Army now because it is striving to expand its overall ranks. The expansion is fundamental to an Army plan that increases the number of combat brigades." It appears that "a package of new financial incentives, new recruiting approaches and a bigger recruiting corps did the trick. Army recruiters are making more use of the Internet to attract young prospects, and the Army this year began allowing people as old as 42 to enter the service." It also "has accepted a larger number of recruits whose score on a standardized aptitude test is at the lower end of the acceptable range, and it has granted waivers to permit the enlistment of people with criminal records that otherwise would disqualify them."

Army Facing "Severe" Personnel Strain. The New York Times (9/22, Shanker, Gordon, 1.21M) reports, "Strains on the Army from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have become so severe that Army officials say they may be forced to make greater use of the National Guard to provide enough troops for overseas deployments. Senior Army officers have discussed that analysis…with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's senior adviser on personnel, David S. C. Chu," but "the prospect presents the Bush administration with a politically vexing problem: how, without expanding the Army, to balance the pressing need for troops in the field against promises to limit overseas deployments for the Guard." Meanwhile there are "many signs of mounting strain on active Army units," and "An internal Army document that was provided to The New York Times notes that the demand for troops in Iraq and Afghanistan has greatly exceeded past projections that predicted earlier troop reductions." While "Rumsfeld has not favored substantially expanding the Army, concluding that such a step would draw money from programs he favors to overhaul the military and calculating that the high level of troops in Iraq and Afghanistan will prove temporary," Gordon R. Sullivan, the former Army chief of staff and president of the Association of the United States Army, said "that the Army was simply too small for the many responsibilities it faced," and "Barry R. McCaffrey, the retired four-star Army general, also asserted that the armed forces needed to be expanded."

Western Washington USA Says Budget Cuts Slow Prosecutions. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (9/22, Shukovsky) reports, "The federal prosecutor for Western Washington says his office is 'stressed to the limit' because of years of budget cuts that threaten to slow the pace of criminal prosecutions." The P-I continues, "U.S. Attorney John McKay has issued this warning to county prosecutors and special agents in charge of federal agencies, including the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and Immigration and Customs Enforcement: 'We may not be as responsive as you want us to be on the cases you refer to us.'" The P-I adds, "The office has been hemorrhaging prosecutors and support staff members even as the other Washington is poised to impose another budget cut for the 2006-07 fiscal year. … The office, which handles federal criminal prosecutions and civil cases involving the U.S. government, is down six criminal prosecutors and one civil attorney, leaving 58 assistant U.S. attorneys, McKay said. … Fourteen positions in the office are unfilled, and McKay still must pay his 118 employees a mandatory 3 percent cost-of-living raise. … McKay said he is proud that the office has been able to maintain its productivity -- prosecuting more than 800 defendants last year. … But cases that might have been prosecuted under tougher federal laws are increasingly being sent to local prosecutors."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Hewlett-Packard CEO Likely To Testify Before House Committee. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Rogers, Clark) reports, "Hewlett-Packard Co. Chief Executive Mark Hurd appears headed for a House committee examining the 'pretexting' scandal at the company." The Journal continues, "Mr. Hurd yesterday offered to testify after Rep. Joe Barton of Texas, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said the computer maker's top executive may be called as a witness. … The hearing, scheduled for Thursday before the House subcommittee on oversight and investigations, already had a witness list that includes H-P General Counsel Ann Baskins and Patricia Dunn, the H-P chairman who pushed for an investigation of board leaks." The Journal adds, "In other developments, H-P disclosed that the Securities and Exchange Commission's enforcement division had made new requests for information from the company. In a filing on Sept. 6, H-P reported that the SEC's corporation-finance department had requested information about an H-P filing last May that reported the resignation of director Thomas Perkins, who resigned in protest over the leak investigation."

The New York Times (9/22, Darlin, Richtel) reports, "Pressure is mounting on Hewlett-Packard's chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, to explain what appears to have been a greater role in the company's spying operation than was initially indicated." The Times continues, "Mr. Hurd has largely escaped mention in connection with the company's efforts to obtain private phone records and otherwise trace leaks from its board. But on Thursday, after his name figured in documents newly appearing in the investigation, Hewlett-Packard's stock price fell significantly for the first time since the revelations began early this month." The Times adds, "The California attorney general, Bill Lockyer, threatened at one point Thursday to issue subpoenas to Hewlett-Packard because of what he said was a lack of cooperation in his criminal investigation. But later in the day, a spokesman for his office said H.P. had expressed a willingness to cooperate, as the attorney general wanted. … The problem for Mr. Hurd arises from a sheaf of e-mail messages and other documents obtained by news organizations that suggest that he approved of at least one aspect of the spying operation, offered names of possible targets and may have been briefed by the supervisors of the effort at the start of a crucial phase. .. .None of the leaked documents directly implicate Mr. Hurd. He did not write any of the e-mail messages, nor is it clear that he was sent copies of others that refer to him and actions attributed to him. … But what may yet emerge — Hewlett-Packard delivered more than 5,000 pages of documents to investigators with the House Committee on Energy and Commerce this week, and more are expected Monday — is what seems to have worried investors and analysts."

SEC Seeks Probe Information As Lockyer Alleges HP Non-cooperation. Bloomberg (9/22, Frank, Gullo) reports, "Hewlett-Packard Co. received a request for information from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission over its investigation into media leaks as California Attorney General Bill Lockyer complained the company stopped cooperating with him." Bloomberg continues, "Hewlett-Packard disputed Lockyer's assertions and said it is cooperating with his probe, as well as reviews by the SEC, U.S. Justice Department and a congressional committee. Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd offered to appear before the committee, the company said today. … 'Today we ran into a brick wall,' Lockyer said in an interview. 'Frankly I'm pretty angry about it. I've instructed my lawyers this morning to paper the place with subpoenas.'" Bloomberg adds, "The SEC probe and Lockyer's statements intensify the scandal hanging over Hewlett-Packard on the eve of Hurd's first press conference to discuss the methods the company used to uncover the source of boardroom leaks to the media. Lockyer said some tactics, including the use of fake identities to obtain phone records, are criminal."

USA Today (9/22, Hopkins, Swartz) reports, "The SEC's enforcement division is seeking records and information related to HP director Tom Perkins' resignation in May, HP said. The division also wants information about HP's news-leak probes and related Sept. 6 and May 22 SEC filings by the company. HP said it is cooperating." USA continues, "

HP Stock Value Declines. The Washington Post (9/22, D1, Noguchi, Masters) reports, "The scandal over Hewlett-Packard Co.'s conduct in investigating press leaks started affecting its business yesterday for the first time, weighing down its stock price and raising questions about the future of its leadership." The Post continues, "Shares of the printing and computing company dropped 5 percent, the first major price dip since the company revealed early this month that it had obtained personal phone records of its board members and nine journalists under false pretenses. HP shares, which had been trading near a 52-week high of $37.25, dropped $1.91 to close at $34.87."

HP Parts Ways With Wilson Sonsini. The American Lawyer (9/22, Beck) reports, "Hewlett-Packard Co. said Thursday it has dropped Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati as its outside counsel in the California attorney general's criminal investigation of the company." The AL continues, "Wilson, HP says, will continue to represent the company in other matters, but in a written statement by spokesman Ryan Donovan, the company said that 'Hewlett-Packard and Wilson Sonsini mutually agreed it would be in the best interests of both parties for Wilson to terminate its representation of HP in the California attorney general's inquiry.'" The AL adds, "Wilson chair Larry Sonsini has been HP's primary outside counsel for years, advising the client on the massive Agilent Technologies Inc. spin-off in 1999, and guiding it during the tumultuous proxy fight waged by former director Walter Hewlett that spanned 2001-2002. Sonsini has stated that he was not involved in the design of the leaks probe, but he did review the results of the probe for the company, and initially took the position that it was 'within legal limits.'" The AL notes, "In a separate news release, HP announced that it will hold a press conference Friday where CEO Mark Hurd and lawyers from Morgan, Lewis & Bockius will address the leaks investigation. The press release states that Morgan Lewis was retained on Sept. 8 by HP to conduct a 'comprehensive analysis of the leak investigations.' It also notes that, 'Morgan Lewis also is representing HP in connection with several government inquiries.'"

Dunn's Attorney Says Don't Blame Her. The California Recorder (9/22, Scheck) reports, "Don't blame Hewlett-Packard Chairman Patricia Dunn, her new lawyer said Wednesday, for the convulsions the company's board have suffered in the wake of its troubled investigation of boardroom leaks. … 'She's neither a lawyer nor is she an investigator,' said James Brosnahan, the Morrison & Foerster litigator whom Dunn hired this week. 'And she's not the kind of person, frankly, who would advise people to do something illegal.'" The Recorder continues, "Dunn has come under scrutiny for her role in directing the troubled probe -- The Wall Street Journal reported Wednesday that she closely supervised it -- and she's the latest figure in the imbroglio to get a big-name lawyer in response to multiple government investigations. … Brosnahan, long-known for handling high-profile clients -- including John Walker Lindh, the Marin County man once charged with fighting for the Taliban -- will represent Dunn before a congressional subcommittee and in the state and federal investigations into HP's probe of board members, journalists and employees."

Dunn Receives Award From California Business Executives. CNET News (9/22, McCullagh) reports, "Hewlett-Packard's embattled chairman, Patricia Dunn, accepted a 'hall of fame' leadership award at a gala dinner (in San Francisco) on Wednesday night where she received a standing ovation from local executives." CNET continues, "The applause and paeans to a long and successful career seemed to gratify Dunn, who has been the subject of ongoing criticism and media scrutiny since reports in the last two weeks revealed that she had called for and perhaps helped to direct an intrusive probe into boardroom leaks. … Dunn thanked the Bay Area Council, a regional business lobbying and networking group, for 'courage in standing by your decision (to grant the award) in such unexpected circumstances.' … 'All I will say about the maelstrom is that I look forward eagerly, in the near future, to the time when I can set the record straight and go back to leading my life as discreetly as possible,' Dunn said during her after-dinner speech. … The bizarre juxtaposition of receiving a leadership award from an organization that stresses business ethics and good corporate governance was not lost on Dunn, who said she's aware of the 'irony of being inducted into the Bay Area Business Hall of Fame.' .. . But for the most part, other dinner speakers offered plaudits to Dunn--there was even a slideshow with her high school yearbook photo--with only passing references to her recent troubles."

Schumer, Feinstein Press DOJ Over Probe Of Former Gemstar CEO. Bloomberg (9/22) reports, "Gemstar-TV Guide International Inc. has enlisted two U.S. senators to press the Justice Department to speed up its investigation into what role the company's former chief executive, Henry Yuen, played in a $248-million accounting fraud." Bloomberg continues, "Democratic Sens. Charles E. Schumer of New York and Dianne Feinstein of California wrote Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales to inquire about the government's case against Yuen, who withdrew eight months ago from a plea agreement with federal prosecutors in Los Angeles after a federal judge said the deal was too lenient. The senators also forwarded a letter from Gemstar's general counsel warning that a legal deadline to charge Yuen was approaching. … The Yuen case 'may raise some questions about the adequacy of tools available to prosecutors to fight corporate wrongdoing,[Schumer wrote in his Sept. 13 letter to Gonzales." Bloomberg adds, "While saying he didn't want to interfere, Schumer added, 'It is important that Congress be kept well-informed about this and other similar cases so we can monitor the enforcement of the laws designed to protect average Americans from the type of conduct of which Mr. Yuen has been accused.' … Feinstein, who wrote Gonzales on Aug. 23, said, 'I do not believe it is appropriate for me to intervene in prosecutorial decisions,' but the Gemstar general counsel's letter 'does raise some serious allegations.' … The letters ratchet up a campaign by Gemstar to have Yuen sent to prison for his role in the fraud. The company, which has paid more than $100 million in civil settlements and attorneys' fees in connection with the accounting missteps, has taken the unusual stance that it is a victim of Yuen's alleged crimes."

Cablevision Awarded Backdated Options Grant To Dead Official. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Grant, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "Cablevision Systems Corp. awarded options to a vice chairman after his 1999 death but backdated them, making it appear the grant was awarded when he still was alive, according to a company filing and people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "The country's fifth-largest cable operator in terms of subscribers also improperly awarded a compensation consultant options but accounted for them as if he were an employee, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission filing, citing the results of a six-week investigation by an outside law firm." The Journal adds, "The findings of the probe were released yesterday as the Bethpage, N.Y., company restated its financial results and said two of its directors had stepped down from posts on the board's audit and compensation committees as part of an escalating investigation into its improper granting of stock options. … The company also said it had received a grand jury subpoena in connection with an investigation into its options practices from the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of New York." The Journal notes, "The improprieties regarding the deceased executive -- Vice Chairman Marc Lustgarten, who died in 1999 -- and a compensation consultant are among the more unusual allegations of abuse that have surfaced in the scores of investigations that have been launched this year over improper stock-options practices. About 100 companies are under federal investigation for possibly backdating or otherwise manipulating stock-option grants to secretly boost their value."

SEC Tightens Scrutiny Of Hedge Funds. The Financial Times (9/22, Grant) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission is tightening scrutiny of hedge funds by stepping up examination of the links between hedge funds and broker-dealers, particularly where they are owned by a hedge fund, a senior SEC official said." The Times continues, "The move is a sign that the SEC continues to find ways to regulate hedge funds after a US court federal court in June overturned an SEC rule forcing hedge fund advisers to register with the agency. .. .Walter Ricciardi, deputy director of enforcement, said: 'I think some of the problems we've seen with hedge funds, one of the risk factors, red flags, is where they have their own broker-dealer. … That creates quite a conflict in the sense that investors' money is sitting there and a hedge fund decides to trade through their own broker-dealer and [the hedge fund] gets a fee for such trading. … It gives them an incentive to run up trading fees. It may not be in the best interests of investors,' he told the Financial Times." The Times adds, "While the SEC's office of compliance already conducts routine inspection of broker-dealers, Mr Ricciardi said the enforcement division – which is focused on alleged wrongdoing in the securities markets – was 'stepping up [the focus] on hedge funds'. .. The SEC took similar steps in the wake of the collapse of Long Term Capital Management in 1998."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ruling Could Lead Fitzgerald To Dismiss Charges Against Libby. In a move that was seen as a victory for former Vice Presidential aide Lewis Libby in the CIA leak case, MSNBC (9/21, Seidman) reported on its web site, "The judge in the CIA leak case ruled Thursday that if Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald feels that admitting certain classified documents at the upcoming trial of I Lewis 'Scooter' Libby can jeopardize national security, Fitzgerald can then move to dismiss the perjury charges against Libby." MSNBC adds, "Fitzgerald argues that because of the sensitive national security value of the classified materials, a special three part test must apply before determining if a document can be admitted at trial." But "Walton disagreed with Fitzgerald and favored Libby's attorney's argument that in reviewing the classified material to be presented at the hearing, he must simply apply the Federal Rules of Evidence."

The New York Times/AP (9/22) reports US District Judge Reggie Walton "decided that he won't impose strict standards sought by prosecutors who want to limit the amount of classified information used in the trial of defendant I. Lewis Libby." Prosecutors "had proposed a stringent three-part legal test that would have allowed information to be considered for the trial only when its benefit to the defense outweighed the government's need to keep it secret." Walton "sided with Libby's lawyers, who said any evidence that's relevant to the case should be considered for use. Once Walton rules on which evidence is relevant, government attorneys can propose portions to be blacked out or summarized, the judge said."

US Uses Terror Case Limits In Probe Of Alleged Mob Plot To Kill Judge. The New York Times (9/22, Rashbaum) reports, "Alberto R. Gonzales, the United States attorney general, has imposed a set of highly restrictive rules generally reserved for terror suspects on an imprisoned mob figure who is under investigation for plotting to kill a federal judge, a prosecutor and three Mafia turncoats, prosecutors disclosed yesterday." The Times continues, "The move was the latest development in an increasingly bizarre case. The mob figure in the case, Vincent Basciano, has contended that a list he wrote naming the judge and the others was not part of a murder plot, as prosecutors have asserted, but an effort to use a mystical religion to improve his chances at his forthcoming trial, at which he could face the death penalty." The Times adds, "The disclosure that Mr. Gonzales had imposed the measures was made at a hearing in United States District Court in Brooklyn. The judge in the case, Nicholas G. Garaufis, who prosecutors have said was one of Mr. Basciano's targets, also unsealed a transcript from an Aug. 28 hearing at which the investigation and the list were discussed. … In July, Mr. Basciano provided the list to a fellow inmate at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Manhattan who, unknown to Mr. Basciano, was cooperating with the authorities. Prosecutors have said Mr. Basciano indicated to the inmate that he wanted the people on the list killed. … The transcript of the Aug. 28 hearing provided additional details about what Mr. Basciano, known as Vinny Gorgeous, has said was his effort to use Santeria, a Caribbean religion, to influence the outcome of the trial."

Allegations Of Santeria Rituals Surface. Long Island Newsday (9/22, DeStefano) reports, "Eager to seek an edge in his recent racketeering trial, reputed Bonanno crime family member Vincent Basciano was told by a fellow jail inmate to place a list with names of the prosecutor, trial judge and witnesses in his shoe and stomp his foot five times to get good luck. … The resulting list that Basciano drew up to carry out the ritual was simply part of a Santeria-related method and not a hit list as prosecutors have suspected, his defense attorneys said Thursday." Newsday continues, "Basciano, at one time the acting street boss of the Bonanno crime family, is under investigation for allegedly creating the list and in 'sum and substance' giving it to his fellow inmate to seek the murder of the listed persons, Brooklyn federal prosecutors have stated in court papers. … Named on the list were assistant U.S. attorney Greg Andres, who prosecuted Basciano earlier this year; federal judge Nicholas Garaufis; disgraced attorney Tom Lee; and mob turncoats Dominick Cicale and James Tartaglione, court papers stated. … But while prosecutors put a sinister spin on the list and Basciano's attempt to seek magical intervention, his lawyers say that wasn't the case at all. … During a court hearing Thursday and in interviews, Basciano's attorneys related how their client was seeking Santeria help and not seeking murders."

Basciano Attorneys Deny Allegations. The New York Law Journal (9/22, Perrotta) reports, "Attorneys for a former Mafia boss who might face the death penalty in an upcoming trial expressed dismay Wednesday at the unsealing of court documents that reveal their client, Vincent Basciano, is under investigation for a potential plot to kill a federal judge." The Journal continues, "The attorneys, James Kousouros and Ephraim Savitt, said they would ask for an evidentiary hearing into the alleged plot against Eastern District Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis, which Kousouros said did not exist. Kousouros said it was 'very unfortunate' that he was not notified by federal prosecutors that the document was going to be made public late Tuesday evening. … 'I'm not saying we were entitled to notice,' Kousouros said. 'We have to now consider motions for recusal. This now creates a mess.' … He said the unsealed papers could taint the jury pool, and might contribute to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' decision on whether the government will seek the death penalty."

FBI Searches Cook County Offices In Political Hiring Probe. The Chicago Tribune (9/22, Ciokajlo, Becker, Coen, 623K) reports, "FBI agents fanned out across Cook County on Thursday with grand jury subpoenas and a search warrant, probing deep into the role clout plays in county hiring. … The flurry of activity indicated that federal prosecutors are now taking a hard look at clout and hiring in Cook County, even as they are investigating state hiring by the Blagojevich administration and city hiring by the Daley administration." Cook County Board President Bobbie Steele said in a statement that "the subpoenas seek documents related to 'non-exempt' jobs," which "are supposed to be filled on the basis of qualifications, not political influence." The Tribune notes "sources familiar with the investigation" said that "the search warrant was issued specifically for the human resources bureau because that is an area where records are concentrated."

The Chicago Sun-Times (9/22, Pallasch, Korecki, Patterson, Herman) reports, "FBI agents could be seen carrying boxes of documents out of the Cook County Human Resources Department," and as "the seizure of documents proceeded downtown, federal agents served the search warrant at other county offices, too — including Provident Hospital, Cermak Hospital and the forest preserve district. … FBI spokesman Ross Rice said the search warrant is tied to a criminal affidavit that is under seal. 'We're looking for possible evidence of a crime,' Rice said. No arrests have been made and no charges filed, Rice said." WMAQ-TV (9/21, Rogers) noted that "agents may have accessed the office's computer servers, looking for information about hiring practices and possibly the testing of Cook County employees."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/22) reports, "FBI spokeswoman Cynthia Yates would not say what the investigation was about." Alderman Todd Stroger "said he believes the raid was connected to an activist's request that a federal monitor oversee county hiring to prevent abuses. Stroger's Republican opponent, Anthony Peraica, said the raid stemmed from a 'criminal conspiracy to deny the rights of well-qualified persons and applicants jobs that were instead given to the politically connected.'"

Former New Orleans Prosecutor Sentenced To Life In Prison In Rape Case. The AP (9/22) reports former New Orleans deputy city attorney Henry A. Dillon "was sentenced Thursday to life in prison for using his position to rape two women in his office. … 'He committed unspeakable acts of violence against innocent women while disguising himself as a public servant,' U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said in a news release. Dillon, 49, raped each woman after telling her in Municipal Court that he needed her to come to his office to complete some court business, according to the indictment. Dillon admitted having sex with both women, but said it was consensual," which US District Judge Lance Africk said to Dillon during the sentencing, "calls into question your grip on reality."

Wife Of Former Alabama Mayor Pleads Guilty To Obstructing Corruption Probe. The AP (9/22) reports, "Crystal McDonald Russo, wife of former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo, pleaded guilty in federal court Thursday to one felony obstruction of justice charge as part of a plea agreement with prosecutors. Prosecutors agreed to dismiss two other counts against her and recommend a sentence that will likely only get Crystal Russo probation." She "was facing trial next month for allegedly trying to help her…husband hide $96,000 that was sought for forfeiture by prosecutors in their probe of the former mayor."

Online Betting Probes In US Cloud Prospects For Industry. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Schatz) reports, "Two recent arrests of online-gambling executives in the U.S. are drawing attention to a spirited but so far unsuccessful effort in Washington to clarify the legal status of Internet gambling and resolve the political and legal issues of regulating it." The Journal continues, "Earlier this month, Peter Dicks, at the time nonexecutive chairman of Sportingbet PLC, Britain's largest publicly traded Internet-gambling company, was arrested in New York on a Louisiana warrant. That followed the July arrest of David Carruthers, then-chief executive of BetOnSports PLC on federal charges. The two cases aren't directly related but have combined to spook executives of foreign Internet-gambling companies, which are wary of entering the U.S." The Journal adds, "The developments underscore a fundamental problem for the Internet-gambling industry: U.S. lawmakers haven't agreed on whether the practice is legal. This summer the House passed legislation that would outlaw most forms of Internet gambling, including poker and casino-style games. But similar legislation is in limbo in the Senate, despite recent efforts by Majority Leader Bill Frist to attach the measure onto a must-pass defense-authorization bill this year. .. . Taming Internet gambling is difficult, however, given uncertainty about which rules apply to it. The Bush administration maintains that all interstate Internet gambling is illegal, but acknowledges that enforcement is sporadic. To shut down Internet sites, prosecutors rely mostly on the 45-year-old federal Wire Act, which prohibits sports betting across state lines, but was written with telephone, not Internet, lines in mind. … But not all judges agree that Internet gambling is already illegal, and Internet-gambling companies argue the Wire Act doesn't apply to the Internet." The Journal notes, "Some forms of gambling have largely avoided the U.S. government's focus. For example, the government has done nothing to stop Youbet.com, a publicly traded Internet company in Woodland Hills, Calif., that offers betting on horse racing. … Justice Department officials say they launched a civil probe into Internet-gambling operations, including horse betting, last year, but say they have limited resources."

US Charges WTC Painter With 9/11 Fund Fraud. Long Island Newsday (9/22, Maloney) reports, "A New Jersey painter was arrested Thursday on charges he bilked the U.S. Justice Department's Sept. 11 compensation fund of more than $1 million -- the biggest scam yet." Newsday continues, "Mario Mastellone, 39, of East Windsor was accused in an indictment in U.S. District Court in Manhattan of accepting $1.07 million from the September 11 Victim Compensation Fund of 2001 by falsely claiming that had been disabled that day and had not worked since. … His lawyer, Peter Bark of Central Islip, said his client had suffered disabling back injuries and has not worked since then, except for a recent job as an extra on a film set, which the Justice Department had approved. … 'He's been victimized twice -- once by him being in the World Trade Center on 9/11 and now by the U.S. Attorney's office,' Bark said." Newsday adds, "Prosecutors said Mastellone lied to a Department of Justice agent investigating his case and lied to a hearing officer evaluating his claim for compensation. According to the indictment, he also fraudulently sought compensation from the New York State Workers' Compensation Board and the Painting Industry Insurance Fund. … If convicted of fraud charges, Mastellone could face up to 40 years in prison."

Prosecutors Say Resentment, Debts Drove Dealer To Steal Rare Maps. The AP (9/22) reports, "A renowned dealer who admitted stealing nearly 100 rare antique maps acted out of resentment toward the prestigious libraries and to pay for his expensive tastes and mounting debts, prosecutors said Thursday" for the sentencing of E. Forbes Smiley III. "Prosecutors did not specify a sentence, but recommended he be given credit for his cooperation with the investigation that led to the recovery of most of the maps." The AP notes, "The British Library has raised suspicions that Smiley stole additional maps, a charge he has denied. Authorities defended their investigation" and "said inaccurate cataloguing by some libraries, wide public access to materials and other issues made it difficult to prove Smiley stole a particular map. 'Based on this review, the FBI has not identified other information suggesting that Smiley has a hidden cache of maps or is protecting some unidentified purchaser of his maps,' prosecutors wrote."

Credit Card Companies Pledge To Help Curb Child Pornography. The New York Times (9/22, Files) reports, "Executives from credit card companies, including Visa, MasterCard and American Express, told a Congressional panel Thursday that they were determined to eliminate the use of their services in the Internet child pornography business. … But they also said it was difficult to keep pace with those who seek to exploit children on the Web and called for broad collaboration among those in the financial services industry and law enforcement authorities around the world. … 'Child pornography is a global problem in need of a coordinated response,' said Mark MacCarthy, a senior vice president for public policy for Visa U.S.A." The Times adds, "Mr. MacCarthy said that by working together with other financial services companies, the industry could 'enhance our efforts to identify Web sites and pinpoint merchants that are trafficking in this illicit activity, cut them off from use of our network and provide assistance to law enforcement to put them in jail and shut them down for good. … The way forward lies in collective action,' he said." The Times notes, "Mr. MacCarthy and other executives testified at a hearing of the oversight and investigations subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The hearing was the sixth this year convened by the subcommittee to examine the growth of child pornography online. … Others who spoke to the committee included Ernie Allen, the president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, and Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, who led an investigation that in 2004 dismantled an Internet child pornography service stretching from Eastern Europe to Mount Laurel, N.J."

DeGette, Whitfield Working On Data Retention Bill. CNET News (9/22, Broache, McCullagh) reports, "A Democratic member of the U.S. House of Representatives said Thursday that she plans to introduce legislation next week that would force Internet providers to record customer information for one year." CNET continues, "Rep. Diana DeGette of Colorado said that she is working with Republicans Reps. Ed Whitfield, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce oversight and investigations subcommittee, and Joe Barton, chairman of the full committee, to finalize language mandating a controversial practice known as data retention. … 'Internet service providers across the board do retain this data for some period of time right now, so all were doing in this legislation is requiring a standard in the industry,' DeGette said at a morning hearing here on online child pornography, which was at least the sixth event dealing with online child exploitation in the House this year." CNET adds, "The data retention requirement is necessary because members of Congress have 'learned that Internet service providers and social networking sites have information that law enforcement needs when investigating pedophiles online, and that is the IP address on a particular date and time that will help identify those involved,' said Whitfield, a Kentucky Republican who is also heading a probe into Hewlett-Packard's boardroom scandal." CNET notes, "Privacy groups and industry groups have generally opposed mandatory data retention, with some companies such as Comcast voluntarily agreeing to retain user data for longer periods. Also, under an earlier proposal described by DeGette, the information would be available not only to police but to civil litigants as well, including divorce lawyers hoping to track someone down or employers embroiled in a lawsuit with a former employee. .. . Plans to enact the Bush administration's data retention proposal--reiterated this week by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales--have been brewing in Congress for months but have received increased attention as the November elections draw near."

US Probing Ela Medical Payments To Doctors. The New York Times (9/22, Meier) reports, "Ela Medical, a small producer of implantable heart devices, said this week that it had received a subpoena from federal health care fraud officials seeking information about possible inducements paid by the company to doctors using its products." The Times continues, "In response to an inquiry last week from a reporter, Ela Medical stated that it had received an administrative subpoena from the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services. The company is a division of the Sorin Group, which is based in Milan. … According to Ela Medical, the subpoena sought any documents related to 'arrangements, clinical studies, provision of monitoring equipment and services and other agreements by which the company may have provided benefits to persons in a position to recommend purchase of devices.'" The Times adds, "Federal law prohibits certain types of payments to doctors that are meant to influence their choice of a particular product. Ela Medical, which has previously said that it complied with all relevant laws, said in its statement that it was cooperating with the investigation. .. . Last year, the Justice Department started to investigate the country's biggest makers of heart devices — Medtronic, St. Jude and Guidant — to determine if they provided doctors with excessive payments to enroll patients in postmarketing studies of their devices as a way of increasing sales. All three companies have said they did nothing wrong."

Pediatrix Makes Final Payment In Settlement Of DOJ Billing Probe. The AP (9/22) reports, "Pediatrix Medical Group Inc. on Thursday said it paid the federal government $25.1 million as part of its final settlement with the Justice Department related to a probe into the company's billing practices." The AP continues, "The settlement ends a federal investigation into the company's Medicaid and Tricare practices related to neonatal services provided between January 1996 and December 1999. In addition, the pediatric services provider said it would reach separate state settlements for each state Medicaid program involved." The AP adds, "Information for the period 2000 to 2003 also was reviewed as part of the investigation, and Pediatrix is not making any payments for this period. … Pediatrix announced a tentative settlement in February and set aside reserves related to the investigation during periods through December 2005. The settlement will not affect the company's operating results this year."

Ex-IRS Mailroom Employees To Get Back Pay In Outsourcing Suit Settlement. The Washington Post (9/22, D4, Barr, 748K) "Federal Diary" column reports 10 former IRS mailroom employees "who lost their jobs because of outsourcing will receive about $4,000 each in back pay" as part of a settlement in a lawsuit brought by the National Treasury Employees Union.

Senators Urge DOJ To Appeal A Court Tobacco Ruling. At least two local newscasts covered the letter by 15 U.S. Senators urging attorney general Alberto Gonzales to appeal a district court's ruling that allows cigarette makers to avoid major financial penalties. WCIA-TV Champaign, (9/21, 12:11 p.m.) reported, "Durbin is among 15 senators who want the U.S. Attorney General to penalize tobacco companies. The lawmakers submitted a letter to Alberto Gonzalez asking him to appeal a district court's ruling, which limited penalties against tobacco companies who break the law. Durbin says nearly seven thousand state residents die from lung cancer each year."

WTWO-TV Terre Haute, (9/21, 05:00 p.m.) reported, "Illinois Senator Dick Durbin and 14 other senators want the U.S. Attorney General to go after tobacco companies. The lawmakers have written a letter to Alberto Gonzalez asking him to appeal a district court's ruling, which puts some limitations on penalizing tobacco companies that have broken the law."

DOJ To Review Appointment Of Alabama Commissioner. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (9/22, Murtaugh) reports, "Juan Chastang's future as a Mobile County commissioner is now in the hands of the U.S. Department of Justice, after the state decided not to appeal a federal court order handed down last month, a spokesman from the attorney general's office said." The Register continues, "The order, handed down by a panel of three federal judges Aug. 18, said Gov. Bob Riley had 90 days to get clearance from the Justice Department that the Chastang appointment complied with the Voting Rights Act of 1965." The Register adds, "If the Justice Department approves the appointment, nothing will change and Chastang, the commission's president, will continue to represent District 1. .. . But if the department finds that the appointment violated voters' rights, it could force Chastang out of office and call for a special election to fill the seat. … Suzanne Webb, a spokeswoman for the Alabama Attorney General's office, said Tuesday that the governor would not appeal the judges' decision to the U.S. Supreme Court and would instead ask for Justice Department clearance."

Rights Groups Seek DOJ Bias Probe Of San Francisco Chronicle, Job-Fair Firm. The San Francisco Chronicle (9/21, Page B - 2, Hua) reports, "The Chronicle and a firm that produces job fairs tried to bar noncitizens from an employment event in June, according to a complaint the ACLU and other civil rights groups filed Tuesday with the federal Justice Department." The Chronicle continues, "The Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights, the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California and the ACLU Immigrants' Rights Project allege that Expo Experts, a Cincinnati company that organizes job fairs in partnership with newspapers nationwide, discriminates against legal immigrants. … The complaint, filed in Washington, D.C., charges that the company illegally bars noncitizens from attending job fairs in violation of federal anti-discrimination laws and asks the Justice Department to impose civil penalties and issue a cease-and-desist order to stop the practice. The civil rights groups filed a companion complaint against The Chronicle, which co-sponsored the June fair with Expo." The Chronicle adds, "An advertisement before the event, published in the newspaper and on its affiliated Web site, SFGate.com, said job-seekers were required to have U.S. citizenship to enter a pavilion featuring engineering, technology and security clearance positions, the complaint alleges. A second pavilion featured professional jobs. … When the Lawyers' Committee and the ACLU objected to the restriction in the days before the event, Expo Experts and The Chronicle removed the discriminatory language from the online version of the advertisement and opened both pavilions to all job-seekers, according to the complaint."

9th Circuit Panel Upholds California County's Ban On Library Prayer Service. The San Francisco Chronicle (9/22, Page B - 3, Egelko) reports, "Contra Costa County did not intrude on religious freedom when it barred a church from holding prayer services in a meeting room of the Antioch library, a federal appeals court ruled Wednesday in a case that drew arguments from the Bush administration in support of the church." The Chronicle continues, "In a 2-1 decision, the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco said that the Faith Center Church Evangelistic Ministries had the right to hold religious discussions in a room that was open to other community groups, but that the county could prohibit it from conducting worship services. … 'The county has a legitimate interest in ... excluding meeting room activities that may interfere with the library's primary function as a sanctuary for reading, writing and quiet contemplation,' and in preventing the room from being 'transformed into an occasional house of worship,' Judge Richard Paez said in the majority opinion." The Chronicle adds, "He acknowledged that there may be little difference between prayer services and other types of meetings by religious groups in some cases, and said judges and government agencies are not competent to make such distinctions. But in this case, Paez said, Faith Center itself described its planned library gathering as one for 'praise and worship.' … Judge Richard Tallman stressed the same issue in his dissenting opinion. 'Separating religious worship from other religious speech inevitably leads to state entanglement in religion' and is beyond the government's authority, he said."

ANTITRUST:

Samsung Executive Pleads Guilty To Price-Fixing. The AP (9/22, Caterinicchia) reports, "An executive from Samsung Semiconductor Inc., the world's largest manufacturer of dynamic random access memory (DRAM) used in computers, has agreed to plead guilty and to serve jail time for participating in a global price-fixing conspiracy, the Justice Department said Thursday." The AP continues, "Thomas Quinn, senior vice president of memory sales and marketing at the U.S. subsidiary of Korean firm Samsung Electronics Co. Ltd., was charged with a felony for his alleged participation in an agreement to fix DRAM prices and to coordinate bids in an auction held by a buyer." The AP adds, "The scheme directly affected sales to U.S. computer makers Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., Compaq Computer Corp., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Computer Inc., Gateway Inc., and Sun Microsystems Inc., according to the Justice Department. There were about $7.7 billion in DRAM sales in the U.S. in 2004, according to the department. … Under the plea agreement, which must be approved by the court, Quinn will serve eight months in prison and to pay a criminal fine of $250,000. In addition, Quinn has agreed to assist the Justice Department in its ongoing investigation. … 'Prison time for price-fixers remains the most potent deterrent to illegal cartel activity,' Thomas O. Barnett, Assistant Attorney General in charge of Justice's Antitrust Division, said in a release."

The San Jose Business Journal (9/22) reports, "The Justice Department said Thomas Quinn is the fourth Samsung manager to plead guilty in connection with the probe. Quinn is expected to serve eight months in prison and pay a $250,000 fine under the plea deal, and investigators said that if he had been convicted at trial, he could have faced a larger fine and a prison sentence of up to three years. … Quinn conspired to fix the price of memory chips sold to computer makers around 2001 and 2002, investigators said."

AFP (9/22) reports, "Quinn is the fourth Samsung executive to agree to a prison sentence in the investigation. Three foreign-based Samsung executives, Sun Woo Lee, Young Woo Lee and Yeongho Kang, previously pleaded guilty and agreed to serve prison terms ranging from seven to eight months. … In additional, jail terms were agreed for Hynix Semiconductor executives Dae Soo Kim, Chae Kyun Chung, Kun Chul Suh and Choon Yub Choi; and Infineon executives T. Rudd Corwin, Peter Schaefer, Gunter Hefner and Heinrich Florian."

Texas Airfield Agreement Amended To Allay Antitrust Concerns. The Dallas Morning News (9/22, Reddy) reports, "Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said Thursday that new language addressing antitrust concerns in the Wright repeal bill has passed muster with a key detractor to the legislation." The News continues, "With newfound support from Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, legislation that would lift restrictions on long-haul flights at Dallas Love Field may be poised to move forward. .. . 'It's a major step forward, but it's not the end of the road,' Ms. Hutchison said." The News adds, "The Texas Republican initiated procedures Thursday to bring the revamped Wright bill to the Senate floor. … It could come up for a vote next week, though a packed schedule in the final days before a congressional recess may force the issue into a post-election session in November. … The new language removes a phrase that could have provided a blanket exemption from competition laws for the June agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport. … But the proposed amendment still offers potential legal cover to the North Texas compromise, by employing additional language sanctioning the deal."

NYSE, Euronext To Create Independent Entities After Merger. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Lucchetti) reports, "NYSE Group Inc. and Euronext NV will create separate U.S. and European entities to ensure that markets on each continent retain their independence if the stock-exchange operators complete their proposed merger." The Journal continues, "Euronext will have a Dutch foundation for its markets to prevent U.S. lawmakers from affecting the rules and requirements for listing stock in European countries. Likewise, NYSE will create a three-person Delaware trust to ensure that no laws are passed in Europe that will affect how U.S. companies are regulated. The structure was unveiled in a regulatory filing with Securities and Exchange Commission." The Journal adds, "The goal is to persuade everyone concerned that the planned deal won't encroach on securities laws on either side of the Atlantic. NYSE owns the New York Stock Exchange. Euronext owns stock markets in Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon as well as a major derivatives exchange in London. … The two entities will exist behind the scenes unless and until lawmakers or regulators pass rules that were viewed to affect the independence of regulators or companies in the other market. Essentially, they will only be able to react to laws or regulations rather than create strictures of their own." The Journal notes, "Europeans are concerned that Congress or the SEC might take the merger of the two companies as an opportunity to try to extend U.S. regulatory reach to Europe. Such a scenario is particularly frightening to European executives, who would prefer to avoid the strict accounting and governance rules that U.S. companies are subject to since the Sarbanes-Oxley law was passed in 2002. Both SEC officials and Euronext have stressed such U.S. rules won't apply in Europe."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Interior Official Says She Will Try To Recover Oil And Gas Royalties. The New York Times (9/22, Andrews, 1.21M) reports, "A top official at the Interior Department said on Thursday that she would not try to recover $1.3 billion in royalties that the government lost as a result of flawed oil and gas leases it signed in the late 1990's. 'That would be very hard to recoup,' said Johnnie M. Burton, director of the Minerals Management Service of the Interior Department, at a forum held by Platt's, an oil industry newsletter." She "added that she had little or no bargaining power -- and did not want any -- to force more than 50 companies to renegotiate offshore drilling leases that currently allow them to escape as much as $10 billion in royalty payments over the next decade." The Times notes, "Administration officials say that they are close to reaching agreement with Shell Oil and BP and that they have held talks with about 10 companies. But more than half of the companies that hold the flawed leases have not responded to the government's pleas." The Times reports, "Democrats reacted angrily to Ms. Burton's remarks, as well as to new allegations by a group of federal auditors who have charged that the Interior Department blocked them from recovering underpayments by more than two dozen companies."

Gap In Safety Standards Noted In E Coli Probe. The Washington Post (9/22, D1, Shin) reports, "It took exactly 14 days from the time state health officials in Wisconsin noticed five cases of E. coli O157:H7 in the same county until investigators arrived Wednesday at a field in California's Salinas Valley in search of the bacteria that ended up in bagged spinach and sickened 157 people in 23 states." The Post continues, "The outbreak -- the largest, in terms of victims, caused by fresh produce -- has exposed strengths and weaknesses in the highly fragmented U.S. food safety system. And the extent of it has federal officials talking about imposing tougher regulation. … 'There are good agricultural practices out there. . . . The question that will be addressed is: Are they adequate? Are they being followed? Does the industry need to be further regulated to be safe?' said David W. Acheson, a top Food and Drug Administration food safety official." The Post adds, "Even as public health officials have gotten better at identifying the onset of illness borne by raw fruits and vegetables, the rules and procedures to prevent those outbreaks remain weaker than those for meat and poultry, consumer advocates and food safety experts said. And their enforcement relies on the voluntary efforts of growers and processors, and on the FDA, which has responsibility for much of the food supply but nowhere near the authority or resources devoted to the monitoring of meat and poultry."

EPA Administration Rejects Staff's Recommendations On Soot Rules. The New York Times (9/22, Barringer, 1.21M) reports, "The Environmental Protection Agency's administrator on Thursday rejected the recommendations of his staff -- and an unusual public plea from independent science advisers -- choosing instead to tighten only one of two standards regulating the amount of lethal particles of soot in the air. The short-term daily standard, intended to control acute exposure to the minute particles, was cut nearly in half." But "the annual standard, which affects chronic exposure, remains at its original 1997 level." Stephen L. Johnson, "a career scientist at the agency and the third administrator appointed during President Bush's six years in office, said in a conference call on Thursday that the annual standard would remain at its current level while research continued. No change was made now, he said, "due to insufficient evidence" linking health problems to long-term exposure."

The Washington Post (9/22, A3, Eilperin, 748K) reports, "The agency did not go as far as its own scientists had urged in curbing soot, which is linked to heart and lung disease as well as childhood asthma." The decision "sparked complaints on both sides of the pollution debate, with public health experts saying it was inadequate and industry officials calling it too stringent."

Senate Expected To Confirm Parks Service Nominee. The AP (9/22, Jalonick) reports, "Mary A. Bomar, President Bush's nominee to head the National Park Service, appeared headed for a quick confirmation as senators praised the British native Thursday for her professionalism and history with the agency." Bomar "offered few opinions on current park service policy or the agency's budget problems at her Senate confirmation hearing." Bomar "said she would help the agency 'search for creative ways of working within our means.'" Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairman Pete Domenici and Sen. Craig Thomas, "the Republican chairman of the subcommittee on national parks, predicted that most senators will support her nomination."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Sentences BALCO Journalists For Contempt, Suspended Pending Appeal. The Contra Costa (CA) Times (9/22, Peele) reports, "A federal judge Thursday ordered two journalists jailed on contempt charges for as long as 18 months for refusing to reveal who leaked them secret grand jury testimony in the BALCO steroids case." The Times continues, "U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White immediately suspended his order pending the outcome of appeals to the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. He rejected the requests of San Francisco Chronicle investigative reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada that they be fined rather than jailed. … In a tense exchange, Fainaru-Wada told White he would not, under any circumstances, reveal the source. … 'Do you intend to honor the subpoena as issued to you?' White asked Fainaru-Wada after the reporter made an emotional statement before a crowded courtroom that journalism is a 'meaningful, honorable profession.' … 'No,' he answered. 'I will not comply.' … Williams told White that he meant 'no disrespect to you and the judicial system,' by defying the subpoena. 'I have a deeply held ethical and moral belief as a journalist and a man that I have to keep my word,' he told White. … But a justice department lawyer said the reporters' testimony was critical to its investigation of the leak. … 'Our job is to get information and get to the truth,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Douglas M. Miller. 'We want to indict the right people, not the wrong people. We have a right to prove our case.'"

The AP (9/22) reports two San Francisco Chronicle reporters "were ordered jailed Thursday for a maximum of 18 months, pending an appeal, for refusing to testify about who gave them secret grand jury testimony from Barry Bonds and other elite athletes. The reporters, Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada, wrote a series of articles and a book based partly on the leaked transcripts of the testimony of Bonds, Jason Giambi and others before a grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative…that was exposed two years ago as a steroid ring. … Both sides agreed to stay the ruling pending an appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit."

McClatchy Newspapers (9/21) reports U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White rejected requests from Williams and Fainaru-Wada that they be fined rather than jailed.

The San Francisco Chronicle (9/21) writes that in "refusing to testify, the reporters have claimed that the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press includes the right to keep promises of confidentiality to their sources. Lawyers for Hearst Corp., which owns The Chronicle, argued that reporters should be forced to disclose their sources only if the harm caused by the breach of grand jury secrecy outweighs the public benefit of the reporting -- a standard proposed in a journalists' 'shield law' now before the U.S. Senate."

Media Criticizes Handling Of Case. The Los Angeles Times (9/21) editorializes, "There is no room here for objections about how allowing reporters to protect their sources might interfere with the government's ability to keep the nation secure from attack in a time of war. The two Chronicle reporters are not withholding information about a security risk in the White House or the CIA. Nor is this argument about whether reporters deserve some kind of consideration others don't. They are acting on the public's behalf, and any rights they gain — or lose — also belong to the public."

In an editorial, the Denver Post (9/21) writes, "Federal authorities have been zealous in pursuing the reporters, but they haven't been so tough on themselves. After all, it was their own blunders that resulted in the release of information they meant to expurgate. The information, filed in an electronic court brief, summarized e-mail messages between BALCO President Victor Conte Jr. and Fainaru-Wada. The FBI obtained the e-mails when they searched Conte's home. … One might deduce that the feds already know what they want to know."

For ESPN.com (9/22), Wright Thompson writes, "These reporters were assigned a story, did it well and, in the process, sparked a national debate that did big things like teach kids about the danger of steroids and small things like help force a sport to clean up its act. In the end, those are the only relevant facts to me. They provided a public service, worked long hours, endured criticism and dead ends, pursuing the truth. Funny, isn't that what the government is supposed to do?"

At least five California newscasts reported that a federal judge sentenced two San Francisco Chronicle journalists to 18 months in prison, pending an appeal, for refusing to reveal their source in the BALCO steroids scandal. The reporting also focused on the reaction of other journalists, who viewed that the court's ruling could have an impact on their profession. Some examples: KSEE-TV Fresno, (9/21, 06:15 p.m.) reported, "Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters have been sentenced to 18 months in prison for refusing to say who leaked them secret grand jury testimony from Barry Bonds and other elite athletes during the BALCO investigation. But Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada won't have to report to prison until their case is heard by a Federal Appeals Court."

KGO-TV San Francisco, (9/21, 05:02 p.m.) reported, "Journalists say sending reporters to jail for refusing to reveal sources could have a chilling affect on other reporters. … 'I know the prosecution recommended 18 months in jail. That is a good chunk of somebody's life for this.'"

KNTV-TV San Francisco, (9/21, 06:01 p.m.) reported, "Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters in the BALCO steroid scandal have been sentenced to prison for refusing to reveal their sources. Both the government and the reporters agreed that Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada should be held in contempt of court but disagreed on the punishment."

NFL Commissioner, Union Discuss Drug Testing. The AP (9/22) reports NFL commissioner Roger Goodell "met Thursday with union chief Gene Upshaw and a group of other league and union officials on a range of issues, including the possibility of expanding testing for performance-enhancing drugs. NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said nothing definitive would come out of the session, one of the first formal meetings of its kind since Goodell took over three weeks ago from Paul Tagliabue."

The Washington Post (9/22, E5, Maske) writes that Goodell and Upshaw "discussed a variety of topics, including the league's drug policy. A league spokesman said no agreements were reached on that issue but that conversations would continue at some point. Goodell said in recent weeks that he had opened discussions with Upshaw about the possibility of strengthening the program, possibly by increasing the frequency of tests and adding substances to the banned list."

Former Chicago City Worker Pleads Guilty To Running Heroin Ring. The Chicago Tribune (9/21, Bush) reports a former hoisting engineer for the city's Department of Water Management "pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court Thursday to running a heroin distribution ring while working for the city. George Prado, 48, is cooperating with federal investigators in the case against his alleged supplier, Sandra Stewart, and in other ongoing drug investigations, authorities said. He admitted Thursday that he purchased large quantities of heroin that he distributed through a network of couriers and dealers, including fellow city employees Anthony Ritacco and Michael Hart."

Cocaine Seized, 13 Arrested In Massachusetts Drug Ring Investigation. The Boston Herald (9/21) reports federal authorities "seized 150 kilograms of cocaine and busted 13 people for running a sophisticated drug ring in Lynn, Revere and Dorchester. … A federal grand jury investigating the alleged ring handed down indictments against 13 people, according to June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in New England, and Sullivan. … The feds said the charges stem from a wiretapping investigation from May to August of this year of the alleged cocaine ring."

In Lynn, the Daily Item (9/22) reports 13 members of an alleged North Shore cocaine distribution network "were indicted in federal court Thursday following a wiretap investigation and a major drug seizure in Lynn. Federal agents from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) and other law enforcement organizations spent three months listening to and recording conversations among the suspects, culminating in the interception of three separate cocaine shipments, according to Samantha Martin of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Boston. … The largest - containing 123 kilograms of cocaine - was seized in a Lynn parking lot Aug. 14. … As a result of the sting, authorities seized approximately 150 kilograms, or more than 300 pounds of cocaine."

Texas Fugitive Arrested After Applying For Work On Las Vegas FBI Office. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/22) reports, "A man applying for work building a new Las Vegas FBI office was nabbed on a 22-year-old murder warrant after a background check found he was wanted in a double slaying in Texas." Jesus Garcia "was arrested Aug. 24 and returned to Harris County, Texas, to face charges in a Sept. 7, 1984, shooting that left two men dead and two other men wounded in a Houston-area lounge, said David Staretz, spokesman for the FBI office in Nevada. 'Even after 20 years, the law eventually will catch up with you,' Staretz said Thursday. Garcia voluntarily provided fingerprint samples when he applied for a construction job at a new southern Nevada FBI regional office, Staretz said. The prints matched those on file with a warrant in the slaying."

Judge In Rhode Island Nightclub Fire Case Chastises AG's Letter Leak. The New York Times (9/22) reports, "A Rhode Island Superior Court judge chastised the state's attorney general Thursday, saying his office had leaked to the press a letter telling relatives of 100 people killed in a nightclub fire that the club owners would plead no contest to involuntary manslaughter charges and that one would not face jail time." The Times continues, "The judge, Francis J. Darigan Jr., said the leak was 'unethical, reprehensible, devoid of any consideration for the victims of this tragedy and totally abrogated an agreement reached after weeks of discussion.' … Judge Darigan said the court mailed out its own letter to families Wednesday night explaining the terms of the plea agreement. He said he had intended for them to receive word of it before the news media." The Times adds, "The office of Attorney General Patrick C. Lynch had planned to send a separate letter telling families he objected to the deal, but his letter was faxed to a television station Wednesday night and was made public a short time later. … Mr. Lynch said in a statement that notifying all the families personally would have been an 'unprecedented challenge.' While many families would be 'deeply hurt' by the news of the plea arrangement, he said, most would have heard of it through the press anyway."

IMMIGRATION:

US Indicts 15 In Alleged Driver's License Plot For Immigrants. The AP (9/22, Brisendine) reports, "The operators of two trucking schools were charged with conspiracy and fraud for allegedly helping unqualified Somalian and Bosnian immigrants pass driving tests in order to obtain commercial driver's licenses, federal prosecutors said in an indictment unsealed Thursday." The AP continues, "The indictment, returned Wednesday by a grand jury in Springfield, Missouri, names 15 defendants who face charges including conspiracy and mail fraud, making a false writing and causing a false identification document to be produced. … It stems from an investigation dating to fall 2004 of testing practices at the South Central Career Center Truck Driving School in West Plains, Missouri, in which authorities found a suspiciously high percentage of students passing the driving tests. … 'The pass rate for the school was found to be 99 percent,' Col. Jim Keathley, superintendent of the Missouri State Highway Patrol, said. 'The average pass rate statewide is 83 percent.'" The AP adds, "The school's superintendent, Dean P. Proffitt, 71, was among those indicted, as was Ernest Arnel White, who ran a Kansas City-area school and would send students to Proffitt's school to take the driving exam. … Proffitt was placed on a leave of absence in February, and the school can no longer test for commercial driving licenses. … White, who allegedly provided test answers to students at his driving school in Kansas City, also is charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm."

House Passes Three Immigration Reform Bills. The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Havemann, 918K) reports, "With a majority of Democrats joining virtually all Republicans, the House today passed three bills designed to make it harder for foreigners to enter the United States illegally and to increase the penalties for those who do." The bills "had already cleared the House last July as part of a larger package of measures to control illegal immigration. The Senate passed its own version of immigration legislation that included a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for some foreigners in this country illegally." The Times adds, "The punitive House bill and the more lenient Senate approach were so different that the two chambers have not tried to forge a compromise. Instead, the House is passing part of its original bill piecemeal."

USA Today (9/22, 2.27M) says the bills "would impose prison sentences of up to 20 years for tunneling under the border, allow the Homeland Security Department to hold illegal immigrants detained for crimes or as threats to national security beyond six months, and empower state and local authorities to arrest illegal immigrants. It's unlikely this year that Congress will pass broader immigration changes favored by the Senate, so House GOP leaders said taking action to seal the border was a matter of urgency."

The AP (9/22, Abrams) notes the Senate in May "passed a broader bill, generally endorsed by President Bush, that included provisions for a guest worker program and ways for the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to work toward legal status and eventual citizenship. There's been no progress in efforts to reconcile the two bills." The Senate, meanwhile, "was debating legislation passed by the House last week that would approve construction of a 700-mile fence stretching across one-third of the U.S.-Mexico border. Democrats said Thursday's votes were an attempt to cover up the failure to pass more comprehensive immigration changes."

White House Says Bush Would Sign Border Fence Into Law. The Washington Times (9/22, Hurt, 88K) reports, "President Bush will sign the bill to construct 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border if it is approved by the Senate, the White House said, as Congress continued yesterday drafting more legislation to combat illegal immigration."

WPost Criticizes Failure To Move On Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The Washington Post (9/22, A16, 748K) editorializes, "The cynical immigration endgame of the 109th Congress isn't particularly surprising. But after a session in which the Senate actually managed to produce a bipartisan, comprehensive measure to overhaul the existing system, the latest, enforcement-only developments are nonetheless disappointing and dangerous." The Post continues that a border fence "would damage relations with Mexico, harm the environment and, especially in the absence of broader changes, be ineffective." And it is, "sadly, the least offensive of the measures under consideration." The voter ID requirement approved Wednesday in the House "would effectively disenfranchise many poor and elderly Americans, who are less likely to have, or be able to obtain, such documentation. … The Senate should not go along." The Post states, "The most disappointing aspect of the debate is the passive posture of President Bush," who "could have used his bully pulpit to make clear the importance of comprehensive reform."

Chertoff Says Secure Border Initiative To Be Handled With Caution. The New York Times (9/22, Lipton, 1.21M) reports "top Department of Homeland Security officials and Boeing executives" gathering in Washington Thursday to formally award the Secure Border Initiative Network (SBInet) contract "acknowledged that the first challenge was disproving skeptics. 'The common complaint about the government is there is a lot of lofty rhetoric, but the achievement always falls short,' Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said. 'We are very mindful of that. This is a very tall order. This is about a solution we believe is going to do the job.'" DHS Deputy Secretary Michael Jackson described the plan as "a radical change in business as usual at the border.'" However, the agency, "well aware of the decades of failed or incomplete border-security efforts," will start "small with a tiny section of the Arizona border, so it can quickly adjust if the strategy does not work."

Likewise, the Washington Post (9/22, D1, Witte, Hsu, 748K) leads its coverage of the story this morning by reporting that Secretary Chertoff said "the government learned its lessons from failed border-security initiatives and will move cautiously with its private-sector partner, Boeing Co., in the latest effort to use technology to curb illegal immigration." DHS "officials had been criticized by some immigration experts and lawmakers for indicating that the private sector would be given wide discretion in shaping a new system to secure 6,000 miles of land border. Previous attempts to do that have cost the government hundreds of millions of dollars but left little to show for it as equipment malfunctioned, agents were overwhelmed with false alarms and illegal immigration continued to climb."

Growers Lash Out At Congress Over Labor Shortage. The New York Times (9/22, Preston, 1.21M) reports, "Stepped-up border enforcement kept many illegal Mexican migrant workers out of California this year, farmers and labor contractors said, putting new strains on the state's shrinking seasonal farm labor force." The labor shortage, also reported in Washington and upstate New York has turned growers "from frustrated to furious with Congress, which has all but given up on passing legislation this year to create an agricultural guest-worker program. Last week, 300 growers representing every major agricultural state rallied on the front lawn of the Capitol carrying baskets of fruit to express their ire." The Times adds, "As they sum up this season's losses, estimated to be at least $10 million for California pear farmers alone, growers in the state mainly blame Republican lawmakers in Washington for stalling immigration legislation that would have addressed the shortage by authorizing a guest-worker program for agriculture. Many growers, a dependably Republican group, said they felt betrayed."

Study Finds Illegal Immigrants Supplanting American Workers. The New York Times (9/22, Preston, 1.21M) reports a study released yesterday by the Center for Immigration Studies found that in the five years after 2000, "foreign-born workers, including both legal and illegal immigrants, made up 86 percent of the net increase in the total number of employed workers, the highest share for immigrants ever recorded in this country. At the same time, the number of employed native workers ages 16 to 34 fell by more than 1.5 million. The study contends that 90 percent of the job deficit for young Americans would be erased if American teenagers and young adults held the jobs that immigrants now hold. … Last month a study by the Pew Hispanic Center, another Washington research organization, concluded that there was no nationwide pattern of displacement of American workers by immigrants."

TAX:

California Church Denies IRS Request For Documents. The New York Times (9/22, Strom) reports, "A California church under investigation by the Internal Revenue Service for possible violations of laws against political activities by churches has denied the agency's request for documents." The Times continues, "The decision forces the I.R.S. either to drop the case or to ask the Justice Department to take the church, All Saints Episcopal Church, in Pasadena, to court. The agency could also revoke the church's tax exemption, but legal experts said that was unlikely." The Times adds, "The church said it regarded an I.R.S. investigation of an antiwar sermon delivered by the church's former rector on the Sunday before the 2004 election as an attack on freedom of speech and religion. … 'We have nothing to hide, but there are principles here we think we need to uphold,' said Robert A. Long, the lay leader, or senior warden, of All Saints. … Mr. Long said the 26 members of the church's vestry, or governing body, had voted unanimously to decline to comply with two formal requests, called administrative summonses, for documents, testimony and other information that it received from the I.R.S. last Friday." The Times notes, "The church was making a point by requesting the summonses, which asked for documents ranging from copies of church policies and e-mail message to utility bills, as well as an interview with Rev. J. Edwin Bacon Jr., the rector. Mr. Bacon said the church asked for the formal process after receiving the second of two informal I.R.S. requests for information 'that was far more intrusive and that we thought were clearly aiming to invade our worship practices, which is clearly illegal.' … The request for formality is also a time-honored way of getting disputes with the I.R.S. into court, legal experts said."

The AP (9/22, Flaccus) reports, "An Episcopal church's decision Thursday not to cooperate with an IRS investigation into an anti-war sermon delivered before the 2004 presidential election sets up a high-profile confrontation between the liberal congregation and the IRS, which usually keeps such inquiries private. … The leaders of the 3,500-member All Saints Church voted unanimously to resist an order to turn over documents related to the sermon, which was given just two days before the election. The decision means the IRS must decide whether to ask the Justice Department to pursue the case in court. A judge would then rule on the validity of the agency's demands." The AP adds, "IRS spokesman Terry Lemon said he could not comment on the specific case and would not say whether the agency would request a court hearing. He instead issued a statement describing the procedure during such an investigation. … 'If the entity ultimately declines to answer the summons, the IRS can ask the Justice Department to pursue the case in court,' the statement read. … The dispute has attracted the attention of religious leaders on the right and left, who say the IRS' actions could make it more difficult for them to speak out on moral issues such as gay marriage and abortion during the midterm election campaign."

The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Sahagun) reports, "The All Saints case escalated a week ago when the IRS slapped the 80-year-old parish with a summons demanding that it turn over by Sept. 29 all materials, such as newsletters and sermons, produced during the 2004 election year with political references. Bacon was told to testify in person Oct. 11." The Times continues, "At stake, several religious leaders say, is freedom from government intimidation when churches address moral issues of the day from the pulpit. … In an interview, Richard Land, president of the Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, said, 'Churches should not endorse political candidates. But the IRS is seriously out of kilter and wrong-headed on this one; it's an appalling intrusion and it smacks of intimidation.' … Now, as the November election approaches, some churches worry that they may be the next targets of the IRS. This summer, the agency issued a statement warning nonprofits, including churches, that it was stepping up its efforts to crack down on illegal electioneering."

Local Television. Only a few newscasts reported on the Pasadena-based All Saints Episcopal Church's announcement that it refuses to submit documents to the IRS, and that it will, instead, take its battle with the federal agency before a court of law. The coverage also focused on the support from leaders of other faiths to the church. Some examples: KABC-TV Los Angeles, (9/21, 4:28 p.m.) reported, "The church was unanimous amongst their leaders. They're going to challenge this summons by the I.R.S. and this could affect their tax exempt status. They say it's an infringement on their rights and they want to put it back in the court of the I.R.S., which would more than likely mean a court of law. This sets up a high profile debate between the I.R.S. and the All Saints Episcopal Church."

KTVX-TV Salt Lake City, (9/21, 10:15 p.m.) reported, "A southern California church is standing up against the I.R.S., and refusing to turn over documents related to an anti-war sermon delivered a couple of years ago. … The church says the sermon did not favor any candidate, and the I.R.S. is infringing on the church's freedom of religion and freedom of speech. 'One of the great offenses in this I.R.S. attention has been to come into our worship practices and try to dictate how we worship.' …Now the church says it knows fighting the I.R.S. will be expensive. But they say leaders of Muslim, Jewish and other Christian churches are already calling their church and pledging money in support of the fight."

KABC-TV Los Angeles, (9/21, 6:02 p.m.) reported, "Church officials admit challenging the I.R.S. will be costly. Leaders of Muslim, Jewish and other churches … will donate money to help them pay for their legal crew."

KCAL-TV Los Angeles, (9/21, 4:30 p.m.) reported, "Church officials see this as a key test with nationwide implications. If they lose they will submit the document … to the I.R.S., but they don't expect to lose."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Judiciary Committee Hold Impeachment Hearing For 9th Circuit Judge. The Legal Times (9/22, Goldman) reports, "A House Judiciary subcommittee on Thursday held a rare impeachment hearing for a California federal judge but reached no conclusions and appeared eager to let a special committee of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals finish its investigation before deciding whether to take up the matter in Congress again." The Times continues, "Judge Manuel Real, a Lyndon Johnson appointee who in November will have been a federal judge for 40 years, spent Thursday morning rebutting -- for the first time in public -- allegations that he had improperly seized control of a bankruptcy proceeding involving a woman whose criminal probation he was overseeing. … 'I am here to tell you I categorically deny any misconduct on the bench,' said Real, 82, who was seated next to his wife, Elizabeth, and lawyer and longtime friend, Donald Smaltz, the former independent counsel who a decade earlier had headed the investigation into former Clinton Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy. 'I have never been sanctioned for any type of judicial misconduct.'" The Times adds, "Real has a reputation as a stern and autocratic jurist. 'There are a lot of people who dislike you,' said subcommittee member Chris Cannon, R-Utah. 'No,' responded Real, who spoke slowly but forcefully. 'I don't think there are many people; I think there are a few.'" The Times adds, "One of those, the man who first filed the original complaint more than 2 1/2 years ago, is Stephen Yagman, a Venice, Calif., attorney whom Real fined $250,000 in 1984 for his conduct in a defamation case Real was handling. The sanction was later reversed by the 9th Circuit, but, Real noted, Yagman has had a 'personal vendetta against me for over 20 years.' … Yagman, in fact, has no connection to the underlying bankruptcy case. But under the 1980 Judicial Conduct and Disability Act, anyone, whether he is connected to the underlying case or not, can file a complaint against a federal judge."

Snow Seen As Relishing News Reporting Role As Press Secretary. The Christian Science Monitor (9/22, Cook, 58K) reports on White House press secretary Tony Snow's appearance at a Monitor breakfast. It is "not clear whether reporters get more information from Snow. But the White House informational diet is clearly being served up now with greater verbal dexterity and humor." Snow says "that what he brings is a major change in attitude toward the press." Said Snow, "I don't come out of the political side where a lot of times you see people coming out of the political side and they will look at the press room and they will look at it as a den of vipers, a seething hostile mass. What I see is a lot of people trying to get information so they can write a story...I think the change in the point of view makes all the difference in the world." The Monitor adds Snow "relishes the reporting aspect of his current position," But "getting ready to answer reporters' questions at two formal sessions a day involves intense preparation. There are days when Snow, a self-described "night person" gets up at 3:45 a.m. to prepare."

The White House Bulletin/US News (9/21) reported, "Opening the door on White House habits," Snow "told reporters that there is a regular feature dubbed 'policy time' in the West Wing when top aides and the President shoot the breeze on key issues leading to a presidential decision. 'I certainly put my two-cents worth in,' he told reporters at a newsmaker breakfast hosted by the Christian Science Monitor." The Bulletin adds Snow's description of an open idea mill counters the mainstream media view that only a chosen few make policy decisions, a claim White House officials have tried to fight for years. In fact, when Snow negotiated to leave Fox Radio for the White House, he won assurances that he would have access to policy discussions. But it turned out not to be an issue since he was made a policy maker on his first day. 'I was pushing against an open door,' he said."

The Washington Times (9/22, Curl, 88K) reports Snow "took over as President Bush's communications point man four months ago, beefing up the press office staff, honing internal operations and deploying a quick-response strategy." Now, polls "show, the president's approval rating has jumped to its highest level since January. Could Mr. Snow be responsible for the surge?" Snow said, "We're just busy going out and trying to be as aggressive as we can in getting the message out. Part of the challenge is to explain what we are doing and why. ... Sometimes you have to let people know very clearly what the policy is and that is one of our key aims." The Times adds the operation "has changed dramatically in recent months after crucial missteps, including last year's dead-on-arrival nomination of White House counsel Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court and this year's fiasco over the proposal to allow a company based in the United Arab Emirates to manage U.S. port operations." Snow has "learned to use the skills he picked up in his 28 years in journalism." Snow said, "The press secretary's job is a reporting job." He added that "even with an office right down the hall from the president, he spends a lot of his day calling others in the administration, asking, 'What's going on here?'"

Jackson Said To Have Urged Favoritism In Awarding HUD Contracts. The Washington Post (9/21, A15, Williamson, 748K), under the headline "Probe Finds Jackson Urged Favoritism in HUD Contracts," reports that "an inspector general's report charges that top US housing official Alphonso Jackson urged staff members to favor friends of President Bush when awarding Department of Housing and Urban Development contracts. But investigators so far have found no direct proof that Jackson's staff obeyed." His chief of staff told investigators that Jackson "personally intervened with contractors whom he did not like...these contractors had Democratic political affiliations," says the report, a copy of which was made available to The Washington Post.

The New York Times (9/22, Stout, 1.21M) titles its report "HUD Chief's Remarks Aside, Study Finds No Favoritism," and says Aronetta Baylor, "now an assistant deputy secretary and formerly the department's chief procurement officer, told investigators under oath that Mr. Jackson had once said, in the report's exact words, 'You know, if we weren't here, if the president hadn't appointed us, they wouldn't be (expletive) getting these contracts.' 'And he said that makes him mad that they don't realize that,' Ms. Baylor testified." Baylor's account "is in a 340-page report drawn up by Anthony G. Medici, special agent in charge of the inspector general's criminal investigations division. The report, dated Sept. 18, has not been made public." The Times adds, "It is illegal under federal procurement law to reward or punish contractors on the basis of their political views."

Khalilzad Return To Washington Sparks Rumors Of Promotion. The Washington Post (9/22, Kamen, 748K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that Zalmay Khalilzad, "the US ambassador to Iraq, is back in town for a bit -- and that has sparked chatter that maybe he'll be named deputy secretary of state, maybe with a specific portfolio of Iraq and Afghanistan." The chatter is "likely idle, generated by the fact that the post has been vacant since Robert Zoellick 's departure almost three months ago and that many names have been floated as his replacement. One big concern would be pulling Khalilzad out of Iraq, but there is some thinking in Baghdad that he may have done as much there as he can do."

House Ethics Panel Clears Lewis Aide's $2 Million Severance Pay. The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Hamburger, 918K) reports the House Ethics Committee "cleared a longtime aide to House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis of any breach of rules for accepting a nearly $2-million payout from his former lobbying firm." The aide, Jeffrey Shockey, "received $1.96 million in severance payments when he left Washington-based Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White to return to work for Lewis (R-Redlands) as deputy staff director of the Appropriations Committee. Federal investigators are examining the relations between the firm, which specialized in appropriations matters, and Lewis." Ethics Committee staffers were "specifically reviewing whether Shockey's 2005 payout from Copeland Lowery might have broken rules that prohibit congressional staff from receiving income earned after becoming federal employees. But Shockey showed the committee documents revealing that his compensation was based on work completed before he returned to Capitol Hill." Reps. Howard Berman and Doc Hastings said, "It appears that the terms of your buyout agreement are consistent with applicable laws and House rules."

Senate Panel Not Scheduling Vote On Bolton Nomination. The Washington Post (9/22, Kamen, 748K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee calendar "has a business meeting scheduled for Tuesday, with votes to be taken on two nominations -- but nothing is scheduled for U.N. Ambassador John Bolton. His recess appointment ends no later than Jan. 3 unless he gets confirmed, but it appears that Sen. Lincoln 'Roadblock' Chafee (R-R.I.) hasn't budged -- yet."

Recent Bush Interviews Cast Light On His "Mind-Set And Personal Life." A Washington Post (9/22, A15, Goldfarb, 748K) "Verbatim" item says the series of interviews President Bush gave "surrounding the anniversaries of Hurricane Katrina and the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks…offered a window into the president's mind-set and personal life," as he discussed "his frustrations" on CBS, the times "when he is overwhelmed with emotion" on ABC, and "his reading habits" and "his relationship with his father" on NBC.

Commerce Department Has Lost 1,100 Laptops. USA Today (9/22, Welch, 2.27M) reports, "The Commerce Department said Thursday that 1,100 of its laptops have been lost or stolen, including some that contain personal information collected by the Census Bureau." Department officials said that "the potential loss of personal data was limited, however, and that it is unaware of any data being improperly used." Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said in a statement, "The amount of missing computers is high, but fortunately, the vulnerability for data misuse is low. … While we know of no instances of personal information being improperly used, we regret each instance of lost material."

The Washington Post (9/22, A3, Sipress, 748K) reports, "This disclosure by the department came in response to a request by the House Committee on Government Reform, which this summer asked 17 federal departments to detail any loss of computers holding sensitive personal information. Of the 10 departments that have responded, the losses at Commerce are 'by far the most egregious,' said David Marin, staff director for the committee. He added that the silence of the remaining seven departments could reflect their reluctance to reveal problems of similar magnitude." In "a private briefing yesterday for three members of Congress," Gutierrez "estimated that the disappearance of laptops from the Census Bureau could have compromised the personal information of about 6,200 households, Marin said. He said the department was still trying to determine the extent of the problem." The AP (9/22) notes "a half-dozen other federal agencies or departments have reported data thefts and security breaches involving personal information in the last six months."

Capitol Police Admit Intruder Was Not Stopped By Its Officers. The Washington Post (9/22, B1, Sheridan, 748K) reports the US Capitol Police, "contradicting earlier reports," said Carlos Greene, the armed man "who raced into the U.S. Capitol this week," was stopped "by employees of the Flag Office -- not by Capitol Police officers. The episode exposed gaps in security of the Capitol building and grounds, and legislators are expected to meet Tuesday to grill U.S. Capitol Police about what went wrong."

Brownback Bill Would Increase Funds For DC Savings Program. The Washington Times (9/22, Doolittle, 88K) reports the chairman "of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee on the District said yesterday that he will add $4 million to the D.C. budget next year to help married or engaged couples buy a home, get job training or start a business." Sen. Sam Brownback said, "We need more family formation in the District ... We need more children raised in two-parent homes. This initiative will help with doing that ... It will expand job-training funding for those who get married; there's also funding in there for mentoring and counseling couples." The Times adds Brownback's "proposal would add $1 million to a matched-savings program approved by the Senate last year." Under the program, "the federal government contributes $3 for every $1 a D.C. couple invests and allows a maximum lifetime payment of $9,000. Couples must withdraw the money and be married within three years of entering the program." The new proposal "would provide more funds for job training and mentoring. Last year's version was the first of its kind in the country."

CDC Recommends Routine HIV Tests For All Adults And Teens. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention recommended Thursday that all adults and adolescents should be tested for HIV regularly. The prominence and amount of coverage of the recommendation varies. While all three broadcast networks carried the story, NBC gave it nearly three minutes, while the combined coverage on ABC and CBS barely topped 30 seconds. The New York Times and Washington Post put it on the front page.

NBC Nightly News (9/21, story 2, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) said the "strong new recommendation" from the CDC says "an AIDS test should be a routine part of a doctor's visit for every American starting at age 13." NBC's Bazell talked with the health commissioners of New York City and Washington, D.C., and an HIV-positive man, about the call. ABC World News (9/21, story 5, 0:20, Gibson) said the CDC "estimates that more than 250,000 people have the virus and don't know it," a number also cited by the CBS Evening News (9/21, story 4, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M).

The Washington Post (9/22, Brown, 748K) says patients "would no longer have to sign a consent form and get extensive pre-test counseling. But they would have to be told they were being tested for the AIDS virus, asked if they have any questions and given the opportunity to 'opt out.'" The Post says the policy "is a huge change from an era when stigma and fatalism led to a unique and -- in the opinion of some practitioners, onerous -- set of procedures for HIV testing."

Likewise, the New York Times (9/22, McNeil, 1.21M) calls the recommendation a "major shift of policy" and a "sharp break from the early days of the AIDS epidemic, when the stigma of the disease and the fear of social ostracism caused many people to avoid being tested." USA Today (9/22, 2A, Sternberg, 2.27M) says the CDC recommendations "are not legally binding, but they are designed to make HIV testing as routine as tests for high blood pressure, cholesterol and diabetes."

Report Recommends Changes To Medicare System. The AP (9/22) reports that a new report prepared by the Institute of Medicine says that "quality not quantity should be the federal government's guide in setting payments to doctors, hospitals and other health care providers." The institute "said Congress should cut the base payments that Medicare makes to hospitals, nursing homes, insurers and doctors, and should use the savings to create pools that reward providers when they do work that has been proved effective in improving a patient's health." The change would "help ensure that what is paid for will be more beneficial to patients." The recommendations "did not please many health care providers."

Democrats Debate Medicare "Doughnut Hole" Costs. The AP (9/21, Freking) reported, "Filling the doughnut hole in Medicare drug plans would cost older people and the disabled about $40 a month more. Democratic lawmakers estimated the additional cost and said Thursday that is a major reason why 88 percent of the Medicare beneficiaries signing up for drug plans opted for a coverage gap." Democrats "designated Friday as 'doughnut hole day,' when the coverage gap would hit the average older person who is taking several medications." Meanwhile, the Bush administration "estimates that about 3 million Medicare beneficiaries will hit the doughnut hole, fewer than the 7 million often cited by critics. Mark McClellan, the administration's pointman on Medicare, says the 7 million figure is outdated."

Insurers Begin To "Privatize" Medicare. The New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) reports, "For years, private insurers have offered alternatives to the federal Medicare program that are meant to give patients lower-cost options than the government coverage provides. More than 7 million people now subscribe to such plans, out of a total Medicare population of 42.5 million." But "suddenly a type of private insurance plan is gaining ground that looks very similar to the basic coverage long available to anyone with a federally issued Medicare card. And the government is paying the private insurance industry a subsidy of 11 percent per patient, on average, to provide it." Critics "see the trend as further evidence that the government is paying private industry to take Medicare off its hands."

Pentagon May Seek More Time On New Labor-Management Relations System. The Washington Post (9/22, D4, Barr, 748K) "Federal Diary" column Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England "has put a Senate oversight committee on notice that the Pentagon may come to Congress next year for additional time to establish a new labor-management relations system." The Pentagon "faces a 2009 deadline for implementing new labor rules, but progress has been slowed by litigation and other factors."

Paulson Says Bush Open To Compromise On GSE Bill. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Phillips, Price, 2.03M) reports, "US Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson on Thursday said the Bush administration had clearly communicated a willingness to compromise with members of Congress at odds over legislation to establish a new regulator for the housing finance companies Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac." Paulson said in an interview with the Journal, "They're not waiting for me, or for the administration because we've indicated a willingness to work something out. … So the key question is whether people can get together on both sides of the aisle and get together in the House."

WSJournal Chides DeMint, Vitter Over Holds On FDA Nomination. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (9/22, A10, 2.03M) criticizes holds placed on Andrew von Eschenbach's nomination to head the FDA by Sens. Jim

DeMint (over the RU-486 abortion pill) and David Vitter (over drug reimportation), saying that the FDA "badly needs a host of reforms" and that President Bush "has nominated one of the best available men to do that job." The Journal reminds readers that it last month criticized Democratic Sens. Hillary Clinton and Patty Murray over their blocking of the nomination, and says if DeMint and Vitter "won't be reasonable, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and others should call them on the deadly consequences of further delay."

NYTimes Praises Atlantis Crew, Urges NASA Focus On Hubble. The New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) editorializes, "We've never been great fans of the International Space Station, an enormously costly project that will yield such limited scientific and economic benefits that it seems destined to be considered a white elephant. Nevertheless, we had to marvel at the magnificent performance of the crew of the shuttle Atlantis, which ended an arduous 12-day mission to the station with a flawless landing yesterday." The Times also calls for upgrades for the Hubble Space Telescope, saying it "seems more important to service the Hubble than to finish a station whose main value will be the act of finishing it."

Bush Touts Economy, Tells Florida Audience Democrats Would Raise Taxes. The St. Petersburg Times (9/22, Stein, Smith) reports, "President Bush made a two-city swing through Florida on Thursday, raising money and the spirits of two Republican candidates. Across the country, Republican candidates have been distancing themselves from Bush before the upcoming midterm elections as the president's approval ratings have sagged while voters have grown dissatisfied with his handling of Iraq and the economy." But "on Thursday, there was no distance between Bush and Charlie Crist, the GOP candidate for governor, or Gus Bilirakis, who is running for Congress, as Bush zeroed in on tax policy, typically a point of strength for Republicans." The Tampa Tribune (9/22, March) says that while Bush "boosted those two candidates," he "was cool to his party's nominee for the US Senate, Katherine Harris, giving her a short-shrift handshake along the rope line at the Tampa event and no ride on Air Force One." However, says Miami Herald (9/22, Klas, 310K), Harris was in the audience in Tampa. Asked whether "this would end her criticism of the 'Republican elite,' Harris said, "I will never be one of the beltway boys."

National newspapers focus on Bush's tax message. The New York Times (9/22, Rutenberg, 1.21M) reports from Orlando that Bush "began a blistering new political offensive on Thursday, asserting that if Democrats won control of Congress from Republicans it would mean higher taxes, less money in the pockets of working families and damage to the economy." The speech by Bush here," in which he belittled Democrats as "'he party of high taxes,' signaled what Republicans described as a new phase of the White House's fall campaign, as Republicans begin to combine their emphasis on national security with a tough new emphasis on the issue that unites them more than any other, taxes." Bush's offensive "was backed up by a flood of television advertisements on behalf of Republican candidates."

The Washington Post (9/22, Abramowitz, 748K) reports Bush "zeroed in on comments this week by Rep. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), who would take over the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee if the Democrats win back the majority. Rangel told Bloomberg News that he 'cannot think of one' of Bush's first-term tax cuts that merits renewal." Bush told a crowd in Tampa, "That's one way of saying they're going to raise your taxes, because, you see, if you don't extend the tax cuts, your taxes go up." The Post also reports, "The reference to Rangel -- though not by name -- came with ironic timing. It was the same day that the veteran congressman called a news conference in Washington to defend the president against the attacks this week by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez at the United Nations and at a Harlem church. Those attacks, as well as jibes from the Iranian president, seem to have energized Bush's political base."

The AP (9/22, Loven) reports that Bush, "politicking at full campaign speed, contended Thursday that a vote for Democrats this fall would be a vote to siphon money out of American families' budgets. It was Bush the Politician, unleashed, seven weeks before the midterm congressional elections."

The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Gerstenzang, 918K) also reports on Bush's "tough attack Thursday on the Democratic Party's policy on taxes," and adds Democrats "responded by criticizing Bush for adding to the national debt. 'The deficit the president has run up has essentially put a $28,000 tax on every newborn, and that's not to mention the $1 billion a week we're spending in Iraq,' said Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who leads the Democratic effort to win more House seats." Bush "spoke in Tampa at a fundraiser for Gus Bilirakis, a Republican, who is seeking the seat his father, Michael Bilirakis, has held in the House."

The Washington Times (9/22, Dinan, 88K) says Bush "has dominated press coverage in the past few weeks with his push on terrorism, and his tax message yesterday was overshadowed by the deal his administration reached with key senators to approve a CIA interrogation program."

McClatchy (9/22, Gibson), meanwhile, focuses on Bush's references to the war on terror, reporting that "hoping to regain his political stature…Bush has hit the campaign trail to sound warnings about terrorism while boosting Republican candidates in this year's elections." In Florida, the President said, "The best way to protect the United States is to stay on the offense and bring the enemy to justice before they come here and hurt us in America." McClatchy adds, "In political terms, Bush and fellow Republicans are playing the security card, the one that sent the president's public-approval ratings to a record high in 2001 and helped the party consolidate control of the White House and Congress in the next two elections."

Eight-Year-Old Gets Award From Bush. The Bradenton Herald (9/22, Marquez, 52K) reports, "A Valrico 8 year old shook hands with the president today, received a citizenship award and then invited him to a party for young victims of a hurricane." Zach Bonner told The Herald on the tarmac at Tampa International Airport that Bush "politely declined to attend the Christmas party for Katrina victims in Louisiana in December, but said he would 'send something.'"

The St. Petersburg Times (9/22, Stein) reports Bonner, "who had been practicing his handshake, felt nervous as the commander-in-chief walked over. 'It went so fast,' he recalled. 'He said congratulations, and he was proud of me.'" Two years ago, "he heard that the victims of Hurricane Charley needed water. Zach asked his mother if he could give some. Then his neighbors. Twenty-seven pickup truckloads later, he was still helping others." Zach "has his own nonprofit, the Little Red Wagon Foundation Inc., complete with a Web site at www.littleredwagonfoundation.com."

Bush Visits Buccaneers. The AP (9/22, Goodall) reports from Tampa, "It seems like everyone has some advice these days for the winless Tampa Bay Buccaneers and struggling quarterback Chris Simms. Even…Bush tossed the football with the former University of Texas quarterback Thursday, and offered some advice." Said Bush, "Never give up." Bush "accepted an invitation to stop by practice and was greeted on the field by Simms and teammates Derrick Brooks, Ronde Barber and Mike Alstott and Ryan Nece, as well as an appreciative Gruden."

Mehlman Says Midterms To Focus On Terror; Dean Sees Economy As Defining Issue. RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M), "Last month's narrowly averted plot to blow up airliners bound for the U.S. from Great Britain is a stark reminder that we are engaged in an extraordinary and dangerous global war. In 46 days, the American people will make an important decision about how we prosecute that war: Do we stay on the offense and use every tool available to defeat the enemy, or do we elect leaders who would weaken America and surrender key tools we need to defeat the global jihad?" Mehlman adds that "there can be no doubt about the national and international import of the choice we all face as Americans. We face war and a changing global economy, and Republicans have very different strategies for victory than the Democrats. I believe the American people understand the choice of 2006, which is why I am confident that in 46 days Republicans will make history and maintain our majorities in Congress."

Meanwhile, DNC Chairman Howard Dean writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M), "We need a Democratic Congress to fight the war on terror -- and to end the war on America's families. Republican policies of the last five years have damaged our economy and failed Americans." Democrats "believe strengthening the middle class is essential for a thriving economy that rewards work, provides economic opportunity to all and makes it easier for parents to devote time to their families. An economy that favors the top 1% at the expense of everyone else might be good for President Bush's politics, but a shrinking middle class is bad for capitalism, democracy and America. We need a new direction." Dean also writes, "The Republican record on managing the federal budget is dismal. Republicans have turned surplus into debt, hope into lost opportunity; they have become the party of borrow-and-spend." Democrats "are ready to lead with a thoughtful, fiscally responsible long-term vision."

E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (9/22, A17, 748K), "The maneuvering this month for November's midterm elections is primarily about shaping the priorities that voters will carry with them to their polling places. Behind the speeches and the ads is a subtle war for position, an effort to prepare the ground for the campaign's final weeks. The obvious battle is over whether voters on Nov. 7 will be thinking more about the violence in Iraq, which pushes them the Democrats' way, or about the broader war on terrorism." Dionne adds, "In this skirmish, Republicans can chalk up modest but real gains. The Pew Research Center found that the proportion of voters who listed terrorism as the most important problem facing the country increased from 5 percent in May to 15 percent this month. Significantly, the share of independents who listed terrorism as the key issue rose from 5 percent to 13 percent." But "the question that has received far less attention in Washington is the one joined by Klobuchar and Brown: How will voters see the economy? … The GOP is still in trouble on the economy." Dionne concludes, "The paradox is that the survival chances of a Republican Party led by a former oilman from Texas will depend in large part on whether gas prices keep falling."

Poll Finds Americans More Upbeat On Economy, Crediting Bush. The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Hennessy-Fiske, 918K) reports, "Americans have become more optimistic about the economy and they are giving President Bush some of the credit, a new Times/Bloomberg poll shows. Republicans running for election next month could benefit from the development, as voters say the economy will influence their choices in November more than any other national issue, including the war in Iraq and terrorism." Consumer confidence "fell this summer as gas prices peaked and the housing market weakened, particularly in California. Those polled in July were almost evenly split on the state of the economy, with 49% saying the economy was doing badly. Now, the optimists outnumber the pessimists in the poll by 10 percentage points, with 54% saying the economy is doing well." The Times adds, "Seven weeks before the midterm elections, the economy remains voters' primary focus. Among registered voters, 32% listed the economy and jobs as the most important election issue, followed by the war in Iraq (21%), immigration (17%) and healthcare (10%)." Those "polled cited a variety of reasons for feeling better about the economy, including unemployment at a low 4.7% nationally, lower gas prices this month and an interest rate freeze by the Federal Reserve. That could be good news for Republican candidates, as the GOP is the party in power in Washington and may be able to take some credit for the economy."

House GOP Leaders Agrees To Ease Restrictions On Drug Reimportation. The AP (9/22, Jordan) reports, "House Republicans tentatively agreed Thursday to prohibit Customs agents from seizing prescription drugs that Americans buy in Canada and bring back into the United States." The deal "would let Americans carry up to a 90-day supply of medication back to the US from Canada without being stopped by Customs agents, House and Senate Republicans said. But it would not let Americans purchase cheaper prescriptions over the Internet or by mail-order, officials said."

Wal-Mart's New Pricing Strategy To Shakeup Drug Industry. ABC World News (9/21, story 6, 0:15, Gibson) reported, "Wal-Mart said it will begin selling generic prescription drugs at cut-rate prices. A move that could force rival pharmacies to do the same, making healthcare more affordable for many Americans. Wal-Mart is going to sell 300 generics for as low as $4 for a one-month supply."

CBS Evening News (9/21, story 2, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Big sales are usually found on the inside pages of the newspaper, but you can look for this one on the front page tomorrow because it's bound to make some headlines." CBS (Anthony Mason) added, "Launching a fierce price war, Wal-Mart has slashed drug costs, first just in its Tampa-area stores, but next year across the country." Bill Simon, Wal-Mart: "This is a kick-off of a program that will roll into Florida and as many places in the country as we can." Mason: "So who is unhappy? Wal-Mart's competitors for one, the national drugstore chains, and all of their stocks, Katie, dropped sharply today."

NBC Nightly News (9/21, lead story, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This offer again covers hundreds of drugs and Wal-Mart is big enough to change the game in the expensive prescription business across this country. We begin here tonight with NBC's Tom Costello." NBC (Costello) added, "Wal-Mart's move to slash prices on generic drugs created a stir in the pharmacy line. … But consumer advocates today had mixed reactions." David Certner, AARP: "Any time we can move people to lower priced generic drugs people are going to see savings. The biggest problem is still with brand name drugs that are rising in prices."

USA Today (9/22, A1, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "Wal-Mart Stores' move to offer some generic drugs for $4 a prescription could save modest amounts for some consumers. It may also draw more customers to its stores or prompt a price war with other pharmacies." Wal-Mart "said

Thursday that it will offer the $4 price on about 150 generic drugs to the insured and uninsured alike, starting immediately" with 65 stores "in the Tampa area. It will take the program statewide by January." Bill Simon, Wal-Mart's executive vice president of the Professional Services Division, noted, 'We intend to take it nationwide next year."

The Wall Street Journal (9/22, B1, McWilliams, Martinez, 2.03M) reports, "Wal-Mart Stores Inc., long attacked by some critics for its employee health-care benefits, waded into the nation's health-care debate and its rivals' pharmacy businesses by promising to cut the price of some of its generic drugs." The savings "on some drugs will be considerable compared to rival pharmacies." Wal-Mart's "move drew praise from doctors and health-care experts but mostly shrugs from rivals who dismissed it as a publicity move." Wal-Mart "cast the change as a boost to the nation's uninsured and a savings even for those with health insurance."

The Washington Post (9/22, A1, Day, 748K) reports, "Health-care industry analysts said the program has the potential to transform the $230 billion prescription-drug business the way Wal-Mart has transformed other industries…where its aggressive pricing has forced some competitors out of business and allowed it to dominate entire categories of merchandise." Meanwhile, Mark McClellan, administrator of the CMS, "said he did not think the Wal-Mart offer would siphon beneficiaries from the Medicare drug benefit, known as Part D." He noted, "Remember that the drug plans in Medicare already provide excellent coverage for generics. … Many of the plans have generics for a dollar or two, or even free." But, "what the Wal-Mart plan does provide, he said, is a way for Medicare recipients to save more money after they reach the 'doughnut hole.'"

The Washington Times (9/22, Lopes, 88K) notes that perhaps the greatest impact will be felt by "independent pharmacies" since they are "not able to afford reducing the cost of drugs." Critics "pounced on Wal-Mart, claiming the world's largest retailer will use the low-priced drugs to entice shoppers to buy other Wal-Mart products, a business tactic known as 'loss leading.' But Wal-Mart spokesman David Tovar dismissed that claim." Mr. Tovar said, "This program is not a loss leader for us. … It will be a profit creator for us." Nonetheless, "the drugs included in the program are widely prescribed and, for the most part, not expensive."

The New York Times (9/22, Barbaro, Abelson, 1.21M) reports the plan "could make scores of treatments affordable to the uninsured, reduce the burden on Medicaid and bring competitive pricing to the pharmacy industry." But "a close examination of the program…suggests that its impact could be blunted by several factors." Health care analysts "were quick to point out that Wal-Mart has carefully chosen which drugs it will cover — 300 out of roughly 11,000 generic drugs available." And "while uninsured people should benefit from the program, those with insurance may save only a dollar or so, making a trip to Wal-Mart not worth their while."

Economists Dismiss Fears Over Drop In Factory Activity. USA Today (9/22, Hagenbaugh, Shell, 2.27M) reports, "Economic jitters grew Thursday after a report showing a decline in factory activity in part of the USA became the latest piece of data to suggest the slowdown in the economy may be sharper than initially thought." But "although the economic fears sparked a sell-off on Wall Street, some economists said it is too early to panic." PNC Financial Services chief economist Stuart Hoffman said, "I don't see broad enough signs to indicate that the economy is really grinding to a halt." Manufacturing activity "in the Philadelphia area fell in September, the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia said. The Fed bank's index of conditions in the area, considered representative of U.S. factories, fell to -0.4 this month from an 18.5 reading in August."

The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Gerena-Morales, Derby, 2.03M) reports that meanwhile, "the Conference Board issued a separate economic report that also signaled the economy is headed toward slower growth for the remainder of the year. It reported that its composite index of leading indicators -- which attempts to forecast economic activity as much as six months into the future -- fell 0.2% in August to a reading of 137.6, following the same decline in July."

Stocks Down. NBC Nightly News (9/21, story 8, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Dow was Dow almost 80 points today [to close at 11,533.23]. NASDAQ was down 15 points [to close at 2,237.75]." The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Hudson, Ng, 2.03M) says the Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 7.15 points, or 0.54%, to 1318.03." USA Today (9/22, 2.27M) reports stocks "retreated in afternoon trading after the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia's index shrank for the first time in three years. Earlier, the Conference Board's index of leading indicators showed that an economic slump may extend into next year."

Harris Interactive Online Poll Finds Public Opinion "Sour" On Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M) reports President Bush's job approval numbers "have rebounded a bit since he made a series of speeches making the case for a strong U.S. role in Iraq. But a new poll from Harris Interactive shows that Americans remain very sour on the war itself and the U.S.'s chances of success -- and remain uncertain over the whether the U.S. was right to go to war in the first place." Harris "found 61% of those polled aren't confident that U.S. policies in Iraq will be successful, vs. 20% who are confident of success." Bush's "job rating on his handling of Iraq runs two-to-one negative overall. But at 64% negative to 32% positive, Mr. Bush has recovered from his ratings in May, when 68% were in the negative column vs. 29% in the positive column."

CNN Analyst Dismisses Rise In Bush Polls Numbers. CNN political analyst Bill Schneider on CNN's The Situation Room (9/21) examined three recent polls, two of which showed President Bush's job approval rating rising and said, "Notice all three polls continue to show a majority of Americans disapproving of the President's job performance. In historical terms each in the mid '40s President Bush is in a weak position going into the midterm elections. His rating would have to rise above 50 for his party to benefit. While President Bush may have gotten a boost on handling terrorism and the evidence on that point is mixed, it does not seem to be strong enough to turn the political situation around."

Republican Rollercoaster Ride Seems To Be Heading Up Again. The White House Bulletin/US News (9/21) reported, "A stirring address to the House Republican Conference late last week by President Bush has 'buoyed' the spirits of lawmakers that they won't lose control in the fall elections." Members and aides "interviewed after the meeting last week described a glum crowd politely greeting the President who turned the mood around with his one-on-one talks and broader speech to the Republicans." One member said, "People came out of the meeting pumped up. That was his best appearance ever in front of the caucus." The Bulletin adds that insiders said "that Bush touched on the issues facing the election and provided an upbeat assessment. He knew the name of every member he addressed and had a nickname for virtually all." Bush's appearance, "added to his increasing poll numbers and the growing economy have given the Republicans hope of keeping the majority." One Republican said, "A majority of our caucus feels buoyed. I'm not saying that we are out of the woods...but it's not as bad as we thought."

GOP Strategists Concerned By DSCC's $12 Million Cash Edge. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, A4, Harwood, 2.03M) "Washington Wire" reports that while Democrats face an "uphill climb" to retake the Senate, Republican strategists fear the DSCC's "$12 million cash edge heightens chances of an upset." Democrats believe Sen. Robert Menendez "is their only incumbent at risk, though they dismiss talk of replacing him" on the ballot with Rep. Rob Andrews. Democrats "grudgingly credit" Maryland GOP nominee Michael Steele "for effective, offbeat ads," but are expecting the "state's blue tint" to boost Rep. Ben Cardin to victory.

Business Community Said To Be Hedging Bets In Congressional Races. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, A1, Cummings, 2.03M) reports in a front page story that the US Chamber of Commerce, "usually a stalwart of Republicans," has "run about $700,000 in advertisements defending" Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean of Illinois "and plans to help get out the pro-business vote for her in the fall." Bean is "among more than a dozen Democrats in key races across the country that the chamber is backing this year. Half of them also have benefited from the chamber's first-ever television ads for Democrats. Partly, the organization is rewarding these Democrats for votes in favor of free trade and other issues it holds dear. It also is sensing possible Republican defeats in congressional elections on Nov. 7, and is hedging its bets by spreading some of the organization's wealth to the other side of the aisle." The chamber's move "mirrors a subtle but significant shift across the business community, which has begun anticipating that the Republican majorities in Congress could shrink, if not collapse. Washington lobbying firms are balancing their Republican rosters with Democratic hires, and some companies are injecting more bipartisanship in their campaign giving."

Democrats Seek To Label GOP "Centrist" As Bush "Rubber Stamp" In WA8. The Washington Times (9/22, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Washington's 8th CD is "emblematic of this year's battle for Congress, with Democrats working their hardest to link Republicans in power to President Bush." Democrat Darcy Burner "says her chances of ousting freshman Rep. Dave Reichert -- and giving the Democrats a seat in their bid to recapture the House -- are good because state residents are weary of the president." But Reichert is "one of the Republican centrists in Congress and reminds voters at every opportunity that he is not afraid to be an independent voice for their needs." Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert "and many other top Republicans have come to the state to campaign for Mr. Reichert, making him an easy target for Democrats who call him 'rubber-stamp Reichert.'" When White House strategist Karl Rove "visited on behalf of Mr. Reichert last Friday, Mrs. Burner received more than $50,000 in an online counter-fundraiser."

Steele Criticizes Black GOP Group's Controversial Ad. The AP (9/22, Wyatt) reports a "national black Republican group is running a radio advertisement accusing Democrats of starting the Ku Klux Klan and saying the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was a Republican, a claim challenged by civil-rights researchers." Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, "the black Republican nominee for Maryland's open Senate seat, disavowed the ad" as "'insulting to Marylanders.' He said his campaign asked the Washington-based National Black Republican Association to stop running it."

Steele Picks Up Support From Black Democrats. The Washington Times (9/22, Miller, 88K) reports, "Prominent black Democrats yesterday bucked their party to support Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele -- the Republican nominee in Maryland's U.S. Senate race." William H. "Billy" Murphy Jr., "a Baltimore civil rights lawyer…hosted the 'Steele Democrats' event at the Eubie Blake National Jazz Institute and Cultural Center." Murphy said, "Like so many people who have come out today, I'm sick and tired of being taken for granted by the Democratic Party." The Times adds a "surprise for Mr. Steele came from the son of Kweisi Mfume, a past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People who lost last week's Democratic primary to U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin." Michael Mfume, "a producer of the horror film 'Ax 'Em' and an active supporter of his father's campaign, told reporters at the Eubie Blake center that he did not speak for his father."

Cardin Says Steele Ducking Debates. The Washington Times (9/22, Ward, 88K) reports Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin "criticized his Republican rival Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele for ducking debates in the U.S. Senate race in Maryland. But Mr. Steele and his campaign said Mr. Cardin is 'playing games,' and that his campaign manager won't return phone calls to set up a debate." The Cardin campaign "has issued public challenges to Mr. Steele, the first black person elected to statewide office in Maryland, to debate Mr. Cardin at one of the 10-term congressman's previously scheduled campaign stops." So far, "the two candidates are expected to meet Oct. 29 for a debate on NBC's 'Meet the Press.'"

Libby Defense Fund Chairman Hosts Lieberman Fundraiser. The AP (9/22, Miga) reports Mel Sembler, the "prominent Republican who chairs I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby's legal defense fund co-hosted a fundraiser Wednesday for Sen. Joe Lieberman, who is running for re-election as an independent after losing the Democratic primary." Sembler, "a former Republican National Committee finance committee chairman, helped organize a reception that raised about a 'couple hundred thousand dollars' for Lieberman, who was in attendance. Sembler said the event at his firm's office in St. Petersburg, Fla., drew a mix of Republican, Democratic and independent donors." Sembler, who is "board chairman of the Sembler Company, a real estate and shopping center development company, said he has worked hard to raise money for Libby's legal defense fund." Sembler, who "described himself as 'dear friends' with Cheney," said, "It's amazing to go to all this hard work when a crime never got committed."

Allen Said To Have Handled Revelation Of Jewish Heritage Awkwardly. The New York Times (9/22, Kornblut, 1.21M) reports Sen. George Allen finds "himself in a growing group of political figures who have discovered their Jewish roots late in life. The responses to his situation, which included bad ethnic humor and serious debates about denial and anti-Semitism, focused attention on the power of religious, ethnic and racial identities in politics, forces that may not have the power they once did. But those forces remain sufficiently alive that Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, a Mormon, will almost certainly face questions about his religion if he runs for the Republican presidential nomination." Political operatives say "what matters is not so much Mr. Allen's bloodlines but his handling of the news that his mother was born Jewish, a fact that both say she told him last month." Weekly Standard editor William

Kristol "said the incident especially 'struck a nerve with Jewish Republicans.'" Kristol said, "It's simply the way he handled it." The Times adds, "But in a southern state that was once a slave state, where white voters are predominant and cultural and political conservatives are a majority, Mr. Allen has seemed to struggle to find the right words to address his newfound identity."

Sen. George Allen, in an interview on CNN's The Situation Room (9/21, Blitzer) explained, "I was with my mother, we were across the table and I asked her, there are these rumors flying around here that you're Jewish, you have Jewish blood lines and so forth. I asked her, is there anything to this? And I saw her reaction. And she said, yes, there are. And I said, well, why didn't you ever tell me? I didn't want to tell you. You loved me and you won't love me as much. I said, mom, why would I -- I love you even more. I respect you even more when I heard of why she had hid this for fear of retribution, of stigma and how that would harm not just her, but my father and her children. She was protecting her children. And I said, well, ma, this just doesn't matter, you know? The Nazis are gone. And it just doesn't matter and she says, especially when she said does this make you love me any less. And I just, no, I loved her more. And I said, for this -- let's just stop -- you know, there is no reason to carry on with. She said, please, please, you cannot tell anyone. Tell no one."

Kerry Defends House Democrats From Swift Boat Backer. The AP (9/22, Lester) reports the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth group "was Sen. John Kerry's albatross in 2004. Now, the Democrat is warning his party about suffering the same fate in a fundraising letter." In 2004, "the Swift Boat group, backed by Texas businessman Bob Perry, made unsubstantiated allegations about Kerry's Vietnam War heroism. The presidential nominee's slow and uncertain response is blamed for helping doom his White House bid." Perry has "donated $5 million to the Economic Freedom Fund, a newly created California group, that is running ads, sending out mailings and using automated phone calls to criticize Democratic candidates in Georgia, West Virginia, Iowa and Indiana." In a fundraising letter for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, Kerry "urges Democrats to fight back." Kerry said, "Their first attack ads against Democratic House candidates are already on the air. They hope they've caught you sleeping. We have to respond quickly and in force."

Five-Way Texas Gubernatorial Race Tightening. The New York Times (9/22, Blumenthal, 1.21M) reports, "Just a few months ago," the Texas gubernatorial race "appeared to be a fairly conventional if well-financed match between Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, and the state comptroller, Carole Keeton Strayhorn, a former Republican running as an independent." But in the "last few weeks, though, two other candidates have gained enough traction to make it a much wider race: the humorist Kinky Friedman and Chris Bell, a former Democratic congressman. A fifth candidate, James Werner, a Libertarian, could make the difference if the Nov. 7 election becomes a squeaker." Mired in "low popularity ratings but with rivals dividing the opposition and strong backing from evangelicals, Governor Perry is still favored to win his quest to become the longest-serving chief executive in Texas history using a strategy of 'running out the clock," according to Cal Jillson, a professor of political science at Southern Methodist University. Still, he "cautioned that 'the history of Texas is full of zany, crazy races and this could be one.'"

Friedman Defends 1980 Use Of Racial Slur As Satire. The AP (9/22, Shannon) reports, "Comedian and independent gubernatorial candidate Kinky Friedman on Thursday defended his use of a racial slur during a performance at Houston nightclub 26 years ago after an audio clip of the standup routine was posted on the Internet." Friedman, 61, "said he has tried to expose and lampoon racism, and was making fun of bigots when he used the n-word twice in a joke." Friedman said, "They're attacking me for something that Richard Pryor did, that Lenny Bruce did, which is to have the freedom to poke fun at anybody that you want. The whole show is satirizing racism." The AP adds state Rep. Garnet Coleman, "former chairman of the Texas Legislative Black Caucus, said it was difficult to find the humor in his joke after his remarks about Katrina evacuees in Houston in which he referred to them as 'crackheads and thugs.'"

Sweeney Defends Unions' Collective Political Financial Influence. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (9/22), AFL-CIO President John Sweeney says, "In your Sept. 19 editorial 'Fun Union Facts' you continue your crusade against unions by picking and choosing facts so carefully that your page needs a 'reader beware' sign. Unions pool their resources through the AFL-CIO so working people's voices can be heard in the political and legislative process and to support one another in organizing; these are big budget items. At a time when median household income is sinking, 45 million Americans don't have health care and poverty is rising, we would be neglecting our duties if we didn't do everything possible to elect working-family-friendly candidates and pass laws that will improve workers' lives."

California Bill Would Guarantee Electoral Votes To National Popular Vote Winner. The New York Times (9/22, Lyman, 1.21M) reports Stanford computer scientist John R. Koza "has concocted a plan for states to skirt the Electoral College system legally to insure the election of whichever presidential candidate receives the most votes nationwide." Dr. Koza said, "When people complain that it's an end run. I just tell them, 'Hey, an end run is a legal play in football.'" The Times adds the "first fruit of his effort, a bill approved by the California legislature that would allocate the state's 55 electoral votes to the winner of the national popular vote, sits on Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's desk. The governor has to decide by Sept. 30 whether to sign it, a decision that may well determine whether Dr. Koza's scheme takes flight or becomes another relic in the history of efforts to kill the Electoral College." The "brainstorm behind Dr. Koza's effort, led by a seven-month-old group, National Popular Vote, was to abandon that approach and focus on creating interstate compacts. Those are contracts that bind states over issues like nuclear waste and port authorities." Dr. Koza's compact, "if approved by enough legislatures, would commit a state's electors to vote for the candidate who wins the most national votes, even if the candidate loses in that state."

Evangelical Movement Said To Be Politically Multifaceted. CBS Evening News (9/21, story 6, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Many people might assume all evangelicals are conservative Republican and speak with one voice, but more and more, this is a group that is branching out in different directions." CBS (Pitts) added, "Author and preacher Jim Wallis calls himself a progressive evangelical, who says Christians should focus on injustice around the world." Wallis: "With 30,000 children dying every day, needlessly from poverty and disease, I can't imagine Jesus thinking the top issue on our agenda ought to be gay marriage amendments in Ohio." Pitts: "Tony Perkins is a Christian conservative." Tony Perkins: "I think more and more people are standing on the -- on our side, on the side of the sanctity of human life, the preservation of marriage." Pitts: "Perkins is President of the politically powerful Family Research Council. He argues abortion and gay marriage are the driving concerns for most evangelicals." Pitts: "Wallis says he's against abortion but argues the agenda of the religious right is too narrow and divisive." In the "last presidential election, 78% of white evangelicals voted for President Bush. Now we're seeing more and more Democrats from Barack Obama to Hillary Clinton talking about their faith and issues like poverty and the environment."

State Governments Selling Surplus Material. USA Today (9/22, Jones, 2.27M) reports state governments are "putting more of their surplus goods on sale rather than in the dump. That's giving bargain hunters the opportunity to pick up everything from computers and desks to a car crusher and a statue of Smokey Bear." South Dakota "unloaded the car crusher for $95,000 on the Internet, according to Rick Voorhes, the state's surplus property manager. Alabama got about $30 for the 'life-size' Smokey Bear statue, says Shane Bailey, director of that state's surplus property agency." The officials "in charge of selling such items say tighter state budgets and a desire to reduce the amount of stuff deposited into landfills have bolstered their sales efforts." At least "11 states, including Georgia, Arkansas, South Dakota, Washington and South Carolina, are using online auctions to sell surplus goods, according to a survey by the National Association of State Chief Administrators."

For First Time, All "Forbes 400" Members Are Billionaires. The fact that all 400 people on "Forbes" magazine's latest list of the 400 wealthiest Americans are all billionaires drew the attention of two networks and the Washington Post. ABC World News (9/21, story 8, 2:35, Gibson) said that while "five years ago, there were 266 billionaires, this year, all 400 people are billionaires," and "in fact, there are some people with a billion dollars who didn't make the list." The CBS Evening News (9/21, story 8, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) said Bill Gates "is number one: He's worth $53 billion. Investor Warren Buffett is number two at $46 billion." In its front-page story, the Washington Post (9/22, Ahrens, 748K) highlights a few of the other names, including the founders of Google Inc., and casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, who "has made $1 million per hour over the past two years." (The complete list is available online.)

Convert To Islam Hopes To Help Build Harmony. On the front page of the Metro section, the Washington Post (9/22, Murphy, 748K) profiles Northern Virginia resident Chris Moore, the "son of a U.S. Navy man" who was raised Catholic but converted to Islam. The 31-year-old, "like many other young Muslims in the United States," is "seeking to fashion an Islamic identity that flourishes in American society and influences it for the better. He feels a responsibility, he said, to contribute to a more harmonious relationship between Islam and the West."

Military Chaplin Calls For Support For Military Marriages. Capt. James Key, chaplain, a brigade unit ministry trainer at Fort Irwin in California, writes in an op-ed in USA Today (9/22, 2.27M) that "military couples, unlike their civilian counterparts, face added stresses. Constant military moves are tough enough, but when you add long-term and multiple deployments to the mix, even the strongest marriages can be tested." The "military uncertainties and separations can have an emotional impact on families," so "it is incumbent upon our political leaders to remain cognizant of the emotional wounds soldiers could also be suffering in their marriages." Our "spreading democracy in Iraq or any other hot spot must not come at the expense of military marriages. Helping our troops maintain healthy families is a human imperative that none of us can afford to ignore."

Krugman Calls For Universal Health Care System. Columnist Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) on the recent "series of [insurance] horror stories" that suggest "a growing trend: more and more health insurers are finding ways to yank your insurance when you get sick." Yet "even as health care becomes the core of the American economy, our system of paying for health care remains sick, and is getting sicker." And "here's the thing: it's all unnecessary. Every other wealthy nation manages to provide almost all its citizens with guaranteed health insurance, while spending less on health care than we do. And there's no mystery why: we're paying the price for pointless, destructive reliance on private insurers. … If we had a universal system…there would be no more horror stories."

LATimes Criticizes California AG's Suit Against Auto Manufacturers. The Los Angeles Times (9/22, 918K) editorializes that the "charitable spin" on California Attorney General Bill Lockyer's lawsuit against major auto manufacturers, which "alleges that because vehicle exhaust contributes to global warming, the companies should be held financially liable for everything from wildfires to a bad ski season," is that it is a "politically inspired, headline-grabbing stunt by a state attorney general running for state treasurer. The alternative -- that he might actually believe this suit has legal merit -- may be more frightening." The suit "is the latest salvo fired in the struggle between the state and the auto industry, which has separately sued the state over its attempts to curb global warming. But California shouldn't be in the business of filing meritless suits to gain leverage in other cases."

WPost Criticizes Ehrlich's Proposals For November Balloting. The Washington Post (9/22, A16, 748K) criticizes Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich's call for the use of paper or absentee ballots in November, saying after problems in last week's primaries, Ehrlich had "a choice: show the leadership expected of the state's top executive or succumb to the political motives of a candidate running for reelection. Unfortunately, it is Mr. Ehrlich the candidate who emerged with proposals certain to confuse the public and undermine confidence in voting. … We have no way of knowing Mr. Ehrlich's intent, but we do believe that his words and actions are creating a sense of confusion that could discourage voting."

Ahmadinejad Says He'll Consider Enrichment Suspension Under "Fair Conditions." The Washington Post (9/22, A13, Lynch, 748K) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "said Thursday that his government is prepared to consider suspending its controversial uranium-enrichment program if Western governments meet unspecified conditions." He "did not spell out Tehran's demands," but "his remarks indicated that he is prepared to move ahead with preliminary discussions with European powers aimed at heading off a confrontation with the West." Ahmadinejad "denied U.S. claims that he is pursuing a covert nuclear weapons program, saying that Iran's spiritual leader has issued a decree prohibiting such a development. He said Iran is simply exercising its rights, under the 1970 Non-Proliferation Treaty, to develop nuclear power to meet the country's growing energy needs." He further "accused the West of reneging on previous agreements to support Iran's efforts to develop a nuclear power program."

The Wall Street Journal (9/22, King, 2.03M) says Ahmadinejad "continued to dodge questions about his country's nuclear ambitions, saying Tehran is willing to negotiate over -- and maybe even suspend -- its uranium-enrichment program, but not under pressure and only under 'fair conditions.'" The statement, made "during a rambling news conference, added further uncertainty to a challenge that has stymied the U.S., Europe, Russia and China all summer." Ahmadinejad "once again…appears to have offered just enough encouragement to keep the threat of sanctions at bay, but not enough to make it clear when or if actual talks might begin." While the "decision is to give Iran more time," the Journal notes Administration "officials say the patience of Washington and other key capitals will wear out within a few weeks. It is unclear what will happen once the patience runs out."

McClatchy (9/22, Strobel) notes, "Grinning and giving brisk little salutes," he "denied Thursday that Iran wants a nuclear bomb and said it might discuss suspending uranium enrichment if the conditions are fair." He also "he railed against Zionists and suggested that several thousand mainly Jewish protesters who demonstrated against his presence in New York City might have been paid to attend. He also called for a referendum on the future of the land that constitutes Israel and the Palestinian areas." McClatchy says he was "smiling from the start," and adds, "With his face on the cover of Time magazine and his every word and movement followed by hordes of journalists, this has clearly been Ahmadinejad's week. His combination of breezy confidence and sometimes slippery answers underscored the challenge President Bush faces in trying to halt Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program."

The AP (9/22, Faramarzi) adds Ahmadinejad "seems to be enjoying the spotlight at this year's U.N. General Assembly, easing his way into the international arena and trying to improve his image amid the controversy over his nuclear program and remarks about Israel and the Holocaust." He explained to a reported yesterday "that when he called for the destruction of Israel and dismissed the Holocaust as a myth, his issue was not with the Jewish people but with Zionists, 'who are not Jews. We love everyone in the world — Jews, Christians, Muslims, non-Muslims, non-Jews, non-Christians." He "also expressed love and affection for the American people, just as President Bush reached out to the Iranian people in his General Assembly speech on Tuesday. Ahmadinejad said he wished he had more time here to spend with them in person."

Ahmadinejad Not Committed To Disarming Hezbollah. The New York Times (9/22, Hoge, 1.21M) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "refused to say Thursday whether he would comply with a Security Council demand for the disarmament and disbanding of Hezbollah." He "was also evasive about whether Iran would comply with the resolution's call for an arms embargo to keep Hezbollah from rearming. He said that the United Nations Charter gave people the right to defend themselves and that 'we give spiritual support to all those who want to uphold their rights.'"

Bill Clinton Says Administration Should Talk To Iran. The AP (9/22) reports former President Clinton "said Thursday the U.S. should try talking to Iran about its nuclear weapons ambitions without imposing a lot of conditions." He is quoted saying on NBC's Today Show, "If you think you might have trouble with somebody, and God forbid if you think it could lead to a military confrontation, then there needs to be the maximum amount of contact beforehand. The United States should not be afraid to talk to anyone. They should not be reluctant and shouldn't have too many conditions."

US Efforts To End European Banks' Ties To Iran May Be Succeeding. The Christian Science Monitor (9/22, Rice-Oxley, 58K) reports, "American attempts to persuade Europe to think again about financial involvement in Iran may be starting to bear fruit, according to European banking officials. Whether such 'back-door sanctions' will work is far less apparent, experts say." The Monitor says Washington is "troubled by a lack of speedy progress in the UN toward imposing economic sanctions," and has therefore "stepped up efforts this month to persuade allies to shun Iran's financial system, claiming that Iran may tap banks to illicitly finance terror operations or the purchase of materials for nuclear weapons." European allies have "long taken a softer line toward Iran than the US, and [have] essayed a soft-power approach to its nuclear program, persisting with negotiations." European firms, "particularly German and French, rack up billions of euros' worth of exports each year, with a considerable presence in the oil, automotive, retail, and telecommunication sectors." Analysts believe the EU's "experience" heading up the border force in Lebanon "is unlikely to change its geopolitical strategy in the region," even as "some European bankers are growing wary of the risk of doing business in Iran."

WSJournal Says Bush Appears To Have Been "Lassoed By The UN." The Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M) in an editorial writes "that UN diplomacy has come to serve as a deterrent not against Iran but against any American effort to do anything about Iran's rush to acquire the bomb." And "the 'cowboy' American President looks increasingly like the one who's been lassoed by the U.N., not vice versa." The Journal states, "The conclusion is hard to resist that the U.N. effort is really about persuading America that it can 'live with' an Iranian bomb, just as it lives with a Pakistani bomb, because the costs of economic sanctions or military strikes are supposedly prohibitive. But a glimpse of what the world will look like if Iran succeeds was provided on Tuesday by Gamal Mubarak, the son of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Cairo's heir apparent floated a proposal for Egypt to develop its own nuclear programs, clearly a signal that the largest Sunni Arab country will go nuclear itself to prevent Shiite Iran from dominating the region. And where Egypt goes, Saudi Arabia and Turkey cannot be far behind. Is the international system really prepared to live with five, maybe six, nuclear powers in the Middle East?"

Chavez, Ahmadinejad Attacks Seen As Symptomatic Of Global Animus Toward US.

In an analysis of the reaction to attacks on President Bush by the leaders of Iran and Venezuela, ABC World News (9/21, story 4, 2:40, Muir) reported, "The words drew gasps and giggles at the UN but political analysts say what's more telling is what they didn't draw." Fareed Zakaria, editor Newsweek International: "Not one other country stood up for us. Unfortunately, this is the climate we live in. It's not a place we should be in the world." Muir: "Most foreign policy experts agree the bluster is less important than strategic issues, especially when it comes to the Iranian President." Richard Holbrooke, former US Ambassador to the UN: "He scored a minor PR victory. The real issue is what to do with the strategic issue posed to the United States by Iran."

The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Richter, 918K) runs a similar story, titled "Anti-Americanism Is Providing a Glue," in which it reports, "The outpouring of anti-American rhetoric at the United Nations this week is demonstrating how anger at the United States is uniting the developing world in a way not seen since the 1980s, U.S. officials and analysts say." The Times states, "There is little doubt of the deepening unpopularity of the United States, even among longtime allies. Though the U.S. government has doubled its spending on public diplomacy, a poll this year by the Pew Charitable Trusts showed wide dissatisfaction with a central pillar of U.S. foreign policy, the 'war against terrorism.'" But Lee Feinstein, a member of the Council on Foreign Relations and a former senior State Department official under Clinton "said that even though the withering denunciations by Chavez and Ahmadinejad drew applause this week, overall, members of the United Nations were much more united behind American-style views of democracy and economics than they had ever been." Feinstein said, "The tragedy is, the Bush administration hasn't been able to take advantage of that fact."

In a second article, the Los Angeles Times (9/22, Farley, 918K) says Chavez "acknowledged that it might seem odd for a developing country to send charity to one of the world's wealthiest nations." Yet "the public relations value of tweaking his nemesis, President Bush? Priceless."

And the Miami Herald (9/22, Bachelet, 310K) notes that while "Chavez's visit last year passed largely unnoticed, Mount Olivet was teeming with US media on Thursday, prepped by Chávez's now infamous U.N. reference to Bush as 'the devil.'" While Chavez touted his efforts to deliver discounted heating oil for U.S. poor and elderly residents, "State Department spokesman Eric Watnik pointed out that the U.S. government handed out 'hundreds of millions of dollars to a much larger group of Americans' through federal programs."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/21) reported, "Chavez says his problems are not with the American people but with President Bush." Chavez (via translator): "I had a good relationship with Clinton. Never disrespected us. Now with this guy you can't even talk because he walks throwing stones. The Texan that walks shooting from the waist with a machine gun." Chavez added, "In two years when the elections come to the U.S. I hope that the president be a serious man, it doesn't matter if he comes from the right, I'll be the first person to raise my hand in order to re-establish a serious relationship of respect between governments and between people."

Eugene Robinson in his column in the Washington Post (9/22, A17, 748K) praises Chavez for being "crazy like a fox. Can anyone name the last president of Venezuela, or remember when a speech by any president of Venezuela made such news?" But Robinson warns Iran is a more serious threat to the US and says "When I travel outside the country, I'm struck by the decline in America's moral standing in the world. The Iraq war is the main reason, but not the only one. For all its talk about public diplomacy and spreading the U.S. gospel throughout the world, the Bush administration does an appallingly lousy job of it." The US "policy of not even talking to governments we don't like has proved counterproductive -- pushing Syria closer to Iran, for example, and needlessly prolonging the Israel-Hezbollah war, to no one's benefit except perhaps Ahmadinejad's. Our arrogance has turned us into the neighborhood bully and made our adversaries look like more sympathetic figures than they really are."

Some Democrats Defend Bush From Attacks; Harkin Defends Chavez. Rep. Charles Rangel on CNN's The Situation Room (9/21, Blitzer) was shown saying, "You don't come into my country, you don't come into my congressional district and you don't condemn my President. If there is any criticism of President Bush, it should be restricted to Americans, whether they voted for him or not."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi on CNN's The Situation Room (9/21, Blitzer) was shown saying, "The manner in which he characterized the President, he demeaned himself and he demeaned Venezuela. He demeaned Venezuela. I think that he, Hugo Chavez, fancies himself a modern day Simon Bolivar but all he is an everyday thug."

The Washington Times (9/22, Pisik, 88K) described it as a "stiff rebuke" from Rangel and notes Rep. Chaka Fattah said, 'His personal attacks and ridicule directed at the president of the United States are unacceptable.'" But Sen. Tom Harkin "defended Mr. Chavez in an interview with Radio Iowa." While "the remarks were 'incendiary,' Mr. Harkin said, 'I can understand the frustration, and the anger of certain people around the world because of George Bush's policies.'"

The Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M) editorializes, "Ms. Pelosi's and Mr. Rangel's remarks were politically shrewd if nothing else. Even smarter would be for the two of them to follow up by having a word with their Massachusetts delegation. Only last November, Congressmen William Delahunt and Ed Markey spoke of their 'debt' to Venezuela after arranging to buy 12 million gallons of Venezuelan home heating oil at a 40% discount for the Bay State. Mr. Delahunt has called the dictator his 'excellent friend,' and yesterday the Boston Globe quoted him as blaming the dictator's outburst on 'what low esteem the United States is held, not just in the Islamic world, but all over.'"

LATimes Opposes Chavez Bid For UN Security Council Seat. The Los Angeles Times (9/22, 918K) editorializes, "If Latin America doesn't have a consensus choice for the U.N. seat by Oct. 16, it will come down to a secret ballot by the General Assembly. In case of deadlock, which seems probable, a third country may well emerge as the winner. Uruguay and the Dominican Republic are considered the two most likely candidates, and either would be better than Venezuela. Chavez might seem like a laugh riot today, but after two years of gridlock and shenanigans on the Security Council, the joke would wear pretty thin."

Chavez' Regional Agenda Raises Concerns. Mary Anastasia O'Grady in her column in the Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M) writes that while some are focused on the dangers of a link between Venezuela and Iran "there is an equally pressing threat from Venezuela right in the U.S. backyard. The battleground is Bolivia, which Mr. Chávez badly wants to control so he can seize that country's natural-gas reserves and become the sole energy supplier in the Southern Cone. In doing so, he hopes to seriously damage the Brazilian economy and crush Brazil's geopolitical ambitions as the leader in South America. In its place he wants to plant the flag of Venezuelan hegemony. If he gets away with it, Argentine and Chilean sovereignty would also be diminished and continental stability lost."

Violence Erupts In Gaza. The Washington Post (9/22, A14, Wilson, 748K) reports, "Israeli forces killed at least five Palestinians on Thursday in the Gaza Strip, while gunmen there fired rockets into Israel during the day. The spate of violence ended a few weeks of relative calm between Palestinian gunmen and Israeli forces that began after Israeli tanks and troops withdrew from a volatile area east of Gaza City early this month." Four rockets hit southern Israel, destroying some property but causing no injuries. "The Palestinians were killed in two separate incidents at far ends of the strip." Internal Palestinian disputes have "sharpened" recently, "and rocket fire into Israel appears to be on the rise again."

Rice Convenes Expanded Talks On North Korea. The Washington Post (9/22, A13, Kessler, 748K) reports, "With North Korea refusing to return to the six-nation disarmament talks," Secretary Rice "on Thursday convened a meeting of a new group of nations that will focus on Northeast Asian security concerns." Pyongyang "declined an invitation" to join the Five-Plus-Five, "and China and Russia did not send representatives." The Post notes, "Few issues have proven as vexing as the impasse over North Korea's nuclear ambitions. In some ways, the gathering is the diplomatic equivalent of throwing spaghetti against the wall -- an effort to try something just to see what sticks." Because there is "little prospect of restarting the six-party talks, the United States has decided to try to broaden the circle, bringing in nations such as New Zealand, Canada and Indonesia." The Post identifies "a broader subtext to the gathering. The Bush administration wants China to do more to bring North Korea back to the table, and Hill pointedly noted that several ministers present said China should do more." While the Administration "has prepared a new package of sanctions," it is asking "other countries to sanction North Korea first, before it announces its own sanctions, so it will not look like the heavy."

The Washington Times (9/22, Kralev, 88K) adds China and Russia, "key nations in six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons, skipped an expanded session yesterday, in which countries from the Philippines to Canada sought to address Pyongyang's refusal to negotiate." Rice's meeting "was an attempt to involve Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Indonesia and the Philippines in an expanded forum on regional security." Anonymous international sources "confirmed that many of those present expressed disappointment with Beijing. They also said that the Chinese had made a conscious decision not to attend, questioning" Assistant Secretary of State Chris Hill's "suggestion that the reason had to do with scheduling." Hill "played down the absence of both China and Russia, saying that their foreign ministers had met with Miss Rice several times this week and 'we kind of know where they are on these issues.'"

The AP (9/22) adds Pyongyang "stayed away from a gathering of diplomats from the United States and seven other nations Thursday that focused on the specter of a nuclear North Korea." Hill is quoted saying, "They don't like to talk to people." Moscow and Beijing "also skipped the meeting, although they are members of the international coalition that reached a breakthrough disarmament bargain with Pyongyang a year ago. That agreement has never taken effect and North Korea is boycotting further talks in protest of what it calls unfair U.S. financial sanctions."

Separate AP (9/22) reporting notes Ambassador Alexander Vershbow told South Korean media that Hill "could visit Pyongyang if North Korea ends its boycott of international nuclear talks." Pyongyang "has in the past invited" Hill, "who expressed willingness to make such a trip last year after the communist nation agreed at the arms talks to abandon its nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees and aid. The North immediately threw cold water on the deal and demanded a nuclear reactor for power generation — and the trip was put off." Vershbow "also said that Hill 'is prepared to enter into bilateral talks in a constructive spirit if North Korea is committed to return to the six-party talks,' according to" Embassy Seoul.

Indonesia Executes Three Christians Tied To Sectarian Killings. The New York Times (9/22, Bonner, 1.21M) reports, "In the early morning hours on Friday, an Indonesian firing squad executed three Christian men who had been convicted in connection with the violence that has wracked the province of Central Sulawesi. The government ignored a last-minute appeal from the European Union to declare a moratorium on the death penalty." The Times adds that "no evidence directly linked any of the condemned to killings," and the EU "appeal did not specifically mention the case of the Christians" but "was aimed at halting all executions." Indonesian President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono "is considered a leading contender for the Nobel Peace Prize because of his work in bringing about an end to the separatist war in the western province of Aceh, and European diplomats said that this could hurt his chances, given the strong anti-death penalty sentiments among European governments." The Times also notes, "The executions of the three men had become entangled with the case of the Bali bombers. In this overwhelmingly Muslim country, the government considers that the risk of political protests would be too great if it executed the Bali bombers and not the Christians."

The Washington Times/AP (9/22, Firdaus) adds, "The case against them has heightened tensions in the world's most populous Muslim nation and raised questions about the role religion played in punishing those behind the violence" in Central Suawesi. "Human rights workers say the men's 2001 trial was a sham, and that while it was possible the men took part in some of the violence, they almost certainly were not the masterminds."

Thai Generals May Have Acted To Prevent Their Sidelining By Thaksin. In extensive

reporting, the Wall Street Journal (9/22, A4, Hookway, 2.03M) notes Thai Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin was "up against a tight deadline" when he overthrew the government Tuesday – "a fast-approaching military shuffle that could have promoted Mr. Thaksin's supporters into key posts and strengthened the billionaire businessman's grip on power." Thaksin "was preparing a strike to regain the upper hand, people familiar with the situation say. Mr. Thaksin planned to replace Thailand's senior commanders -- including [Sondhi] -- with new generals friendly to his government before a parliamentary election then scheduled for October." The Journal says that plan "at least partially drove the army's decision to stage this week's coup, people familiar with the events say." Thaksin's overthrow "has left" Sondhi "with the task of restoring a credible government in one of Southeast Asia's linchpin economies and a key ally of the U.S."

Coup Leaders Crack Down On Media, Opposition. The New York Times (9/22, Fuller, 1.21M) reports Sondhi yesterday "sought to strengthen the grip of his junta, banning political gatherings and 'activities' and summoning Thai media executives to army headquarters to warn them against publishing 'expressions of public opinion' — possibly a reference to opinion polls but perhaps also including commentaries. The junta also summoned Mr. Thaksin's closest political allies." The Times says "many questions remain about how the military will carry out its stated intention to return democracy to Thailand, which before a political crisis erupted in January was a sort of beacon of democracy for its neighbors." In the meantime, it remains unclear "what will happen to Mr. Thaksin and his fortune of more than $2 billion. The Thai news media speculated on Thursday that to appear more legitimate, the junta might open investigations against Mr. Thaksin. Showing financial malfeasance could justify the coup in the eyes of disapproving foreign governments."

The AP (9/22, Tang) says Sondhi's allies "tightened their grip Thursday, restricting political activities, assuming legislative powers and detaining some allies of the deposed prime minister." Coup leaders said they were "banning all meetings by political parties and the creation of new parties," and "also imposed media restrictions, including stationing soldiers at television and radio stations, and ordering the information ministry to stop the distribution of information 'deemed harmful' to its agenda." The crackdown "seemed likely to increase criticism from Western nations and human rights groups, which described" the coup "as a setback to democracy" nationally and regionally. The Washington Times/AP (9/22, Tang) runs a version of the AP report.

Thais Said To Accept, If Not Endorse, Coup. USA Today (9/22, Wiseman, Chitrada, 2.27M) says that, one year ago, millions of "rural Thais surged to the polls 19 months ago to re-elect Thaksin's party, Thais Love Thais, in a landslide. They saw Thaksin as a can-do leader who cared about Thailand's poor." Now, "Thaksin's rural supporters have remained mostly silent in the face of a coup that has been endorsed by Thailand's revered king. Many, in fact, appear to support the military takeover, if only because it ended a standoff between Thaksin and his opponents that had paralyzed the government all year." One "survey of 2,019 people for the Bangkok Post newspaper, published Thursday, found support for the coup ran higher outside the capital (86.4% approval) than inside (81.6%). Those findings were odd because Bangkok has been the center of anti-Thaksin sentiment and rural Thailand has been his stronghold."

Somali Islamic Forces Direct Youth Fighters Into "Rehabilitation" Camps. In a lengthy piece, the Los Angeles Times (9/22, Sanders, 918K) details Somali "boot camps for Islam" that "aim to wean former warlord militiamen off drugs, instill religious values and train them to join Muslim forces." Somalia has seen nearly "3,000 former warlord militiamen sent to Islamist-run 'rehabilitation camps' on the outskirts of the nation's capital. It's an ambitious resocialization program designed to wean the young fighters off drugs, instill religious values and, eventually, reverse loyalties so they can be integrated into the Muslim fundamentalist forces." Administration officials have voiced "concern that increasingly Islamist Somalia could end up with a Taliban-style government and serve as a terrorist training area. Amid allegations that Islamists are using military advisors from Pakistan and Afghanistan to train soldiers, officials recently began permitting journalists to visit the camps. But they denied access to weapons stockpiles and insisted on selecting the militiamen to be interviewed, and carefully monitored what they said."

Cuban Spy Said To Have "Caused Serious Damage" To US Security. The Washington Times (9/22, Gertz, Scarborough, 88K) "Inside The Ring" column reports Ana Montes, "a Cuban spy working inside the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), caused serious damage to U.S. national security by revealing U.S. electronic intelligence-gathering secrets and also by providing a feedback mechanism for communist disinformation from the Castro regime." The damage caused "is outlined in a classified assessment completed several months ago by the office of the National Counterintelligence Executive," and was disclosed this week in a new book by the newspaper's Bill Gertz.

Paulson Launches New Strategic Dialogue With China. The Financial Times (9/22, Guha) reports Hank Paulson US Treasury secretary has engaged in a new strategic dialogue with Chinese leaders and "will urge Hu Jintao, China's president, to allow the renminbi to appreciate more rapidly when the two meet on Friday in Beijing." In an interview "Paulson said he would compliment Mr Hu on reforms under way and 'encourage him to move forward even more quickly.'" Paulson "would also thank Mr Hu for putting his authority behind the new dialogue, which the US believes will help it produce results." He "said that while the dialogue would have a 'bilateral focus' it would invariably touch on 'global issues,' including global economic imbalances." Asked about the response in the US to the "new dialogue" Paulson said he "would contact senior congressmen on his return to explain why the dialogue with China was in the US national interest. 'Members of Congress are my clients,' he said. 'I need to engage with key people up there.'"

USA Today (9/22, Lynch, 2.27M) reports, "Paulson says China's agreement to participate in a new 'Strategic Economic Dialogue' will place the 'most important economic relationship in the world' on a solid long-term footing." But a "combination of stubborn commercial disputes and an increasingly protectionist Congress shadow his bid for a radically different Sino-American commercial relationship." Yet Paulson's "already demonstrated unusual speed in winning President Bush's approval to launch the new set of talks. One key: Paulson lined up backing from top White House aides and Cabinet colleagues before approaching the president this summer, says White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, another former Goldman Sachs executive." Bolten said, "This was his brainchild. … He has the full confidence of the president, and other Cabinet members know that. The president is sufficiently interested in it that I think Hank (Paulson) will be able to attract the kind of time and attention he's envisioned. … This will turn out to be a substantial initiative."

Hungarian Leader Rejects Calls For Resignation. The Washington Post (9/22, A10, Whitlock, 748K) reports, "With protesters massed outside the gates of the stately Hungarian parliament for a fourth straight day, Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany sat in his wood-paneled office inside and tried to explain why he had admitted on tape that his party had done a 'boneheaded' job of running the country and that he had lied to voters to win reelection." He "repeated that he would not resign despite the sometimes violent protests that have rattled Budapest since local news outlets on Sunday broadcast excerpts of a leaked tape recording of his comments, made to a closed meeting of Socialist supporters shortly after he won reelection in April." But "there are few signs that the political pressure building against Gyurcsany…will end anytime soon."

Kozlin's Assassination Said To Showcase Threat Of Russian Organized Crime. In a 2,400-word piece its front page this morning, the Wall Street Journal (9/22, A1, Chazan, 2.03M) reports on the "high-stakes crusade to clamp down on Russia's murky and criminalized banking system, a project that lay at the heart of President Vladimir Putin's ambition to modernize Russia's economy." Bank regulator Andrei Kozlov "spearheaded the campaign. Last week, his ambitions were cut short by an assassin's bullet." The Journal calls Kozlov "one of the most senior Russian officials to be murdered since the end of communist rule, and his death stunned the country's elite. Contract-style killings of businessmen were commonplace in the early 1990s, when capitalism was in its infancy here, but most thought they had become a thing of the past." The murder "exposed the fragility of Mr. Putin's claims to have ushered in a new era of stability. It also showed that despite the gradual removal of political challenges to Kremlin power, crime and corruption still menace the authority of the state."

Activist Argues Against Use Of DDT To Combat Malaria. Dr. Jessie Stone, founder and director of Soft Power Health, a nonprofit organization in Uganda, in an op-ed in the New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) warns that while the WHO, the White House and Congress have endorsed using DDT to combat the spread of malaria in Africa, "DDT is not the magic bullet that will eradicate malaria. We need to refocus resources and attention on something most Africans do not have: basic malaria education, and prevention with insecticide-treated bed nets.

A mosquito net costs $6.50 and can last up to five years. … We do not have to reinvent the wheel here. We just have to help educate people — even those with the best intentions."

Uruguayan Firm Seen As Model For New Global Economy. Thomas Friedman in his column in the New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) uses the success of TCS Iberoamerica, a joint outsourcing venture in Uruguay, as an example of "how any entrepreneur -- with the right imagination, Internet bandwidth and a small amount of capital -- can assemble a global company by matching workers and customers from anywhere to do anything for anyone. Maybe the most important rule in today's increasingly flat world is this: Whatever can be done, will be done -- because so many people now have access to the tools of innovation and connectivity. The only question is: Will it be done by you or to you?"

Pope Praised In Confrontation With Muslims. Daniel Henninger in his column in the Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M) praises Pope Benedict XVI for raising the issue of Muslim radicalism writing "The pope has a Muslim problem alright. It is the hammering that Christian communities have been taking for years and are getting now in Islamic countries all over the world, but especially in the Middle East." Henninger concludes, "The Vatican doesn't want oil. Hegemony is long gone from its vocabulary. The Vatican's only brief is a modus vivendi, a global reality Islam must eventually acknowledge. The governments of Egypt, Iraq and Saudi Arabia should open the dialogue Benedict XVI is seeking. In March, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak met with Benedict at the Vatican. He would be the obvious choice to take the lead. More than these Arab governments realize, their future could use the support of the pope's famous divisions."

Charles Krauthammer in his column in the Washington Post (9/22, A17, 748K) writes, "The pope gives offense and the Mujaheddin al-Shura Council in Iraq declares that it 'will break up the cross, spill the liquor and impose the 'jizya' [head] tax; then the only thing acceptable is conversion or the sword.' This to protest the accusation that Islam might be spread by the sword. As I said. No sense of irony."

NYTimes Urges Blair To Step Down. The New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) in an editorial praises British Prime Minister Tony Blair's record but declares "It is time for Mr. Blair to move on, preferably before the end of this year." It is also time for Gordon Brown "to recognize that the job he has wanted so badly for so long is not merely a reward for tight-lipped endurance. Mr. Brown needs to start talking about the domestic and foreign policies he would work for if the Labor Party chose him as the next prime minister. But so long as Mr. Blair talks about staying on for almost another year, Mr. Brown…is constrained from doing so. That is reason enough for Mr. Blair, already a lame duck, to speed his departure."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush, Dissident GOP Senators Reach Agreement On Terror Bill. The AP (9/22, Flaherty) reports, "The White House and rebellious Senate Republicans announced agreement Thursday on rules for the interrogation and trial of suspects in the war on terror. President Bush urged Congress to put it into law before adjourning for the midterm elections." Sen. John McCain, "one of three GOP lawmakers who told Bush he couldn't have the legislation the way he initially asked for it, said, 'The agreement that we've entered into gives the president the tools he needs to continue to fight the war on terror and bring these evil people to justice.'" The agreement "contains key concessions by the White House, including dropping a provision that would have interpreted Geneva Convention obligations and another allowing a defendant to be convicted on evidence he never sees if it is classified. The legislation, however, makes clear the president has the authority to enforce the treaty."

The Washington Post (9/22, A1, Smith, Babington, 748K) reports, "Yesterday's…marathon talks occurred in Vice President Cheney's little-known office on the second floor of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. McCain, Graham and Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), plus [Stephen] Hadley and Steven G. Bradbury, acting head of the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, met almost continuously from 9:30 a.m. to 2 p.m.," according to "sources," and then "moved to Frist's office around 3 p.m. to announce their breakthrough."

Much of the coverage depicts the deal as solving a political problem for Republicans heading into the midterm elections. NBC Nightly News (9/21, story 3, 2:20, Gregory, 9.87M), for example, said Bush "still has to sign a bill that has to work its way through Congress but politically the White House thinks it has a real winner here. New fodder for the Republicans tough on terror argument." On ABC World News (9/21, story 2, 1:40, Gibson), George Stephanopoulos said he thought the bill would now pass the Congress. Democrats, he added, "were cut out of this deal. They don't want to block this seven weeks from an election."

USA Today (9/22, Jackson, Kiely, 2.27M), in a story headlined "Deal On Suspects Closes GOP Rift," says the deal defuses "a fight over national security that divided the GOP less than seven weeks before Election Day." Democrats "appeared likely to back the compromise. 'It is time to make the tough and smart decisions to give the American people the real security they deserve,' said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada."

Likewise, the Wall Street Journal (9/22, Lueck, Rogers, 2.03M) reports, "Going into the fall elections, the compromise…is crucial for Republicans, who have been embarrassed by the party split just when they had wanted to present a united front against Democrats on national-security issues. Even now, the White House faces resistance to a second legislative request, authorizing warrantless surveillance of communications in and out of the U.S. And privately, Republicans admit that completing the second measure before lawmakers go home for the elections will be difficult." The Washington Times (9/22, Hurt, Fagan, 88K) says the deal allows Republicans "to turn their attention to differences they might have with Democrats."

News reports also say the agreement is predicated on "concessions" from the White House. The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Barnes, Simon, 918K), titles its front-page story "Bush Bows to Senators on Detainees," and says the President "acceded to dissident Senate Republicans on Thursday, agreeing to new rules for interrogating and prosecuting suspected terrorists that leave intact international treaty protections against torture." In "a major concession to Arizona Sen. John McCain and other Republicans, the administration dropped its efforts to have Congress redefine US obligations under the Geneva Convention."

ABC World News (9/21, lead story, 2:05, Raddatz) said that "it doesn't seem that the President got exactly what he wanted. But he seems happy about it. Late today, the President said the compromise meets his demands." Bush was shown saying, "I'm pleased to say that this agreement preserves the single, most-potent tool we have in protecting American and foiling terrorist attacks. And that is a CIA program to question the world's most dangerous terrorists and to get their secrets." But "in some senses, the White House blinked on this. What the President had wanted was to 'clarify the language in the Geneva Conventions' about what constitutes cruel and inhuman treatment of detainees. … A White House official said, late tonight, 'We simply found a new way to achieve the same objective.' But part of that objective…was clearly to get this wrapped up before the midterm elections."

CBS Evening News (9/21, lead story,2:40, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "The President all along said the Geneva Conventions needed to be reinterpreted, redefined because language was too vague. It didn't offer any protection to American intelligence agencies who are actually carrying out all of this interrogation. He wanted those agents protected by the Geneva Conventions being furthered -- further explained, clarified. He gave that up."

The New York Times (9/22, Zernike, 1.21M) reports Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, said, "We proposed a more direct approach to bringing clarification. This one is more of the scenic route, but it gets us there." The agreement "says the executive branch is responsible for upholding the nations' commitment to the Geneva Conventions, leaving it to the president to establish through executive rule any violations for the handling of terror suspects that fall short of a "grave breach." Significantly, Senate aides said, those rules would have to be published in the Federal Register." The agreement "provides several pages describing 'grave breaches' that would not be allowed, starting with torture and including other forms of assault and mental stress. But it does not lay out specific interrogation techniques that would be prohibited."

The Financial Times (9/22, Daniel) says the compromise, "struck on Thursday after six hours of intense negotiations, marks a second moral victory for Senator John McCain, who last year took on the White House over the Detainee Treatment Act, which prohibits cruel or inhumane treatment of prisoners, and Senator Lindsey Graham and Senator John Warner." The battle "had threatened to undermine both the Republican effort to show unity on national security issues and make that a cornerstone of party re-election efforts."

McClatchy (9/22, Talev) reports Sen. John McCain, "one of three Republican senators who forced the administration to compromise, said he was satisfied with the agreement. 'There is no doubt that the integrity and sprit of the Geneva Conventions have been preserved,' he said at a news conference with other senators and administration officials." Sen. Lindsey Graham, who'd joined McCain and Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner "in forcing the White House to temper its original proposal, said he believed the compromise would prohibit simulated drowning, or 'water-boarding' as a CIA interrogation technique."

NYTimes, WPost Criticize Agreement. In an editorial titled "A Bad Bargain," the New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) says "the overall bill prepared by the three senators had fatal flaws. It allows the president to declare any foreigner, anywhere, an 'illegal enemy combatant' using a dangerously broad definition, and detain him without any trial. It not only fails to deal with the fact that many of the Guantánamo detainees are not terrorists and will never be charged, but it also chokes off any judicial review." The Democrats "have largely stood silent and allowed the trio of Republicans to do the lifting. It's time for them to either try to fix this bill or delay it until after the election. The American people expect their leaders to clean up this mess without endangering US troops, eviscerating American standards of justice, or further harming the nation's severely damaged reputation."

The Washington Post (9/22, 748K) headlines its editorial "The Abuse Can Continue," and says "the senators who have fought to rein in the administration's excesses…failed to break Mr. Bush's commitment to 'alternative' methods that virtually every senior officer of the US. military regards as unreliable, counterproductive and dangerous for Americans who may be captured by hostile governments." If the bill "is passed in the form agreed on yesterday, Mr. Bush will go down in history for his embrace of torture and bear responsibility for the enormous damage that has caused."

DOJ Clarifies Gonzales Remarks On Arar Case.

The Washington Post (9/22, DeYoung) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales's claim this week that the Justice Department was not responsible for sending Canadian software engineer Maher Arar to a Syrian prison in 2002 was the result of imprecise wording by Gonzales and a misunderstanding by those who reported his remarks, according to a Justice Department spokeswoman. … The matter turns on the meaning of the word 'we.'" The Post continues, "On Tuesday, a day after a Canadian government commission concluded that the Syrian-born Arar was 'interrogated, tortured and held in degrading and inhumane conditions' for 10 months after being falsely accused of terrorist ties, Gonzales was asked whether the department owed him 'an apology.' … 'Well, we were not responsible for his removal to Syria,' Gonzales replied. 'I'm not aware that he was tortured, and I haven't read the commission report.' … Gonzales was aware that in 2002 the Immigration and Naturalization Service arranged Arar's removal from the United States and his delivery to Syria after he was accused of ties to al-Qaeda, spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said. The INS has since been transferred from the Justice Department to the new Department of Homeland Security and is known as U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services." The Post adds, "Since Arar was officially deported, Scolinos said, his case was 'an immigration-related issue.' She said Gonzales was trying to 'make that point' because 'immigration matters are no longer handled by the [Justice] Department.'" The Post notes, "On the question of torture, Scolinos said, 'My understanding is that the U.S. government received what they believed to be reliable assurances that he would be treated humanely, consistent with international treaties and conventions.' Gonzales, she said, was 'emphasizing that point.'"

Maine AG Seeks Dismissal Of Phone Record Suit.

The AP (9/22, Adams) reports, "Maine's attorney general asked a federal court Thursday to throw out the government's lawsuit against Maine officials over whether a phone company should release information about its handling of confidential records." The AP continues, "Attorney General G. Steven Rowe said the state's request, filed on behalf of the Public Utilities Commission, asserts the federal government has no jurisdiction in the case. The state also contends that the government is wrong to invoke 'state secrets' arguments. … 'There are no state secrets at issue here,' Rowe said at a news briefing after the motion to dismiss was filed in U.S. District Court in Bangor." The AP adds, "The litigation stems from a press release issued by Verizon and information it provided to the PUC, in which the telecommunications company claims it did not provide phone records to the government for its domestic surveillance program. The company also said in a May news release that it would not discuss any relationship with the National Security Agency program. … The PUC, prompted by a complaint by 22 Mainers, ordered Verizon to provide a sworn affirmation that Verizon's statement about the phone records is true. In response, the federal government sued, saying that the PUC's attempt to force Verizon to answer raised national security concerns."

DOJ Asks 9th Circuit For Quick Dismissal Of Eavesdropping Suit. The AP (9/22, Yen) reports, "The Bush administration asked an appeals court Thursday to step in immediately and dismiss a lawsuit over the U.S. government's warrantless wire tapping program, calling a lower judge's ruling dangerous and wrong." The AP continues, "The Justice Department asked the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to overturn the decision earlier this month by U.S. District Judge Garr King. Government attorneys argued the decision put the disclosure of 'highly sensitive foreign intelligence information' at risk." The AP adds, "The lawsuit was filed by the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, which had a chapter that went out of business after the U.S. government labeled it a terrorist organization. … The foundation alleged that two of its lawyers and at least one official were under electronic surveillance in March and April 2004. The foundation is asking King to rule the surveillance a violation of a federal law that requires a special court to approve intelligence-related wiretapping." The AP notes, "Typically, appeals are filed at the conclusion of a case in trial court; however, in this case, Justice Department attorneys are asking the 9th Circuit to step in now given the sensitivity and urgency of national security. … In the Sept. 7 order, King declined to dismiss the case, saying he believed there may be a way for the lawsuit filed by a now-defunct Islamic charity to proceed without releasing information that could harm U.S. security. … In Thursday's filing, Justice Department attorneys argued that King's decision is flawed because classified facts needed to evaluate the case are protected under the so-called 'state secrets' privilege."

Pentagon IG Says Able Danger Didn't Identify 9/11 Terrorists. The New York Times (9/22, Shenon, 1.21M) reports, "The Defense Department's inspector general on Thursday dismissed claims by military officers and others who had insisted that" the secret Pentagon program Able Danger "identified Mohamed Atta and other terrorists involved in the Sept. 11 attacks before the attacks occurred." However, the report "was criticized Thursday by Representative Curt Weldon, Republican of Pennsylvania, who is a member of the House Armed Services Committee and who helped bring information about Able Danger to light." He described "the inspector general as having 'cherry-picked testimony from witnesses in an effort to minimize the historical importance of the Able Danger effort.'"

FBI Denies Agents Visited Cobbler In Macheteros Probe. The AP (9/22) reports, "The FBI is investigating if people posing as bureau agents visited a shoe repair store in western Puerto Rico owned by a supporter of independence for the U.S. territory, an agency spokesman said Thursday. Harry Rodriguez, FBI spokesman in Puerto Rico, denied that bureau agents visited Miguel Sanchez's shoe repair store in Mayaguez, though Sanchez said they did come to see him." The AP notes, "Rodriguez's comments come three days after FBI agents returned to the homes of two Puerto Rican activists whose properties were searched in February in an investigation into a militant independence group. … Rodriguez said the agents went to the homes as part of an ongoing investigation into the Macheteros," but "he declined to provide details."

Military Said To Have "Clever" New Procedure For Tracking Terrorists. The Washington Times (9/22, Gertz, Scarborough, 88K) "Inside The Ring" column reports US commandos "have developed a clever technical procedure for tracking terrorists in Iraq, and elsewhere, we presume. The tracking is used by a special military intelligence unit within U.S. Joint Special Operations Command," and "was instrumental in finding and killing al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi in June and in capturing a number of his lieutenants." The report offers no specifics about the procedure.

Britain Relaxes Carry-On Restrictions. USA Today (9/22, 2B, Stinson, 2.27M) reports, "Air passengers can carry a larger bag and musical instruments on board flights leaving Britain starting today, the government announced Thursday. … The slight relaxation…comes after complaints from passengers and airlines and as the government continues to try to balance security with passenger convenience." The Transport Department said in a statement that the change would "lessen the burden on passengers, while maintaining a rigorous security regime."

Jordanian Court Sentences Woman To Death In Wedding Bombing Case. The Washington Post/AP (9/22, A12, Halaby) reports a Jordanian court "sentenced an Iraqi woman to death Thursday for her role in al-Qaeda-led hotel bombings that killed 60 people in Jordan's deadliest terror attack." Sajida al-Rishawi, 35, "was intended to be one of the suicide bombers in the Nov. 9 attack. She entered a hotel ballroom with her husband, both strapped with explosives belts. Her husband set off his own belt, the explosion ripping through a wedding party in the room." Rishawi was "one of seven defendants in the case, but the six others were still at large and tried in absentia. Like Rishawi, the six were sentenced to death by hanging. Rishawi is the first woman to be sentenced to execution in Jordan on terrorism charges."

Poe Says French Government Shows "Ignorance" On Terror Threat. The Washington Times (9/22, McCaslin, 88K) "Inside The Beltway" column reports the "French government's latest reaction to the global war on terrorism is being scrutinized all over again on Capitol Hill." Freshman Rep. Ted Poe (R-TX) said recently, "'Let them eat cake' is what Marie Antoinette said to the starving French people, showing her ignorance of the world around her. Today it can be used to describe France's position on handling terror threats."

Author Says Bin Laden Should Be Treated As Criminal Defendant. In a New York Times op-ed (9/22), author Lawrence Wright writes a script for what the US should do with Osama bin Laden if he is located: "First, don't kill him. He'd become a martyr instantly, which is of course his goal. His death at the hands of Americans would be the ideal finale from a Qaeda perspective. Deny him that victory at all costs. And, please, don't send him to Guantánamo or torture him in an undisclosed location." The US "should, instead, offer him to the authorities in Kenya, where, on Aug. 7, 1998, a Qaeda suicide bomber murdered 213 people in the attack on the American Embassy." Then "take him to Tanzania, where on the same August morning Al Qaeda hit another American Embassy, killing 11 people, most of them Muslims." Once "exposed as a mass murderer of Africans who had no part in his quarrel with America, Mr. bin Laden would be ready to stand trial for the bombing of the American destroyer Cole and, of course, 9/11." By "treating him as a criminal defendant instead of a enemy combatant, we could underline the differences between a civil society and the Taliban-like rule he seeks to impose on Muslim countries and eventually the entire world." Wright says bin Laden's end should be dictated by a Saudi Shariah court.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Miami Police Chief Defends Arrest Of Terror Suspects. The Miami Herald (9/22, Clark, 310K) reports, "Miami police Chief John Timoney defended the arrest of the Miami Seven to a House homeland security committee Thursday, telling the panel that not all terrorists look like Sept. 11 ringleader Mohamed Atta." Timoney "acknowledged there had been skepticism about the June arrest of the seven men in Liberty City. … 'I was skeptical, as was the FBI, but not once did [the suspects] back off,' Timoney said. … Timoney's remarks came after Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen" noted that the arrests, "to some observers, 'hardly passed the smile test.'" The Herald adds, "Timoney told the panel that progress has been made since" 9/11 "in terms of local police working with the FBI. But he noted that it's still not clear 'who has the ultimate responsibility for intelligence gathering.' 'Somebody's got to make a decision that one agency is in charge,' he said, alluding to a turf war among the FBI, Department of Homeland Security and the 16 agencies that make up the federal intelligence community."

Collins, King Reach Agreement On Chemical Plant Security. The New York Times (9/22, Lipton, 1.21M) reports moving away from a less stringent industry-backed proposal "many other Republican senators," Sen. Susan Collins and Rep. Peter T. King agreed Thursday on a chemical plant security plan "that would give federal officials the power to shut down high-risk chemical plants that do not comply with proposed new anti-terrorism measures for that industry." Under new plan, "the regulations would apply to all high-risk plants, instead of just those defined as highest risk. The regulations would also give the Department of Homeland Security the power to review and approve plans devised by plant owners, to inspect facilities to determine compliance and to shut any noncompliant plants, according to a statement by Ms. Collins and Mr. King." However, "It is not yet clear that this language — which may be considered too stern by some Republicans and too relaxed by many Democrats — will be approved by the full conference committee, which is scheduled to meet Monday evening on the department's budget."

Cost To Implement Real ID Act Put At $11 Billion. The Washington Post (9/22, A4, Fears, 748K) reports, "The cost to consumers for helping to secure America became clearer yesterday" with the release of a report by the National Governors Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures and the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators that "estimated it would cost more than $11 billion over five years to implement the technology required by the Real ID Act." The report "does not say whether the cost of implementation will be passed on to drivers and holders of state identification cards. But Homeland Security officials said the price of similar new smart cards for 750,000 workers at ports and other transportation facilities will be about $140 each."

Pan Am Using Terrorism Lawsuit Funds To Pay Former Employees. The Washington Times/AP (9/22, Tong) reports in the "15 years since Pan American World Airways shut down, Anthony La Pera had assumed he would never get paid his leftover wages and accrued vacation. But Mr. La Pera and another 15,000 former employees can expect to open their mailboxes one day in December and find that a check has arrived, marking the end of the liquidation of an iconic airline." In July, "a federal bankruptcy judge authorized the Pan Am Corp. to distribute the money it had secured in a settlement with the government of Libya. Sending out those checks marks the end of a long process of winding down Pan Am." Pan Am "shut down on Dec. 4, 1991, after declaring bankruptcy that January. Among the last, fatal blows it suffered was the 1988 bombing of Flight 103, a now-infamous attack that ended with 270 dead when a bomb exploded on board as the plane flew over Lockerbie, Scotland." In 2003, Libya "accepted responsibility for the bombing and agreed to pay restitution to the victims. Pan Am's payments come from a separate settlement of a lawsuit its insurers brought against the Libyan government."

Pataki, Bloomberg Praise Finalized Framework For WTC Rebuilding. After "clenched teeth" negotiations, the Port Authority, as owner of the WTC site, and developer Larry Silverstein ratified the conceptual framework to rebuild Ground Zero, the timing of which prompted the New York Times (9/22, Bagli, 1.21M) to lead with, "Now, at long last, finally, for sure." Under the agreement, the PA takes responsibility for the "$2.2 billion" Freedom Tower, a development site one block away, and the "$2.2 billion transit center." These must be built by 2012, along with the "$500 million" WTC memorial and a shopping mall, according to the agreement in April. The plan says Silverstein will build three towers along the east side of the site by 2012, and if he falls behind schedule on just one tower "he risks losing them all."

Grace Period For Silverstein Hints At Possible "Rebuilding Delays." In its headline and lead, the Wall Street Journal (9/22, Frangos, 2.03M) suggests that yesterday's agreement provided for "rebuilding delays." The Journal explains that the three buildings Silverstein plans to build could take 7 instead of 6 six years to complete, under yesterday's contract that gives him a "one-year 'grace period' beyond the 2012 deadline." If rebuilding extends past "the end of 2013," he loses all the property. A Port Authority official "said Silverstein's potential construction lenders were uncomfortable with the more-aggressive timeframe." The Journal notes Pataki "hailed" the agreement, calling it "the last major hurdle toward the completed redevelopment of the World Trade Center site." Like the Times, the Journal notes the uncertainty surrounding Freedom Tower construction, given ground zero insurers and the tentative nature of federal and state leases.

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Press Musharraf, Karzai On Fighting Islamic Extremists. The Chicago Tribune (9/22, Silva, 623K) reports the "survival of Afghanistan's fragile government in the face of a resurgent Taliban threat will be high on the agenda for President Bush and the presidents of Pakistan and Afghanistan in a series of White House meetings starting Friday." While the White House "credits Pakistan for helping to capture or kill more Al Qaeda operatives than any other country since the attacks of Sept. 11, it worries about support that Pakistan's unruly regions provide for Taliban fighters intent on unseating the government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai." The White House is "counting on Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf to prevail upon tribal leaders to prevent foreign fighters from crossing into Afghanistan."

McClatchy (9/22, Hutcheson) reports Bush "will be prodding" Musharraf and Karzai "to work together against Islamic extremists." The "diplomatic arm-twisting comes at a particularly challenging time in a region that remains a spawning ground for international terrorism. In Afghanistan, a Taliban military offensive is testing the viability of the U.S.-backed government in Kabul. Neighboring Pakistan continues to serve as a haven for Taliban operatives and al-Qaida terrorists." Bush will "meet Tuesday with Afghan President Hamid Karzai before welcoming both leaders to a three-way summit over dinner on Wednesday. It could be a heartburn-inducing meal." Stephen Cohen, a South Asia specialist at the Brookings Institution, said, "Karzai and Musharraf do not like each other. Our influence with both is declining."

Pakistani Official Defends Deal With Border Tribes. The Washington Times (9/22, Behn, 88K) reports, "Pakistan's point man on a truce with tribal elders along the country's restive border with Afghanistan yesterday rejected charges that the agreement would undermine the fight against Islamic extremists." Gov. Ali Muhammad Jan Aurakzai of North West Frontier Province "also criticized the United States for being slow to deliver on critical military equipment and support needed to combat Taliban fighters." Aurakzai "said the agreement he had helped hammer out with tribal leaders of North Waziristan was part of a broader strategy to keep terrorists out." Aurakzai said, "It's not just a peace agreement. It is a larger strategy with a military arm, a political arm and a reconstruction arm." He added that the government "planned to pump $2 billion into the tribal areas over the next nine years for "massive development," he said." The Times adds, "Top officials in both Afghanistan and the United States are skeptical of the deal and of Islamabad's overall commitment to the war on terror."

White House "Frets" Over Situation In Afghanistan. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, A4, Harwood, 2.03M) "Washington Wire" says the "White House frets about Afghanistan" before President Bush meets with President Hamid Karzai. While Bush praises his Afghan counterpart, "senior officials worry Karzai isn't strong enough to quell" the Taliban threat, since he "hasn't wrested power from warlords or extended his reach much beyond Kabul."

US Plans No Troop Reductions In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (9/22, A13, Tyson, 748K) reports the US military "plans no troop cuts in Afghanistan before March, as fighting intensifies against Taliban forces that have gained influence in a political and security 'vacuum' in the southern part of the country, according to a senior U.S. commander." Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry said, "Our troop levels in Afghanistan will remain about steady through . . . February." The Post adds there "are approximately 20,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan, the highest number since the U.S.-led invasion in October 2001 to overthrow the Taliban government." Eikenberry said "Taliban fighters and extremists have grown more numerous, organized and determined in some parts of the south and southeast, where foreign troops were limited and the Afghan government was weak."

British Forward Operating Base A Flashpoint In Campaign Against Taliban. NBC Nightly News (9/21, story 4, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This evening, we have fresh pictures just in to us of the fighting in Afghanistan. Specifically an ambush just today of British forces caught on videotape. It happened in the southern part of Afghanistan during a mission to resupply a forward operating base." NBC (Nealy) added the helicopter patrol twice tried "resupply British troops and failed. It seemed like the third time lucky. But lucky's not the word for it. Gunners fired as the four helicopters approached Britain's most exposed military base in Afghanistan. This gunfire was nothing to what followed there. There had been warnings of a Taliban threat to helicopters to British troops were ready but as drawn broke the Taliban were ready, too. They were hidden near the helicopters and as we landed they prepared to launch their ambush. It came seconds after we hit the ground. The Taliban fired from several positions. Our camera damaged in the chaos. The troops retaliate with massive firepower."

Musharraf Says Armitage Threatened To Bomb Pakistan "Back To Stone Age." USA Today/AP (9/22) reports Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf says former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage "threatened to bomb his country 'back to the Stone Age' after the Sept. 11 attacks if he did not help the U.S. war on terrorism." In an interview for CBS' 60 Minutes, Musharraf said, "The intelligence director told me that (Armitage) said, 'Be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the Stone Age.' I think it was a very rude remark." By "agreeing to cooperate with the United States, Musharraf said, he reacted responsibly. 'One has to think and take actions in the interests of the nation, and that is what I did,' he said." USA adds Armitage "disputed the language attributed to him but did not deny his message was a strong one, 60 Minutes said."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/21, Todd) reported that the US relationship with Pakistan has "hit at a very sensitive stage." In a CBS "60 Minutes" interview Pakistani president Pervez Mushurraf "indicates they might have been bullied into" helping the US after the 9/11 attacks. Musharraf's intelligence director relayed a message from" Armitage that if "Pakistan didn't help the U.S. in the war on terror, Musharraf says 'the intelligence director told me that Armitage said be prepared to be bombed. Be prepared to go back to the stone age.'" Armitage denies making that specific remarks but says he delivered a tough message to Pakistan at the time.

Albright Says Cohen, Pentagon Notified Pakistanis Of Attack Against Bin Laden. Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright on CNN's The Situation Room (9/21, Blitzer) described her problems with the recent ABC documentary on the 9/11 attacks saying, "And on a very particular case which had to do warning the Pakistani of the facts were totally wrong. It was Secretary Cohen and the Defense Department that wanted to make sure that the Pakistanis did not think they were being attacked by India at a time that we were launching cruise missiles against Osama bin Laden. So when the missiles were already in the air, Joe Ralston Vice President of the Joint Chiefs was with the Pakistanis."

Conferees Approve $70 Billion In Iraq, Afghanistan War Funds. The AP (9/22, Taylor) reports House-Senate negotiators "approved a new $70 billion infusion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan as they wrapped up talks on a $447 billion Pentagon funding bill." The additional war funds "would bring the total approved by Congress for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan since Sept. 11, 2001, to more than $500 billion, with another installment likely to come next spring." Meanwhile, the White House "beat back an attempt by Republicans on the appropriations committees to take an additional $2 billion from defense programs to ease cuts to domestic programs such as education and grants to local governments." The bill 'would be the first of 11 spending bills to clear Congress for the budget year beginning Oct. 1. With progress so slow on other bills — the homeland security bill is the only other spending measure likely to pass before Congress adjourns next week to campaign for fall elections — the Pentagon measure will also carry a stopgap funding bill to keep open agencies whose funding bills won't have passed."

The Wall Street Journal (9/22, A4, Rogers, 2.03M) reports together with "prior appropriations for Iraq, the total U.S. commitment will now approach $375 billion, and final concessions to the White House could squeeze billions from domestic spending bills delayed until after the November elections." Together, "the defense and homeland-security budgets, are two of the last major legislative packages Republicans hope to complete before sending members home next week to campaign, and each will be used to carry additional legislation." The defense bill, "for example, will incorporate a stopgap funding bill to keep domestic agencies operating through Nov. 17, buying time for a lame-duck session after the elections."

CQ (9/22, Cahlink, Higa) reports, "Contrary to the wishes of House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, the conference report on the $447.4 billion measure also includes a continuing resolution that will fund programs in bills not completed by the Oct. 1 start of the new fiscal year. The stopgap spending measure, which will last until Nov. 17, will fund those programs at the same level as in fiscal 2006." Lewis had "preferred that the measure be passed individually, as is usually the case."

The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Levey, 918K) reports the "agreement on the 2007 defense appropriations bill — expected to be approved by the full House and Senate next week — spares Republicans the embarrassment of leaving Washington without funding the cash-strapped military." But it "marked another grim milestone for wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that by one estimate have already cost two-thirds as much as the Vietnam War, which lasted more than twice as long as the current conflicts have so far." The "prolonged and difficult negotiations over next year's Pentagon funding underscored the financial toll of war-related costs on other military-related services. On the same day Republican leaders hammered out their agreement, advocates for military families came to Capitol Hill to talk about cutbacks in military-base libraries, child-care centers and other services for armed forces personnel and their kin."

Democrats Say Administration Shortchanging Army Base Operation Funds. McClatchy (9/22, Brown) reports House Democrats said the Army "is $500 million short of the money it needs to operate its bases this year because of the war in Iraq, forcing many posts to cut back on training, force protection and family support programs." Since June, "some Army installations have had to close mess halls, reduce training time and cut back on ammunition, equipment, food and fuel to non-deploying units. Funds for family support activities, including child care, gyms, bus services and other programs have also been cut, hurting morale for families whose loved ones are fighting overseas, the congressional Democrats said at a press conference." The Democrats said the "Bush administration failed to anticipate the Army's needs and budget enough money to cover those expenditures, the group said."

Casey Says Iraq Conflict Becoming Internal Struggle. The AP (9/22, Becatoros) reports Gen. George Casey, the top US general in Iraq, said the "conflict in Iraq is changing from a fight against U.S.-led coalition forces to an internal struggle for political and economic power." Casey "acknowledged the security situation has become more difficult in the past few months, and said Iraqi leaders must find common ground on key issues if progress is to be made." Casey said, "We're starting to see this conflict here transition from an insurgency against us to a struggle for the division of political and economic power among the Iraqis." The AP adds Casey said "reducing violence in the capital is crucial to any possible success in Iraq."

Bush Assertion On Iraqi Civil War Disputed. In response to Wednesday's interview with President Bush who stated that Iraq was not in the midst of a civil war, CNN's The Situation Room (9/21, Ware) reported, "Well it certainly feels like a civil war to the people on the street." If "Bush talks about the sources of information, these people, everyone within the U.S. forces here live in a bubble. They couldn't be further distanced from the Iraqi reality than humanly imaginable."

Clinton Suggests Motivation For Toppling Saddam Was Based On GOP's 1980s Iraq Ties. Former President Bill Clinton in an interview on Larry King shown from Wednesday night shown on CNN's The Situation Room (9/21) said, "And I think they thought it might clean their own skirts a little since most of what Saddam did was really terrible when he had the full support of the Republican Administration in the '80s of which Dick Cheney was a part. To be fair to them, it was the example of the old adage that the enemy of my enemy is my friend."

UN Official Says Use Of Torture In Iraq May Be Worse Than It Was Under Saddam. The AP (9/22, Engeler) reports Manfred Nowak, the U.N. special investigator on torture, said "torture in Iraq may be worse now than it was under Saddam Hussein, with militias, terrorist groups and government forces disregarding rules on the humane treatment of prisoners." Nowak "made the remarks as he was presenting a report on detainee conditions at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay as well as to brief the U.N. Human Rights Council, the global body's top rights watchdog, on torture worldwide." Nowak said "reports from Iraq indicate that torture 'is totally out of hand,'" adding, "The situation is so bad many people say it is worse than it has been in the times of Saddam Hussein."

Group Of Anti-War Activists Arrested At White House. The Washington Post (9/22, A8, Montes, 748K) reports a "group of ministers, veterans and peace activists attempted to deliver a 'declaration of peace' to the White House yesterday, kicking off a week of vigils and other activities in 350 communities across the country calling for the prompt withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq." Thirty-four people "were arrested here and charged with disorderly conduct after they demanded to speak with President Bush, then refused to leave the west gate of the White House. As part of an initiative of more than 400 groups, many of them religiously affiliated, the activists said they had to 'bear moral witness' against the U.S. military role in Iraq." The "day's activities also featured vigils for peace in dozens of cities and towns."

Army Makes Recruiting Goal, Optimistic About Next Year. The AP (9/22, Burns) reports that Army Secretary Francis Harvey said "The Army is ending its best recruiting year since 1997 and expecting similar success in 2007," in "a considerable turnaround from last year." This "trend in recruiting is particularly important for the Army now because it is striving to expand its overall ranks. The expansion is fundamental to an Army plan that increases the number of combat brigades." It appears that "a package of new financial incentives, new recruiting approaches and a bigger recruiting corps did the trick. Army recruiters are making more use of the Internet to attract young prospects, and the Army this year began allowing people as old as 42 to enter the service." It also "has accepted a larger number of recruits whose score on a standardized aptitude test is at the lower end of the acceptable range, and it has granted waivers to permit the enlistment of people with criminal records that otherwise would disqualify them."

Army Facing "Severe" Personnel Strain. The New York Times (9/22, Shanker, Gordon, 1.21M) reports, "Strains on the Army from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have become so severe that Army officials say they may be forced to make greater use of the National Guard to provide enough troops for overseas deployments. Senior Army officers have discussed that analysis…with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's senior adviser on personnel, David S. C. Chu," but "the prospect presents the Bush administration with a politically vexing problem: how, without expanding the Army, to balance the pressing need for troops in the field against promises to limit overseas deployments for the Guard." Meanwhile there are "many signs of mounting strain on active Army units," and "An internal Army document that was provided to The New York Times notes that the demand for troops in Iraq and Afghanistan has greatly exceeded past projections that predicted earlier troop reductions." While "Rumsfeld has not favored substantially expanding the Army, concluding that such a step would draw money from programs he favors to overhaul the military and calculating that the high level of troops in Iraq and Afghanistan will prove temporary," Gordon R. Sullivan, the former Army chief of staff and president of the Association of the United States Army, said "that the Army was simply too small for the many responsibilities it faced," and "Barry R. McCaffrey, the retired four-star Army general, also asserted that the armed forces needed to be expanded."

Western Washington USA Says Budget Cuts Slow Prosecutions. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (9/22, Shukovsky) reports, "The federal prosecutor for Western Washington says his office is 'stressed to the limit' because of years of budget cuts that threaten to slow the pace of criminal prosecutions." The P-I continues, "U.S. Attorney John McKay has issued this warning to county prosecutors and special agents in charge of federal agencies, including the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and Immigration and Customs Enforcement: 'We may not be as responsive as you want us to be on the cases you refer to us.'" The P-I adds, "The office has been hemorrhaging prosecutors and support staff members even as the other Washington is poised to impose another budget cut for the 2006-07 fiscal year. … The office, which handles federal criminal prosecutions and civil cases involving the U.S. government, is down six criminal prosecutors and one civil attorney, leaving 58 assistant U.S. attorneys, McKay said. … Fourteen positions in the office are unfilled, and McKay still must pay his 118 employees a mandatory 3 percent cost-of-living raise. … McKay said he is proud that the office has been able to maintain its productivity -- prosecuting more than 800 defendants last year. … But cases that might have been prosecuted under tougher federal laws are increasingly being sent to local prosecutors."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Hewlett-Packard CEO Likely To Testify Before House Committee. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Rogers, Clark) reports, "Hewlett-Packard Co. Chief Executive Mark Hurd appears headed for a House committee examining the 'pretexting' scandal at the company." The Journal continues, "Mr. Hurd yesterday offered to testify after Rep. Joe Barton of Texas, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said the computer maker's top executive may be called as a witness. … The hearing, scheduled for Thursday before the House subcommittee on oversight and investigations, already had a witness list that includes H-P General Counsel Ann Baskins and Patricia Dunn, the H-P chairman who pushed for an investigation of board leaks." The Journal adds, "In other developments, H-P disclosed that the Securities and Exchange Commission's enforcement division had made new requests for information from the company. In a filing on Sept. 6, H-P reported that the SEC's corporation-finance department had requested information about an H-P filing last May that reported the resignation of director Thomas Perkins, who resigned in protest over the leak investigation."

The New York Times (9/22, Darlin, Richtel) reports, "Pressure is mounting on Hewlett-Packard's chief executive, Mark V. Hurd, to explain what appears to have been a greater role in the company's spying operation than was initially indicated." The Times continues, "Mr. Hurd has largely escaped mention in connection with the company's efforts to obtain private phone records and otherwise trace leaks from its board. But on Thursday, after his name figured in documents newly appearing in the investigation, Hewlett-Packard's stock price fell significantly for the first time since the revelations began early this month." The Times adds, "The California attorney general, Bill Lockyer, threatened at one point Thursday to issue subpoenas to Hewlett-Packard because of what he said was a lack of cooperation in his criminal investigation. But later in the day, a spokesman for his office said H.P. had expressed a willingness to cooperate, as the attorney general wanted. … The problem for Mr. Hurd arises from a sheaf of e-mail messages and other documents obtained by news organizations that suggest that he approved of at least one aspect of the spying operation, offered names of possible targets and may have been briefed by the supervisors of the effort at the start of a crucial phase. .. .None of the leaked documents directly implicate Mr. Hurd. He did not write any of the e-mail messages, nor is it clear that he was sent copies of others that refer to him and actions attributed to him. … But what may yet emerge — Hewlett-Packard delivered more than 5,000 pages of documents to investigators with the House Committee on Energy and Commerce this week, and more are expected Monday — is what seems to have worried investors and analysts."

SEC Seeks Probe Information As Lockyer Alleges HP Non-cooperation. Bloomberg (9/22, Frank, Gullo) reports, "Hewlett-Packard Co. received a request for information from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission over its investigation into media leaks as California Attorney General Bill Lockyer complained the company stopped cooperating with him." Bloomberg continues, "Hewlett-Packard disputed Lockyer's assertions and said it is cooperating with his probe, as well as reviews by the SEC, U.S. Justice Department and a congressional committee. Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd offered to appear before the committee, the company said today. … 'Today we ran into a brick wall,' Lockyer said in an interview. 'Frankly I'm pretty angry about it. I've instructed my lawyers this morning to paper the place with subpoenas.'" Bloomberg adds, "The SEC probe and Lockyer's statements intensify the scandal hanging over Hewlett-Packard on the eve of Hurd's first press conference to discuss the methods the company used to uncover the source of boardroom leaks to the media. Lockyer said some tactics, including the use of fake identities to obtain phone records, are criminal."

USA Today (9/22, Hopkins, Swartz) reports, "The SEC's enforcement division is seeking records and information related to HP director Tom Perkins' resignation in May, HP said. The division also wants information about HP's news-leak probes and related Sept. 6 and May 22 SEC filings by the company. HP said it is cooperating." USA continues, "

HP Stock Value Declines. The Washington Post (9/22, D1, Noguchi, Masters) reports, "The scandal over Hewlett-Packard Co.'s conduct in investigating press leaks started affecting its business yesterday for the first time, weighing down its stock price and raising questions about the future of its leadership." The Post continues, "Shares of the printing and computing company dropped 5 percent, the first major price dip since the company revealed early this month that it had obtained personal phone records of its board members and nine journalists under false pretenses. HP shares, which had been trading near a 52-week high of $37.25, dropped $1.91 to close at $34.87."

HP Parts Ways With Wilson Sonsini. The American Lawyer (9/22, Beck) reports, "Hewlett-Packard Co. said Thursday it has dropped Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati as its outside counsel in the California attorney general's criminal investigation of the company." The AL continues, "Wilson, HP says, will continue to represent the company in other matters, but in a written statement by spokesman Ryan Donovan, the company said that 'Hewlett-Packard and Wilson Sonsini mutually agreed it would be in the best interests of both parties for Wilson to terminate its representation of HP in the California attorney general's inquiry.'" The AL adds, "Wilson chair Larry Sonsini has been HP's primary outside counsel for years, advising the client on the massive Agilent Technologies Inc. spin-off in 1999, and guiding it during the tumultuous proxy fight waged by former director Walter Hewlett that spanned 2001-2002. Sonsini has stated that he was not involved in the design of the leaks probe, but he did review the results of the probe for the company, and initially took the position that it was 'within legal limits.'" The AL notes, "In a separate news release, HP announced that it will hold a press conference Friday where CEO Mark Hurd and lawyers from Morgan, Lewis & Bockius will address the leaks investigation. The press release states that Morgan Lewis was retained on Sept. 8 by HP to conduct a 'comprehensive analysis of the leak investigations.' It also notes that, 'Morgan Lewis also is representing HP in connection with several government inquiries.'"

Dunn's Attorney Says Don't Blame Her. The California Recorder (9/22, Scheck) reports, "Don't blame Hewlett-Packard Chairman Patricia Dunn, her new lawyer said Wednesday, for the convulsions the company's board have suffered in the wake of its troubled investigation of boardroom leaks. … 'She's neither a lawyer nor is she an investigator,' said James Brosnahan, the Morrison & Foerster litigator whom Dunn hired this week. 'And she's not the kind of person, frankly, who would advise people to do something illegal.'" The Recorder continues, "Dunn has come under scrutiny for her role in directing the troubled probe -- The Wall Street Journal reported Wednesday that she closely supervised it -- and she's the latest figure in the imbroglio to get a big-name lawyer in response to multiple government investigations. … Brosnahan, long-known for handling high-profile clients -- including John Walker Lindh, the Marin County man once charged with fighting for the Taliban -- will represent Dunn before a congressional subcommittee and in the state and federal investigations into HP's probe of board members, journalists and employees."

Dunn Receives Award From California Business Executives. CNET News (9/22, McCullagh) reports, "Hewlett-Packard's embattled chairman, Patricia Dunn, accepted a 'hall of fame' leadership award at a gala dinner (in San Francisco) on Wednesday night where she received a standing ovation from local executives." CNET continues, "The applause and paeans to a long and successful career seemed to gratify Dunn, who has been the subject of ongoing criticism and media scrutiny since reports in the last two weeks revealed that she had called for and perhaps helped to direct an intrusive probe into boardroom leaks. … Dunn thanked the Bay Area Council, a regional business lobbying and networking group, for 'courage in standing by your decision (to grant the award) in such unexpected circumstances.' … 'All I will say about the maelstrom is that I look forward eagerly, in the near future, to the time when I can set the record straight and go back to leading my life as discreetly as possible,' Dunn said during her after-dinner speech. … The bizarre juxtaposition of receiving a leadership award from an organization that stresses business ethics and good corporate governance was not lost on Dunn, who said she's aware of the 'irony of being inducted into the Bay Area Business Hall of Fame.' .. . But for the most part, other dinner speakers offered plaudits to Dunn--there was even a slideshow with her high school yearbook photo--with only passing references to her recent troubles."

Schumer, Feinstein Press DOJ Over Probe Of Former Gemstar CEO. Bloomberg (9/22) reports, "Gemstar-TV Guide International Inc. has enlisted two U.S. senators to press the Justice Department to speed up its investigation into what role the company's former chief executive, Henry Yuen, played in a $248-million accounting fraud." Bloomberg continues, "Democratic Sens. Charles E. Schumer of New York and Dianne Feinstein of California wrote Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales to inquire about the government's case against Yuen, who withdrew eight months ago from a plea agreement with federal prosecutors in Los Angeles after a federal judge said the deal was too lenient. The senators also forwarded a letter from Gemstar's general counsel warning that a legal deadline to charge Yuen was approaching. … The Yuen case 'may raise some questions about the adequacy of tools available to prosecutors to fight corporate wrongdoing,[Schumer wrote in his Sept. 13 letter to Gonzales." Bloomberg adds, "While saying he didn't want to interfere, Schumer added, 'It is important that Congress be kept well-informed about this and other similar cases so we can monitor the enforcement of the laws designed to protect average Americans from the type of conduct of which Mr. Yuen has been accused.' … Feinstein, who wrote Gonzales on Aug. 23, said, 'I do not believe it is appropriate for me to intervene in prosecutorial decisions,' but the Gemstar general counsel's letter 'does raise some serious allegations.' … The letters ratchet up a campaign by Gemstar to have Yuen sent to prison for his role in the fraud. The company, which has paid more than $100 million in civil settlements and attorneys' fees in connection with the accounting missteps, has taken the unusual stance that it is a victim of Yuen's alleged crimes."

Cablevision Awarded Backdated Options Grant To Dead Official. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Grant, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "Cablevision Systems Corp. awarded options to a vice chairman after his 1999 death but backdated them, making it appear the grant was awarded when he still was alive, according to a company filing and people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "The country's fifth-largest cable operator in terms of subscribers also improperly awarded a compensation consultant options but accounted for them as if he were an employee, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission filing, citing the results of a six-week investigation by an outside law firm." The Journal adds, "The findings of the probe were released yesterday as the Bethpage, N.Y., company restated its financial results and said two of its directors had stepped down from posts on the board's audit and compensation committees as part of an escalating investigation into its improper granting of stock options. … The company also said it had received a grand jury subpoena in connection with an investigation into its options practices from the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of New York." The Journal notes, "The improprieties regarding the deceased executive -- Vice Chairman Marc Lustgarten, who died in 1999 -- and a compensation consultant are among the more unusual allegations of abuse that have surfaced in the scores of investigations that have been launched this year over improper stock-options practices. About 100 companies are under federal investigation for possibly backdating or otherwise manipulating stock-option grants to secretly boost their value."

SEC Tightens Scrutiny Of Hedge Funds. The Financial Times (9/22, Grant) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission is tightening scrutiny of hedge funds by stepping up examination of the links between hedge funds and broker-dealers, particularly where they are owned by a hedge fund, a senior SEC official said." The Times continues, "The move is a sign that the SEC continues to find ways to regulate hedge funds after a US court federal court in June overturned an SEC rule forcing hedge fund advisers to register with the agency. .. .Walter Ricciardi, deputy director of enforcement, said: 'I think some of the problems we've seen with hedge funds, one of the risk factors, red flags, is where they have their own broker-dealer. … That creates quite a conflict in the sense that investors' money is sitting there and a hedge fund decides to trade through their own broker-dealer and [the hedge fund] gets a fee for such trading. … It gives them an incentive to run up trading fees. It may not be in the best interests of investors,' he told the Financial Times." The Times adds, "While the SEC's office of compliance already conducts routine inspection of broker-dealers, Mr Ricciardi said the enforcement division – which is focused on alleged wrongdoing in the securities markets – was 'stepping up [the focus] on hedge funds'. .. The SEC took similar steps in the wake of the collapse of Long Term Capital Management in 1998."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ruling Could Lead Fitzgerald To Dismiss Charges Against Libby. In a move that was seen as a victory for former Vice Presidential aide Lewis Libby in the CIA leak case, MSNBC (9/21, Seidman) reported on its web site, "The judge in the CIA leak case ruled Thursday that if Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald feels that admitting certain classified documents at the upcoming trial of I Lewis 'Scooter' Libby can jeopardize national security, Fitzgerald can then move to dismiss the perjury charges against Libby." MSNBC adds, "Fitzgerald argues that because of the sensitive national security value of the classified materials, a special three part test must apply before determining if a document can be admitted at trial." But "Walton disagreed with Fitzgerald and favored Libby's attorney's argument that in reviewing the classified material to be presented at the hearing, he must simply apply the Federal Rules of Evidence."

The New York Times/AP (9/22) reports US District Judge Reggie Walton "decided that he won't impose strict standards sought by prosecutors who want to limit the amount of classified information used in the trial of defendant I. Lewis Libby." Prosecutors "had proposed a stringent three-part legal test that would have allowed information to be considered for the trial only when its benefit to the defense outweighed the government's need to keep it secret." Walton "sided with Libby's lawyers, who said any evidence that's relevant to the case should be considered for use. Once Walton rules on which evidence is relevant, government attorneys can propose portions to be blacked out or summarized, the judge said."

US Uses Terror Case Limits In Probe Of Alleged Mob Plot To Kill Judge. The New York Times (9/22, Rashbaum) reports, "Alberto R. Gonzales, the United States attorney general, has imposed a set of highly restrictive rules generally reserved for terror suspects on an imprisoned mob figure who is under investigation for plotting to kill a federal judge, a prosecutor and three Mafia turncoats, prosecutors disclosed yesterday." The Times continues, "The move was the latest development in an increasingly bizarre case. The mob figure in the case, Vincent Basciano, has contended that a list he wrote naming the judge and the others was not part of a murder plot, as prosecutors have asserted, but an effort to use a mystical religion to improve his chances at his forthcoming trial, at which he could face the death penalty." The Times adds, "The disclosure that Mr. Gonzales had imposed the measures was made at a hearing in United States District Court in Brooklyn. The judge in the case, Nicholas G. Garaufis, who prosecutors have said was one of Mr. Basciano's targets, also unsealed a transcript from an Aug. 28 hearing at which the investigation and the list were discussed. … In July, Mr. Basciano provided the list to a fellow inmate at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Manhattan who, unknown to Mr. Basciano, was cooperating with the authorities. Prosecutors have said Mr. Basciano indicated to the inmate that he wanted the people on the list killed. … The transcript of the Aug. 28 hearing provided additional details about what Mr. Basciano, known as Vinny Gorgeous, has said was his effort to use Santeria, a Caribbean religion, to influence the outcome of the trial."

Allegations Of Santeria Rituals Surface. Long Island Newsday (9/22, DeStefano) reports, "Eager to seek an edge in his recent racketeering trial, reputed Bonanno crime family member Vincent Basciano was told by a fellow jail inmate to place a list with names of the prosecutor, trial judge and witnesses in his shoe and stomp his foot five times to get good luck. … The resulting list that Basciano drew up to carry out the ritual was simply part of a Santeria-related method and not a hit list as prosecutors have suspected, his defense attorneys said Thursday." Newsday continues, "Basciano, at one time the acting street boss of the Bonanno crime family, is under investigation for allegedly creating the list and in 'sum and substance' giving it to his fellow inmate to seek the murder of the listed persons, Brooklyn federal prosecutors have stated in court papers. … Named on the list were assistant U.S. attorney Greg Andres, who prosecuted Basciano earlier this year; federal judge Nicholas Garaufis; disgraced attorney Tom Lee; and mob turncoats Dominick Cicale and James Tartaglione, court papers stated. … But while prosecutors put a sinister spin on the list and Basciano's attempt to seek magical intervention, his lawyers say that wasn't the case at all. … During a court hearing Thursday and in interviews, Basciano's attorneys related how their client was seeking Santeria help and not seeking murders."

Basciano Attorneys Deny Allegations. The New York Law Journal (9/22, Perrotta) reports, "Attorneys for a former Mafia boss who might face the death penalty in an upcoming trial expressed dismay Wednesday at the unsealing of court documents that reveal their client, Vincent Basciano, is under investigation for a potential plot to kill a federal judge." The Journal continues, "The attorneys, James Kousouros and Ephraim Savitt, said they would ask for an evidentiary hearing into the alleged plot against Eastern District Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis, which Kousouros said did not exist. Kousouros said it was 'very unfortunate' that he was not notified by federal prosecutors that the document was going to be made public late Tuesday evening. … 'I'm not saying we were entitled to notice,' Kousouros said. 'We have to now consider motions for recusal. This now creates a mess.' … He said the unsealed papers could taint the jury pool, and might contribute to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' decision on whether the government will seek the death penalty."

FBI Searches Cook County Offices In Political Hiring Probe. The Chicago Tribune (9/22, Ciokajlo, Becker, Coen, 623K) reports, "FBI agents fanned out across Cook County on Thursday with grand jury subpoenas and a search warrant, probing deep into the role clout plays in county hiring. … The flurry of activity indicated that federal prosecutors are now taking a hard look at clout and hiring in Cook County, even as they are investigating state hiring by the Blagojevich administration and city hiring by the Daley administration." Cook County Board President Bobbie Steele said in a statement that "the subpoenas seek documents related to 'non-exempt' jobs," which "are supposed to be filled on the basis of qualifications, not political influence." The Tribune notes "sources familiar with the investigation" said that "the search warrant was issued specifically for the human resources bureau because that is an area where records are concentrated."

The Chicago Sun-Times (9/22, Pallasch, Korecki, Patterson, Herman) reports, "FBI agents could be seen carrying boxes of documents out of the Cook County Human Resources Department," and as "the seizure of documents proceeded downtown, federal agents served the search warrant at other county offices, too — including Provident Hospital, Cermak Hospital and the forest preserve district. … FBI spokesman Ross Rice said the search warrant is tied to a criminal affidavit that is under seal. 'We're looking for possible evidence of a crime,' Rice said. No arrests have been made and no charges filed, Rice said." WMAQ-TV (9/21, Rogers) noted that "agents may have accessed the office's computer servers, looking for information about hiring practices and possibly the testing of Cook County employees."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/22) reports, "FBI spokeswoman Cynthia Yates would not say what the investigation was about." Alderman Todd Stroger "said he believes the raid was connected to an activist's request that a federal monitor oversee county hiring to prevent abuses. Stroger's Republican opponent, Anthony Peraica, said the raid stemmed from a 'criminal conspiracy to deny the rights of well-qualified persons and applicants jobs that were instead given to the politically connected.'"

Former New Orleans Prosecutor Sentenced To Life In Prison In Rape Case. The AP (9/22) reports former New Orleans deputy city attorney Henry A. Dillon "was sentenced Thursday to life in prison for using his position to rape two women in his office. … 'He committed unspeakable acts of violence against innocent women while disguising himself as a public servant,' U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said in a news release. Dillon, 49, raped each woman after telling her in Municipal Court that he needed her to come to his office to complete some court business, according to the indictment. Dillon admitted having sex with both women, but said it was consensual," which US District Judge Lance Africk said to Dillon during the sentencing, "calls into question your grip on reality."

Wife Of Former Alabama Mayor Pleads Guilty To Obstructing Corruption Probe. The AP (9/22) reports, "Crystal McDonald Russo, wife of former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo, pleaded guilty in federal court Thursday to one felony obstruction of justice charge as part of a plea agreement with prosecutors. Prosecutors agreed to dismiss two other counts against her and recommend a sentence that will likely only get Crystal Russo probation."

She "was facing trial next month for allegedly trying to help her…husband hide $96,000 that was sought for forfeiture by prosecutors in their probe of the former mayor."

Online Betting Probes In US Cloud Prospects For Industry. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Schatz) reports, "Two recent arrests of online-gambling executives in the U.S. are drawing attention to a spirited but so far unsuccessful effort in Washington to clarify the legal status of Internet gambling and resolve the political and legal issues of regulating it." The Journal continues, "Earlier this month, Peter Dicks, at the time nonexecutive chairman of Sportingbet PLC, Britain's largest publicly traded Internet-gambling company, was arrested in New York on a Louisiana warrant. That followed the July arrest of David Carruthers, then-chief executive of BetOnSports PLC on federal charges. The two cases aren't directly related but have combined to spook executives of foreign Internet-gambling companies, which are wary of entering the U.S." The Journal adds, "The developments underscore a fundamental problem for the Internet-gambling industry: U.S. lawmakers haven't agreed on whether the practice is legal. This summer the House passed legislation that would outlaw most forms of Internet gambling, including poker and casino-style games. But similar legislation is in limbo in the Senate, despite recent efforts by Majority Leader Bill Frist to attach the measure onto a must-pass defense-authorization bill this year. .. . Taming Internet gambling is difficult, however, given uncertainty about which rules apply to it. The Bush administration maintains that all interstate Internet gambling is illegal, but acknowledges that enforcement is sporadic. To shut down Internet sites, prosecutors rely mostly on the 45-year-old federal Wire Act, which prohibits sports betting across state lines, but was written with telephone, not Internet, lines in mind. … But not all judges agree that Internet gambling is already illegal, and Internet-gambling companies argue the Wire Act doesn't apply to the Internet." The Journal notes, "Some forms of gambling have largely avoided the U.S. government's focus. For example, the government has done nothing to stop Youbet.com, a publicly traded Internet company in Woodland Hills, Calif., that offers betting on horse racing. … Justice Department officials say they launched a civil probe into Internet-gambling operations, including horse betting, last year, but say they have limited resources."

US Charges WTC Painter With 9/11 Fund Fraud. Long Island Newsday (9/22, Maloney) reports, "A New Jersey painter was arrested Thursday on charges he bilked the U.S. Justice Department's Sept. 11 compensation fund of more than $1 million -- the biggest scam yet." Newsday continues, "Mario Mastellone, 39, of East Windsor was accused in an indictment in U.S. District Court in Manhattan of accepting $1.07 million from the September 11 Victim Compensation Fund of 2001 by falsely claiming that had been disabled that day and had not worked since. … His lawyer, Peter Bark of Central Islip, said his client had suffered disabling back injuries and has not worked since then, except for a recent job as an extra on a film set, which the Justice Department had approved. … 'He's been victimized twice -- once by him being in the World Trade Center on 9/11 and now by the U.S. Attorney's office,' Bark said." Newsday adds, "Prosecutors said Mastellone lied to a Department of Justice agent investigating his case and lied to a hearing officer evaluating his claim for compensation. According to the indictment, he also fraudulently sought compensation from the New York State Workers' Compensation Board and the Painting Industry Insurance Fund. … If convicted of fraud charges, Mastellone could face up to 40 years in prison."

Prosecutors Say Resentment, Debts Drove Dealer To Steal Rare Maps. The AP (9/22) reports, "A renowned dealer who admitted stealing nearly 100 rare antique maps acted out of resentment toward the prestigious libraries and to pay for his expensive tastes and mounting debts, prosecutors said Thursday" for the sentencing of E. Forbes Smiley III. "Prosecutors did not specify a sentence, but recommended he be given credit for his cooperation with the investigation that led to the recovery of most of the maps." The AP notes, "The British Library has raised suspicions that Smiley stole additional maps, a charge he has denied. Authorities defended their investigation" and "said inaccurate cataloguing by some libraries, wide public access to materials and other issues made it difficult to prove Smiley stole a particular map. 'Based on this review, the FBI has not identified other information suggesting that Smiley has a hidden cache of maps or is protecting some unidentified purchaser of his maps,' prosecutors wrote."

Credit Card Companies Pledge To Help Curb Child Pornography. The New York Times (9/22, Files) reports, "Executives from credit card companies, including Visa, MasterCard and American Express, told a Congressional panel Thursday that they were determined to eliminate the use of their services in the Internet child pornography business. … But they also said it was difficult to keep pace with those who seek to exploit children on the Web and called for broad collaboration among those in the financial services industry and law enforcement authorities around the world. … 'Child pornography is a global problem in need of a coordinated response,' said Mark MacCarthy, a senior vice president for public policy for Visa U.S.A." The Times adds, "Mr. MacCarthy said that by working together with other financial services companies, the industry could 'enhance our efforts to identify Web sites and pinpoint merchants that are trafficking in this illicit activity, cut them off from use of our network and provide assistance to law enforcement to put them in jail and shut them down for good. … The way forward lies in collective action,' he said." The Times notes, "Mr. MacCarthy and other executives testified at a hearing of the oversight and investigations subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The hearing was the sixth this year convened by the subcommittee to examine the growth of child pornography online. … Others who spoke to the committee included Ernie Allen, the president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, and Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, who led an investigation that in 2004 dismantled an Internet child pornography service stretching from Eastern Europe to Mount Laurel, N.J."

DeGette, Whitfield Working On Data Retention Bill. CNET News (9/22, Broache, McCullagh) reports, "A Democratic member of the U.S. House of Representatives said Thursday that she plans to introduce legislation next week that would force Internet providers to record customer information for one year." CNET continues, "Rep. Diana DeGette of Colorado said that she is working with Republicans Reps. Ed Whitfield, chairman of the House Energy and Commerce oversight and investigations subcommittee, and Joe Barton, chairman of the full committee, to finalize language mandating a controversial practice known as data retention. … 'Internet service providers across the board do retain this data for some period of time right now, so all were doing in this legislation is requiring a standard in the industry,' DeGette said at a morning hearing here on online child pornography, which was at least the sixth event dealing with online child exploitation in the House this year." CNET adds, "The data retention requirement is necessary because members of Congress have 'learned that Internet service providers and social networking sites have information that law enforcement needs when investigating pedophiles online, and that is the IP address on a particular date and time that will help identify those involved,' said Whitfield, a Kentucky Republican who is also heading a probe into Hewlett-Packard's boardroom scandal." CNET notes, "Privacy groups and industry groups have generally opposed mandatory data retention, with some companies such as Comcast voluntarily agreeing to retain user data for longer periods. Also, under an earlier proposal described by DeGette, the information would be available not only to police but to civil litigants as well, including divorce lawyers hoping to track someone down or employers embroiled in a lawsuit with a former employee. .. . Plans to enact the Bush administration's data retention proposal--reiterated this week by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales--have been brewing in Congress for months but have received increased attention as the November elections draw near."

US Probing Ela Medical Payments To Doctors. The New York Times (9/22, Meier) reports, "Ela Medical, a small producer of implantable heart devices, said this week that it had received a subpoena from federal health care fraud officials seeking information about possible inducements paid by the company to doctors using its products." The Times continues, "In response to an inquiry last week from a reporter, Ela Medical stated that it had received an administrative subpoena from the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services. The company is a division of the Sorin Group, which is based in Milan. … According to Ela Medical, the subpoena sought any documents related to 'arrangements, clinical studies, provision of monitoring equipment and services and other agreements by which the company may have provided benefits to persons in a position to recommend purchase of devices.'" The Times adds, "Federal law prohibits certain types of payments to doctors that are meant to influence their choice of a particular product. Ela Medical, which has previously said that it complied with all relevant laws, said in its statement that it was cooperating with the investigation. .. . Last year, the Justice Department started to investigate the country's biggest makers of heart devices — Medtronic, St. Jude and Guidant — to determine if they provided doctors with excessive payments to enroll patients in postmarketing studies of their devices as a way of increasing sales. All three companies have said they did nothing wrong."

Pediatrix Makes Final Payment In Settlement Of DOJ Billing Probe. The AP (9/22) reports, "Pediatrix Medical Group Inc. on Thursday said it paid the federal government $25.1 million as part of its final settlement with the Justice Department related to a probe into the company's billing practices." The AP continues, "The settlement ends a federal investigation into the company's Medicaid and Tricare practices related to neonatal services provided between January 1996 and December 1999. In addition, the pediatric services provider said it would reach separate state settlements for each state Medicaid program involved." The AP adds, "Information for the period 2000 to 2003 also was reviewed as part of the investigation, and Pediatrix is not making any payments for this period. … Pediatrix announced a tentative settlement in February and set aside reserves related to the investigation during periods through December 2005. The settlement will not affect the company's operating results this year."

Ex-IRS Mailroom Employees To Get Back Pay In Outsourcing Suit Settlement. The Washington

DOJ_NMG_0067103

Post (9/22, D4, Barr, 748K) "Federal Diary" column reports 10 former IRS mailroom employees "who lost their jobs because of outsourcing will receive about $4,000 each in back pay" as part of a settlement in a lawsuit brought by the National Treasury Employees Union.

Senators Urge DOJ To Appeal A Court Tobacco Ruling. At least two local newscasts covered the letter by 15 U.S. Senators urging attorney general Alberto Gonzales to appeal a district court's ruling that allows cigarette makers to avoid major financial penalties. WCIA-TV Champaign, (9/21, 12:11 p.m.) reported, "Durbin is among 15 senators who want the U.S. Attorney General to penalize tobacco companies. The lawmakers submitted a letter to Alberto Gonzalez asking him to appeal a district court's ruling, which limited penalties against tobacco companies who break the law. Durbin says nearly seven thousand state residents die from lung cancer each year."

WTWO-TV Terre Haute, (9/21, 05:00 p.m.) reported, "Illinois Senator Dick Durbin and 14 other senators want the U.S. Attorney General to go after tobacco companies. The lawmakers have written a letter to Alberto Gonzalez asking him to appeal a district court's ruling, which puts some limitations on penalizing tobacco companies that have broken the law."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ To Review Appointment Of Alabama Commissioner. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (9/22, Murtaugh) reports, "Juan Chastang's future as a Mobile County commissioner is now in the hands of the U.S. Department of Justice, after the state decided not to appeal a federal court order handed down last month, a spokesman from the attorney general's office said." The Register continues, "The order, handed down by a panel of three federal judges Aug. 18, said Gov. Bob Riley had 90 days to get clearance from the Justice Department that the Chastang appointment complied with the Voting Rights Act of 1965." The Register adds, "If the Justice Department approves the appointment, nothing will change and Chastang, the commission's president, will continue to represent District 1. .. . But if the department finds that the appointment violated voters' rights, it could force Chastang out of office and call for a special election to fill the seat. … Suzanne Webb, a spokeswoman for the Alabama Attorney General's office, said Tuesday that the governor would not appeal the judges' decision to the U.S. Supreme Court and would instead ask for Justice Department clearance."

Rights Groups Seek DOJ Bias Probe Of San Francisco Chronicle, Job-Fair Firm. The San Francisco Chronicle (9/21, Page B - 2, Hua) reports, "The Chronicle and a firm that produces job fairs tried to bar noncitizens from an employment event in June, according to a complaint the ACLU and other civil rights groups filed Tuesday with the federal Justice Department." The Chronicle continues, "The Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights, the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California and the ACLU Immigrants' Rights Project allege that Expo Experts, a Cincinnati company that organizes job fairs in partnership with newspapers nationwide, discriminates against legal immigrants. … The complaint, filed in Washington, D.C., charges that the company illegally bars noncitizens from attending job fairs in violation of federal anti-discrimination laws and asks the Justice Department to impose civil penalties and issue a cease-and-desist order to stop the practice. The civil rights groups filed a companion complaint against The Chronicle, which co-sponsored the June fair with Expo." The Chronicle adds, "An advertisement before the event, published in the newspaper and on its affiliated Web site, SFGate.com, said job-seekers were required to have U.S. citizenship to enter a pavilion featuring engineering, technology and security clearance positions, the complaint alleges. A second pavilion featured professional jobs. … When the Lawyers' Committee and the ACLU objected to the restriction in the days before the event, Expo Experts and The Chronicle removed the discriminatory language from the online version of the advertisement and opened both pavilions to all job-seekers, according to the complaint."

9th Circuit Panel Upholds California County's Ban On Library Prayer Service. The San Francisco Chronicle (9/22, Page B - 3, Egelko) reports, "Contra Costa County did not intrude on religious freedom when it barred a church from holding prayer services in a meeting room of the Antioch library, a federal appeals court ruled Wednesday in a case that drew arguments from the Bush administration in support of the church." The Chronicle continues, "In a 2-1 decision, the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco said that the Faith Center Church Evangelistic Ministries had the right to hold religious discussions in a room that was open to other community groups, but that the county could prohibit it from conducting worship services. … 'The county has a legitimate interest in ... excluding meeting room activities that may interfere with the library's primary function as a sanctuary for reading, writing and quiet contemplation,' and in preventing the room from being 'transformed into an occasional house of worship,' Judge Richard Paez said in the majority opinion." The Chronicle adds, "He acknowledged that there may be little difference between prayer services and other types of meetings by religious groups in some cases, and said judges and government agencies are not competent to make such distinctions. But in this case, Paez said, Faith Center itself described its planned library gathering as one for 'praise and worship.' … Judge Richard Tallman stressed the same issue in his dissenting opinion. 'Separating religious worship from other religious speech inevitably leads to state entanglement in religion' and is beyond the government's authority, he said."

ANTITRUST:

Samsung Executive Pleads Guilty To Price-Fixing. The AP (9/22, Caterinicchia) reports, "An executive from Samsung Semiconductor Inc., the world's largest manufacturer of dynamic random access memory (DRAM) used in computers, has agreed to plead guilty and to serve jail time for participating in a global price-fixing conspiracy, the Justice Department said Thursday." The AP continues, "Thomas Quinn, senior vice president of memory sales and marketing at the U.S. subsidiary of Korean firm Samsung Electronics Co. Ltd., was charged with a felony for his alleged participation in an agreement to fix DRAM prices and to coordinate bids in an auction held by a buyer." The AP adds, "The scheme directly affected sales to U.S. computer makers Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., Compaq Computer Corp., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Computer Inc., Gateway Inc., and Sun Microsystems Inc., according to the Justice Department. There were about $7.7 billion in DRAM sales in the U.S. in 2004, according to the department. … Under the plea agreement, which must be approved by the court, Quinn will serve eight months in prison and to pay a criminal fine of $250,000. In addition, Quinn has agreed to assist the Justice Department in its ongoing investigation. … 'Prison time for price-fixers remains the most potent deterrent to illegal cartel activity,' Thomas O. Barnett, Assistant Attorney General in charge of Justice's Antitrust Division, said in a release."

The San Jose Business Journal (9/22) reports, "The Justice Department said Thomas Quinn is the fourth Samsung manager to plead guilty in connection with the probe. Quinn is expected to serve eight months in prison and pay a $250,000 fine under the plea deal, and investigators said that if he had been convicted at trial, he could have faced a larger fine and a prison sentence of up to three years. … Quinn conspired to fix the price of memory chips sold to computer makers around 2001 and 2002, investigators said."

AFP (9/22) reports, "Quinn is the fourth Samsung executive to agree to a prison sentence in the investigation. Three foreign-based Samsung executives, Sun Woo Lee, Young Woo Lee and Yeongho Kang, previously pleaded guilty and agreed to serve prison terms ranging from seven to eight months. … In additional, jail terms were agreed for Hynix Semiconductor executives Dae Soo Kim, Chae Kyun Chung, Kun Chul Suh and Choon Yub Choi; and Infineon executives T. Rudd Corwin, Peter Schaefer, Gunter Hefner and Heinrich Florian."

Texas Airfield Agreement Amended To Allay Antitrust Concerns. The Dallas Morning News (9/22, Reddy) reports, "Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said Thursday that new language addressing antitrust concerns in the Wright repeal bill has passed muster with a key detractor to the legislation." The News continues, "With newfound support from Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, legislation that would lift restrictions on long-haul flights at Dallas Love Field may be poised to move forward. .. . 'It's a major step forward, but it's not the end of the road,' Ms. Hutchison said." The News adds, "The Texas Republican initiated procedures Thursday to bring the revamped Wright bill to the Senate floor. … It could come up for a vote next week, though a packed schedule in the final days before a congressional recess may force the issue into a post-election session in November. … The new language removes a phrase that could have provided a blanket exemption from competition laws for the June agreement by the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines Inc., Southwest Airlines Co. and Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport. … But the proposed amendment still offers potential legal cover to the North Texas compromise, by employing additional language sanctioning the deal."

NYSE, Euronext To Create Independent Entities After Merger. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Lucchetti) reports, "NYSE Group Inc. and Euronext NV will create separate U.S. and European entities to ensure that markets on each continent retain their independence if the stock-exchange operators complete their proposed merger." The Journal continues, "Euronext will have a Dutch foundation for its markets to prevent U.S. lawmakers from affecting the rules and requirements for listing stock in European countries. Likewise, NYSE will create a three-person Delaware trust to ensure that no laws are passed in Europe that will affect how U.S. companies are regulated. The structure was unveiled in a regulatory filing with Securities and Exchange Commission." The Journal adds, "The goal is to persuade everyone concerned that the planned deal won't encroach on securities laws on either side of the Atlantic. NYSE owns the New York Stock Exchange. Euronext owns stock markets in Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon as well as a major derivatives exchange in London. … The two entities will exist behind the scenes unless and until lawmakers or regulators pass rules that were viewed to affect the independence of regulators or companies in the other market. Essentially, they will only be able to react to laws or regulations rather than create strictures of their own." The Journal notes, "Europeans are concerned that Congress or the SEC might take the merger of the two companies as an opportunity to try to extend U.S. regulatory reach to Europe. Such a scenario is particularly frightening to European executives, who would prefer to avoid the strict accounting and governance rules that U.S. companies are subject to since the Sarbanes-Oxley law was passed in 2002. Both SEC officials and Euronext have stressed such U.S. rules won't apply in Europe."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Interior Official Says She Will Try To Recover Oil And Gas Royalties. The New York Times (9/22, Andrews, 1.21M) reports, "A top official at the Interior Department said on Thursday that she would not try to recover $1.3 billion in royalties that the government lost as a result of flawed oil and gas leases it signed in the late 1990's. 'That would be very hard to recoup,' said Johnnie M. Burton, director of the Minerals Management Service of the Interior Department, at a forum held by Platt's, an oil industry newsletter." She "added that she had little or no bargaining power -- and did not want any -- to force more than 50 companies to renegotiate offshore drilling leases that currently allow them to escape as much as $10 billion in royalty payments over the next decade." The Times notes, "Administration officials say that they are close to reaching agreement with Shell Oil and BP and that they have held talks with about 10 companies. But more than half of the companies that hold the flawed leases have not responded to the government's pleas." The Times reports, "Democrats reacted angrily to Ms. Burton's remarks, as well as to new allegations by a group of federal auditors who have charged that the Interior Department blocked them from recovering underpayments by more than two dozen companies."

Gap In Safety Standards Noted In E Coli Probe. The Washington Post (9/22, D1, Shin) reports, "It took exactly 14 days from the time state health officials in Wisconsin noticed five cases of E. coli O157:H7 in the same county until investigators arrived Wednesday at a field in California's Salinas Valley in search of the bacteria that ended up in bagged spinach and sickened 157 people in 23 states." The Post continues, "The outbreak -- the largest, in terms of victims, caused by fresh produce -- has exposed strengths and weaknesses in the highly fragmented U.S. food safety system. And the extent of it has federal officials talking about imposing tougher regulation. … 'There are good agricultural practices out there. . . . The question that will be addressed is: Are they adequate? Are they being followed? Does the industry need to be further regulated to be safe?' said David W. Acheson, a top Food and Drug Administration food safety official." The Post adds, "Even as public health officials have gotten better at identifying the onset of illness borne by raw fruits and vegetables, the rules and procedures to prevent those outbreaks remain weaker than those for meat and poultry, consumer advocates and food safety experts said. And their enforcement relies on the voluntary efforts of growers and processors, and on the FDA, which has responsibility for much of the food supply but nowhere near the authority or resources devoted to the monitoring of meat and poultry."

EPA Administration Rejects Staff's Recommendations On Soot Rules. The New York Times (9/22, Barringer, 1.21M) reports, "The Environmental Protection Agency's administrator on Thursday rejected the recommendations of his staff -- and an unusual public plea from independent science advisers -- choosing instead to tighten only one of two standards regulating the amount of lethal particles of soot in the air. The short-term daily standard, intended to control acute exposure to the minute particles, was cut nearly in half." But "the annual standard, which affects chronic exposure, remains at its original 1997 level." Stephen L. Johnson, "a career scientist at the agency and the third administrator appointed during President Bush's six years in office, said in a conference call on Thursday that the annual standard would remain at its current level while research continued. No change was made now, he said, "due to insufficient evidence" linking health problems to long-term exposure."

The Washington Post (9/22, A3, Eilperin, 748K) reports, "The agency did not go as far as its own scientists had urged in curbing soot, which is linked to heart and lung disease as well as childhood asthma." The decision "sparked complaints on both sides of the pollution debate, with public health experts saying it was inadequate and industry officials calling it too stringent."

Senate Expected To Confirm Parks Service Nominee. The AP (9/22, Jalonick) reports, "Mary A. Bomar, President Bush's nominee to head the National Park Service, appeared headed for a quick confirmation as senators praised the British native Thursday for her professionalism and history with the agency." Bomar "offered few opinions on current park service policy or the agency's budget problems at her Senate confirmation hearing." Bomar "said she would help the agency 'search for creative ways of working within our means.'" Senate Energy and Natural Resources Chairman Pete Domenici and Sen. Craig Thomas, "the Republican chairman of the subcommittee on national parks, predicted that most senators will support her nomination."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Sentences BALCO Journalists For Contempt, Suspended Pending Appeal. The Contra Costa (CA) Times (9/22, Peele) reports, "A federal judge Thursday ordered two journalists jailed on contempt charges for as long as 18 months for refusing to reveal who leaked them secret grand jury testimony in the BALCO steroids case." The Times continues, "U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White immediately suspended his order pending the outcome of appeals to the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. He rejected the requests of San Francisco Chronicle investigative reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada that they be fined rather than jailed. … In a tense exchange, Fainaru-Wada told White he would not, under any circumstances, reveal the source. … 'Do you intend to honor the subpoena as issued to you?' White asked Fainaru-Wada after the reporter made an emotional statement before a crowded courtroom that journalism is a 'meaningful, honorable profession.' … 'No,' he answered. 'I will not comply.' … Williams told White that he meant 'no disrespect to you and the judicial system,' by defying the subpoena. 'I have a deeply held ethical and moral belief as a journalist and a man that I have to keep my word,' he told White. … But a justice department lawyer said the reporters' testimony was critical to its investigation of the leak. … 'Our job is to get information and get to the truth,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Douglas M. Miller. 'We want to indict the right people, not the wrong people. We have a right to prove our case.'"

The AP (9/22) reports two San Francisco Chronicle reporters "were ordered jailed Thursday for a maximum of 18 months, pending an appeal, for refusing to testify about who gave them secret grand jury testimony from Barry Bonds and other elite athletes. The reporters, Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada, wrote a series of articles and a book based partly on the leaked transcripts of the testimony of Bonds, Jason Giambi and others before a grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative…that was exposed two years ago as a steroid ring. … Both sides agreed to stay the ruling pending an appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit."

McClatchy Newspapers (9/21) reports U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White rejected requests from Williams and Fainaru-Wada that they be fined rather than jailed.

The San Francisco Chronicle (9/21) writes that in "refusing to testify, the reporters have claimed that the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press includes the right to keep promises of confidentiality to their sources. Lawyers for Hearst Corp., which owns The Chronicle, argued that reporters should be forced to disclose their sources only if the harm caused by the breach of grand jury secrecy outweighs the public benefit of the reporting -- a standard proposed in a journalists' 'shield law' now before the U.S. Senate."

Media Criticizes Handling Of Case. The Los Angeles Times (9/21) editorializes, "There is no room here for objections about how allowing reporters to protect their sources might interfere with the government's ability to keep the nation secure from attack in a time of war. The two Chronicle reporters are not withholding information about a security risk in the White House or the CIA. Nor is this argument about whether reporters deserve some kind of consideration others don't. They are acting on the public's behalf, and any rights they gain — or lose — also belong to the public."

In an editorial, the Denver Post (9/21) writes, "Federal authorities have been zealous in pursuing the reporters, but they haven't been so tough on themselves. After all, it was their own blunders that resulted in the release of information they meant to expurgate. The information, filed in an electronic court brief, summarized e-mail messages between BALCO President Victor Conte Jr. and Fainaru-Wada. The FBI obtained the e-mails when they searched Conte's home. … One might deduce that the feds already know what they want to know."

For ESPN.com (9/22), Wright Thompson writes, "These reporters were assigned a story, did it well and, in the process, sparked a national debate that did big things like teach kids about the danger of steroids and small things like help force a sport to clean up its act. In the end, those are the only relevant facts to me. They provided a public service, worked long hours, endured criticism and dead ends, pursuing the truth. Funny, isn't that what the government is supposed to do?"

At least five California newscasts reported that a federal judge sentenced two San Francisco Chronicle journalists to 18 months in prison, pending an appeal, for refusing to reveal their source in the BALCO steroids scandal. The reporting also focused on the reaction of other journalists, who viewed that the court's ruling could have an impact on their profession. Some examples: KSEE-TV Fresno, (9/21, 06:15 p.m.) reported, "Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters have been sentenced to 18 months in prison for refusing to say who leaked them secret grand jury testimony from Barry Bonds and other elite athletes during the BALCO investigation. But Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada won't have to report to prison until their case is heard by a Federal Appeals Court."

KGO-TV San Francisco, (9/21, 05:02 p.m.) reported, "Journalists say sending reporters to jail for refusing to reveal sources could have a chilling affect on other reporters. … 'I know the prosecution recommended 18 months in jail. That is a good chunk of somebody's life for this.'"

KNTV-TV San Francisco, (9/21, 06:01 p.m.) reported, "Two San Francisco Chronicle reporters in the BALCO steroid scandal have been sentenced to prison for refusing to reveal their sources. Both the government and the reporters agreed that Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada should be held in contempt of court but disagreed on the punishment."

NFL Commissioner, Union Discuss Drug Testing. The AP (9/22) reports NFL commissioner Roger Goodell "met Thursday with union chief Gene Upshaw and a group of other league and union officials on a range of issues, including the possibility of expanding testing for performance-enhancing drugs. NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said nothing definitive would come out of the session, one of the first formal meetings of its kind since Goodell took over three weeks ago from Paul Tagliabue."

The Washington Post (9/22, E5, Maske) writes that Goodell and Upshaw "discussed a variety of topics, including the league's drug policy. A league spokesman said no agreements were reached on that issue but that conversations would continue at some point. Goodell said in recent weeks that he had opened discussions with Upshaw about the possibility of strengthening the program, possibly by increasing the frequency of tests and adding substances to the banned list."

Former Chicago City Worker Pleads Guilty To Running Heroin Ring. The Chicago Tribune (9/21, Bush) reports a former hoisting engineer for the city's Department of Water Management "pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court Thursday to running a heroin distribution ring while working for the city. George Prado, 48, is cooperating with federal investigators in the case against his alleged supplier, Sandra Stewart, and in other ongoing drug investigations, authorities said. He admitted Thursday that he purchased large quantities of heroin that he distributed through a network of couriers and dealers, including fellow city employees Anthony Ritacco and Michael Hart."

Cocaine Seized, 13 Arrested In Massachusetts Drug Ring Investigation. The Boston Herald (9/21) reports federal authorities "seized 150 kilograms of cocaine and busted 13 people for running a sophisticated drug ring in Lynn, Revere and Dorchester. … A federal grand jury investigating the alleged ring handed down indictments against 13 people, according to June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in New England, and Sullivan. … The feds said the charges stem from a wiretapping investigation from May to August of this year of the alleged cocaine ring."

In Lynn, the Daily Item (9/22) reports 13 members of an alleged North Shore cocaine distribution network "were indicted in federal court Thursday following a wiretap investigation and a major drug seizure in Lynn. Federal agents from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) and other law enforcement organizations spent three months listening to and recording conversations among the suspects, culminating in the interception of three separate cocaine shipments, according to Samantha Martin of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Boston. … The largest - containing 123 kilograms of cocaine - was seized in a Lynn parking lot Aug. 14. … As a result of the sting, authorities seized approximately 150 kilograms, or more than 300 pounds of cocaine."

Texas Fugitive Arrested After Applying For Work On Las Vegas FBI Office. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/22) reports, "A man applying for work building a new Las Vegas FBI office was nabbed on a 22-year-old murder warrant after a background check found he was wanted in a double slaying in Texas." Jesus Garcia "was arrested Aug. 24 and returned to Harris County, Texas, to face charges in a Sept. 7, 1984, shooting that left two men dead and two other men wounded in a Houston-area lounge, said David Staretz, spokesman for the FBI office in Nevada. 'Even after 20 years, the law eventually will catch up with you,' Staretz said Thursday. Garcia voluntarily provided fingerprint samples when he applied for a construction job at a new southern Nevada FBI regional office, Staretz said. The prints matched those on file with a warrant in the slaying."

Judge In Rhode Island Nightclub Fire Case Chastises AG's Letter Leak. The New York Times (9/22) reports, "A Rhode Island Superior Court judge chastised the state's attorney general Thursday, saying his office had leaked to the press a letter telling relatives of 100 people killed in a nightclub fire that the club owners would plead no contest to involuntary manslaughter charges and that one would not face jail time." The Times continues, "The judge, Francis J. Darigan Jr., said the leak was 'unethical, reprehensible, devoid of any consideration for the victims of this tragedy and totally abrogated an agreement reached after weeks of discussion.' … Judge Darigan said the court mailed out its own letter to families Wednesday night explaining the terms of the plea agreement. He said he had intended for them to receive word of it before the news media." The Times adds, "The office of Attorney General Patrick C. Lynch had planned to send a separate letter telling families he objected to the deal, but his letter was faxed to a television station Wednesday night and was made public a short time later. … Mr. Lynch said in a statement that notifying all the families personally would have been an 'unprecedented challenge.' While many families would be 'deeply hurt' by the news of the plea arrangement, he said, most would have heard of it through the press anyway."

IMMIGRATION:

US Indicts 15 In Alleged Driver's License Plot For Immigrants. The AP (9/22, Brisendine) reports, "The operators of two trucking schools were charged with conspiracy and fraud for allegedly helping unqualified Somalian and Bosnian immigrants pass driving tests in order to obtain commercial driver's licenses, federal prosecutors said in an indictment unsealed Thursday." The AP continues, "The indictment, returned Wednesday by a grand jury in Springfield, Missouri, names 15 defendants who face charges including conspiracy and mail fraud, making a false writing and causing a false identification document to be produced. … It stems from an investigation dating to fall 2004 of testing practices at the South Central Career Center Truck Driving School in West Plains, Missouri, in which authorities found a suspiciously high percentage of students passing the driving tests. … 'The pass rate for the school was found to be 99 percent,' Col. Jim Keathley, superintendent of the Missouri State Highway Patrol, said. 'The average pass rate statewide is 83 percent.'" The AP adds, "The school's superintendent, Dean P. Proffitt, 71, was among those indicted, as was Ernest Arnel White, who ran a Kansas City-area school and would send students to Proffitt's school to take the driving exam. … Proffitt was placed on a leave of absence in February, and the school can no longer test for commercial driving licenses. .. . White, who allegedly provided test answers to students at his driving school in Kansas City, also is charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm."

House Passes Three Immigration Reform Bills. The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Havemann, 918K) reports, "With a majority of Democrats joining virtually all Republicans, the House today passed three bills designed to make it harder for foreigners to enter the United States illegally and to increase the penalties for those who do." The bills "had already cleared the House last July as part of a larger package of measures to control illegal immigration. The Senate passed its own version of immigration legislation that included a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for some foreigners in this country illegally." The Times adds, "The punitive House bill and the more lenient Senate approach were so different that the two chambers have not tried to forge a compromise. Instead, the House is passing part of its original bill piecemeal."

USA Today (9/22, 2.27M) says the bills "would impose prison sentences of up to 20 years for tunneling under the border, allow the Homeland Security Department to hold illegal immigrants detained for crimes or as threats to national security beyond six months, and empower state and local authorities to arrest illegal immigrants. It's unlikely this year that Congress will pass broader immigration changes favored by the Senate, so House GOP leaders said taking action to seal the border was a matter of urgency."

The AP (9/22, Abrams) notes the Senate in May "passed a broader bill, generally endorsed by President Bush, that included provisions for a guest worker program and ways for the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to work toward legal status and eventual citizenship. There's been no progress in efforts to reconcile the two bills." The Senate, meanwhile, "was debating legislation passed by the House last week that would approve construction of a 700-mile fence stretching across one-third of the U.S.-Mexico border. Democrats said Thursday's votes were an attempt to cover up the failure to pass more comprehensive immigration changes."

White House Says Bush Would Sign Border Fence Into Law. The Washington Times (9/22, Hurt, 88K) reports, "President Bush will sign the bill to construct 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border if it is approved by the Senate, the White House said, as Congress continued yesterday drafting more legislation to combat illegal immigration."

WPost Criticizes Failure To Move On Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The Washington Post (9/22, A16, 748K) editorializes, "The cynical immigration endgame of the 109th Congress isn't particularly surprising. But after a session in which the Senate actually managed to produce a bipartisan, comprehensive measure to overhaul the existing system, the latest, enforcement-only developments are nonetheless disappointing and dangerous." The Post continues that a border fence "would damage relations with Mexico, harm the environment and, especially in the absence of broader changes, be ineffective." And it is, "sadly, the least offensive of the measures under consideration." The voter ID requirement approved Wednesday in the House "would effectively disenfranchise many poor and elderly Americans, who are less likely to have, or be able to obtain, such documentation. … The Senate should not go along." The Post states, "The most disappointing aspect of the debate is the passive posture of President Bush," who "could have used his bully pulpit to make clear the importance of comprehensive reform."

Chertoff Says Secure Border Initiative To Be Handled With Caution. The New York Times (9/22, Lipton, 1.21M) reports "top Department of Homeland Security officials and Boeing executives" gathering in Washington Thursday to formally award the Secure Border Initiative Network (SBInet) contract "acknowledged that the first challenge was disproving skeptics. 'The common complaint about the government is there is a lot of lofty rhetoric, but the achievement always falls short,' Homeland Security Secretary

Michael Chertoff said. 'We are very mindful of that. This is a very tall order. This is about a solution we believe is going to do the job.'" DHS Deputy Secretary Michael Jackson described the plan as "a radical change in business as usual at the border.'" However, the agency, "well aware of the decades of failed or incomplete border-security efforts," will start "small with a tiny section of the Arizona border, so it can quickly adjust if the strategy does not work."

Likewise, the Washington Post (9/22, D1, Witte, Hsu, 748K) leads its coverage of the story this morning by reporting that Secretary Chertoff said "the government learned its lessons from failed border-security initiatives and will move cautiously with its private-sector partner, Boeing Co., in the latest effort to use technology to curb illegal immigration." DHS "officials had been criticized by some immigration experts and lawmakers for indicating that the private sector would be given wide discretion in shaping a new system to secure 6,000 miles of land border. Previous attempts to do that have cost the government hundreds of millions of dollars but left little to show for it as equipment malfunctioned, agents were overwhelmed with false alarms and illegal immigration continued to climb."

Growers Lash Out At Congress Over Labor Shortage. The New York Times (9/22, Preston, 1.21M) reports, "Stepped-up border enforcement kept many illegal Mexican migrant workers out of California this year, farmers and labor contractors said, putting new strains on the state's shrinking seasonal farm labor force." The labor shortage, also reported in Washington and upstate New York has turned growers "from frustrated to furious with Congress, which has all but given up on passing legislation this year to create an agricultural guest-worker program. Last week, 300 growers representing every major agricultural state rallied on the front lawn of the Capitol carrying baskets of fruit to express their ire." The Times adds, "As they sum up this season's losses, estimated to be at least $10 million for California pear farmers alone, growers in the state mainly blame Republican lawmakers in Washington for stalling immigration legislation that would have addressed the shortage by authorizing a guest-worker program for agriculture. Many growers, a dependably Republican group, said they felt betrayed."

Study Finds Illegal Immigrants Supplanting American Workers. The New York Times (9/22, Preston, 1.21M) reports a study released yesterday by the Center for Immigration Studies found that in the five years after 2000, "foreign-born workers, including both legal and illegal immigrants, made up 86 percent of the net increase in the total number of employed workers, the highest share for immigrants ever recorded in this country. At the same time, the number of employed native workers ages 16 to 34 fell by more than 1.5 million. The study contends that 90 percent of the job deficit for young Americans would be erased if American teenagers and young adults held the jobs that immigrants now hold. … Last month a study by the Pew Hispanic Center, another Washington research organization, concluded that there was no nationwide pattern of displacement of American workers by immigrants."

California Church Denies IRS Request For Documents. The New York Times (9/22, Strom) reports, "A California church under investigation by the Internal Revenue Service for possible violations of laws against political activities by churches has denied the agency's request for documents." The Times continues, "The decision forces the I.R.S. either to drop the case or to ask the Justice Department to take the church, All Saints Episcopal Church, in Pasadena, to court. The agency could also revoke the church's tax exemption, but legal experts said that was unlikely." The Times adds, "The church said it regarded an I.R.S. investigation of an antiwar sermon delivered by the church's former rector on the Sunday before the 2004 election as an attack on freedom of speech and religion. … 'We have nothing to hide, but there are principles here we think we need to uphold,' said Robert A. Long, the lay leader, or senior warden, of All Saints. … Mr. Long said the 26 members of the church's vestry, or governing body, had voted unanimously to decline to comply with two formal requests, called administrative summonses, for documents, testimony and other information that it received from the I.R.S. last Friday." The Times notes, "The church was making a point by requesting the summonses, which asked for documents ranging from copies of church policies and e-mail message to utility bills, as well as an interview with Rev. J. Edwin Bacon Jr., the rector. Mr. Bacon said the church asked for the formal process after receiving the second of two informal I.R.S. requests for information 'that was far more intrusive and that we thought were clearly aiming to invade our worship practices, which is clearly illegal.' … The request for formality is also a time-honored way of getting disputes with the I.R.S. into court, legal experts said."

The AP (9/22, Flaccus) reports, "An Episcopal church's decision Thursday not to cooperate with an IRS investigation into an anti-war sermon delivered before the 2004 presidential election sets up a high-profile confrontation between the liberal congregation and the IRS, which usually keeps such inquiries private. … The leaders of the 3,500-member All Saints Church voted unanimously to resist an order to turn over documents related to the sermon, which was given just two days before the election. The decision means the IRS must decide whether to ask the Justice Department to pursue the case in court. A judge would then rule on the validity of the agency's demands." The AP adds, "IRS spokesman Terry Lemon said he could not comment on the specific case and would not say whether the agency would request a court hearing. He instead issued a statement describing the procedure during such an investigation. … 'If the entity ultimately declines to answer the summons, the IRS can ask the Justice Department to pursue the case in court,' the statement read. … The dispute has attracted the attention of religious leaders on the right and left, who say the IRS' actions could make it more difficult for them to speak out on moral issues such as gay marriage and abortion during the midterm election campaign."

The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Sahagun) reports, "The All Saints case escalated a week ago when the IRS slapped the 80-year-old parish with a summons demanding that it turn over by Sept. 29 all materials, such as newsletters and sermons, produced during the 2004 election year with political references. Bacon was told to testify in person Oct. 11." The Times continues, "At stake, several religious leaders say, is freedom from government intimidation when churches address moral issues of the day from the pulpit. … In an interview, Richard Land, president of the Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, said, 'Churches should not endorse political candidates. But the IRS is seriously out of kilter and wrong-headed on this one; it's an appalling intrusion and it smacks of intimidation.' … Now, as the November election approaches, some churches worry that they may be the next targets of the IRS. This summer, the agency issued a statement warning nonprofits, including churches, that it was stepping up its efforts to crack down on illegal electioneering."

Local Television. Only a few newscasts reported on the Pasadena-based All Saints Episcopal Church's announcement that it refuses to submit documents to the IRS, and that it will, instead, take its battle with the federal agency before a court of law. The coverage also focused on the support from leaders of other faiths to the church. Some examples: KABC-TV Los Angeles, (9/21, 4:28 p.m.) reported, "The church was unanimous amongst their leaders. They're going to challenge this summons by the I.R.S. and this could affect their tax exempt status. They say it's an infringement on their rights and they want to put it back in the court of the I.R.S., which would more than likely mean a court of law. This sets up a high profile debate between the I.R.S. and the All Saints Episcopal Church."

KTVX-TV Salt Lake City, (9/21, 10:15 p.m.) reported, "A southern California church is standing up against the I.R.S., and refusing to turn over documents related to an anti-war sermon delivered a couple of years ago. … The church says the sermon did not favor any candidate, and the I.R.S. is infringing on the church's freedom of religion and freedom of speech. 'One of the great offenses in this I.R.S. attention has been to come into our worship practices and try to dictate how we worship.' …Now the church says it knows fighting the I.R.S. will be expensive. But they say leaders of Muslim, Jewish and other Christian churches are already calling their church and pledging money in support of the fight."

KABC-TV Los Angeles, (9/21, 6:02 p.m.) reported, "Church officials admit challenging the I.R.S. will be costly. Leaders of Muslim, Jewish and other churches … will donate money to help them pay for their legal crew."

KCAL-TV Los Angeles, (9/21, 4:30 p.m.) reported, "Church officials see this as a key test with nationwide implications. If they lose they will submit the document … to the I.R.S., but they don't expect to lose."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Judiciary Committee Hold Impeachment Hearing For 9th Circuit Judge. The Legal Times (9/22, Goldman) reports, "A House Judiciary subcommittee on Thursday held a rare impeachment hearing for a California federal judge but reached no conclusions and appeared eager to let a special committee of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals finish its investigation before deciding whether to take up the matter in Congress again." The Times continues, "Judge Manuel Real, a Lyndon Johnson appointee who in November will have been a federal judge for 40 years, spent Thursday morning rebutting -- for the first time in public -- allegations that he had improperly seized control of a bankruptcy proceeding involving a woman whose criminal probation he was overseeing. … 'I am here to tell you I categorically deny any misconduct on the bench,' said Real, 82, who was seated next to his wife, Elizabeth, and lawyer and longtime friend, Donald Smaltz, the former independent counsel who a decade earlier had headed the investigation into former Clinton Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy. 'I have never been sanctioned for any type of judicial misconduct.'" The Times adds, "Real has a reputation as a stern and autocratic jurist. 'There are a lot of people who dislike you,' said subcommittee member Chris Cannon, R-Utah. 'No,' responded Real, who spoke slowly but forcefully. 'I don't think there are many people; I think there are a few.'" The Times adds, "One of those, the man who first filed the original complaint more than 2 1/2 years ago, is Stephen Yagman, a Venice, Calif., attorney whom Real fined $250,000 in 1984 for his conduct in a defamation case Real was handling. The sanction was later reversed by the 9th Circuit, but, Real noted, Yagman has had a 'personal vendetta against me for over 20 years.' … Yagman, in fact, has no connection to the underlying bankruptcy case. But under the 1980 Judicial Conduct and Disability Act, anyone, whether he is connected to the underlying case or not, can file a complaint against a federal judge."

Snow Seen As Relishing News Reporting Role As Press Secretary. The Christian Science Monitor

DOJ_NMG_0067111

(9/22, Cook, 58K) reports on White House press secretary Tony Snow's appearance at a Monitor breakfast. It is "not clear whether reporters get more information from Snow. But the White House informational diet is clearly being served up now with greater verbal dexterity and humor." Snow says "that what he brings is a major change in attitude toward the press." Said Snow, "I don't come out of the political side where a lot of times you see people coming out of the political side and they will look at the press room and they will look at it as a den of vipers, a seething hostile mass. What I see is a lot of people trying to get information so they can write a story...I think the change in the point of view makes all the difference in the world." The Monitor adds Snow "relishes the reporting aspect of his current position," But "getting ready to answer reporters' questions at two formal sessions a day involves intense preparation. There are days when Snow, a self-described "night person" gets up at 3:45 a.m. to prepare."

The White House Bulletin/US News (9/21) reported, "Opening the door on White House habits," Snow "told reporters that there is a regular feature dubbed 'policy time' in the West Wing when top aides and the President shoot the breeze on key issues leading to a presidential decision. 'I certainly put my two-cents worth in,' he told reporters at a newsmaker breakfast hosted by the Christian Science Monitor." The Bulletin adds Snow's description of an open idea mill counters the mainstream media view that only a chosen few make policy decisions, a claim White House officials have tried to fight for years. In fact, when Snow negotiated to leave Fox Radio for the White House, he won assurances that he would have access to policy discussions. But it turned out not to be an issue since he was made a policy maker on his first day. 'I was pushing against an open door,' he said."

The Washington Times (9/22, Curl, 88K) reports Snow "took over as President Bush's communications point man four months ago, beefing up the press office staff, honing internal operations and deploying a quick-response strategy." Now, polls "show, the president's approval rating has jumped to its highest level since January. Could Mr. Snow be responsible for the surge?" Snow said, "We're just busy going out and trying to be as aggressive as we can in getting the message out. Part of the challenge is to explain what we are doing and why. ... Sometimes you have to let people know very clearly what the policy is and that is one of our key aims." The Times adds the operation "has changed dramatically in recent months after crucial missteps, including last year's dead-on-arrival nomination of White House counsel Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court and this year's fiasco over the proposal to allow a company based in the United Arab Emirates to manage U.S. port operations." Snow has "learned to use the skills he picked up in his 28 years in journalism." Snow said, "The press secretary's job is a reporting job." He added that "even with an office right down the hall from the president, he spends a lot of his day calling others in the administration, asking, 'What's going on here?'"

Jackson Said To Have Urged Favoritism In Awarding HUD Contracts. The Washington Post (9/21, A15, Williamson, 748K), under the headline "Probe Finds Jackson Urged Favoritism in HUD Contracts," reports that "an inspector general's report charges that top US housing official Alphonso Jackson urged staff members to favor friends of President Bush when awarding Department of Housing and Urban Development contracts. But investigators so far have found no direct proof that Jackson's staff obeyed." His chief of staff told investigators that Jackson "personally intervened with contractors whom he did not like...these contractors had Democratic political affiliations," says the report, a copy of which was made available to The Washington Post.

The New York Times (9/22, Stout, 1.21M) titles its report "HUD Chief's Remarks Aside, Study Finds No Favoritism," and says Aronetta Baylor, "now an assistant deputy secretary and formerly the department's chief procurement officer, told investigators under oath that Mr. Jackson had once said, in the report's exact words, 'You know, if we weren't here, if the president hadn't appointed us, they wouldn't be (expletive) getting these contracts.' 'And he said that makes him mad that they don't realize that,' Ms. Baylor testified." Baylor's account "is in a 340-page report drawn up by Anthony G. Medici, special agent in charge of the inspector general's criminal investigations division. The report, dated Sept. 18, has not been made public." The Times adds, "It is illegal under federal procurement law to reward or punish contractors on the basis of their political views."

Khalilzad Return To Washington Sparks Rumors Of Promotion. The Washington Post (9/22, Kamen, 748K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that Zalmay Khalilzad, "the US ambassador to Iraq, is back in town for a bit -- and that has sparked chatter that maybe he'll be named deputy secretary of state, maybe with a specific portfolio of Iraq and Afghanistan." The chatter is "likely idle, generated by the fact that the post has been vacant since Robert Zoellick 's departure almost three months ago and that many names have been floated as his replacement. One big concern would be pulling Khalilzad out of Iraq, but there is some thinking in Baghdad that he may have done as much there as he can do."

House Ethics Panel Clears Lewis Aide's $2 Million Severance Pay. The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Hamburger, 918K) reports the House Ethics Committee

"cleared a longtime aide to House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis of any breach of rules for accepting a nearly $2-million payout from his former lobbying firm." The aide, Jeffrey Shockey, "received $1.96 million in severance payments when he left Washington-based Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White to return to work for Lewis (R-Redlands) as deputy staff director of the Appropriations Committee. Federal investigators are examining the relations between the firm, which specialized in appropriations matters, and Lewis." Ethics Committee staffers were "specifically reviewing whether Shockey's 2005 payout from Copeland Lowery might have broken rules that prohibit congressional staff from receiving income earned after becoming federal employees. But Shockey showed the committee documents revealing that his compensation was based on work completed before he returned to Capitol Hill." Reps. Howard Berman and Doc Hastings said, "It appears that the terms of your buyout agreement are consistent with applicable laws and House rules."

Senate Panel Not Scheduling Vote On Bolton Nomination. The Washington Post (9/22, Kamen, 748K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee calendar "has a business meeting scheduled for Tuesday, with votes to be taken on two nominations -- but nothing is scheduled for U.N. Ambassador John Bolton. His recess appointment ends no later than Jan. 3 unless he gets confirmed, but it appears that Sen. Lincoln 'Roadblock' Chafee (R-R.I.) hasn't budged -- yet."

Recent Bush Interviews Cast Light On His "Mind-Set And Personal Life." A Washington Post (9/22, A15, Goldfarb, 748K) "Verbatim" item says the series of interviews President Bush gave "surrounding the anniversaries of Hurricane Katrina and the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks…offered a window into the president's mind-set and personal life," as he discussed "his frustrations" on CBS, the times "when he is overwhelmed with emotion" on ABC, and "his reading habits" and "his relationship with his father" on NBC.

Commerce Department Has Lost 1,100 Laptops. USA Today (9/22, Welch, 2.27M) reports, "The Commerce Department said Thursday that 1,100 of its laptops have been lost or stolen, including some that contain personal information collected by the Census Bureau." Department officials said that "the potential loss of personal data was limited, however, and that it is unaware of any data being improperly used." Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said in a statement, "The amount of missing computers is high, but fortunately, the vulnerability for data misuse is low. … While we know of no instances of personal information being improperly used, we regret each instance of lost material."

The Washington Post (9/22, A3, Sipress, 748K) reports, "This disclosure by the department came in response to a request by the House Committee on Government Reform, which this summer asked 17 federal departments to detail any loss of computers holding sensitive personal information. Of the 10 departments that have responded, the losses at Commerce are 'by far the most egregious,' said David Marin, staff director for the committee. He added that the silence of the remaining seven departments could reflect their reluctance to reveal problems of similar magnitude." In "a private briefing yesterday for three members of Congress," Gutierrez "estimated that the disappearance of laptops from the Census Bureau could have compromised the personal information of about 6,200 households, Marin said. He said the department was still trying to determine the extent of the problem." The AP (9/22) notes "a half-dozen other federal agencies or departments have reported data thefts and security breaches involving personal information in the last six months."

Capitol Police Admit Intruder Was Not Stopped By Its Officers. The Washington Post (9/22, B1, Sheridan, 748K) reports the US Capitol Police, "contradicting earlier reports," said Carlos Greene, the armed man "who raced into the U.S. Capitol this week," was stopped "by employees of the Flag Office -- not by Capitol Police officers. The episode exposed gaps in security of the Capitol building and grounds, and legislators are expected to meet Tuesday to grill U.S. Capitol Police about what went wrong."

Brownback Bill Would Increase Funds For DC Savings Program. The Washington Times (9/22, Doolittle, 88K) reports the chairman "of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee on the District said yesterday that he will add $4 million to the D.C. budget next year to help married or engaged couples buy a home, get job training or start a business." Sen. Sam Brownback said, "We need more family formation in the District ... We need more children raised in two-parent homes. This initiative will help with doing that ... It will expand job-training funding for those who get married; there's also funding in there for mentoring and counseling couples." The Times adds Brownback's "proposal would add $1 million to a matched-savings program approved by the Senate last year." Under the program, "the federal government contributes $3 for every $1 a D.C. couple invests and allows a maximum lifetime payment of $9,000. Couples must withdraw the money and be married within three years of entering the program." The new proposal "would provide more funds for job training and mentoring. Last year's version was the first of its kind in the country."

CDC Recommends Routine HIV Tests For All Adults And Teens. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention recommended Thursday that all adults and adolescents should be tested for HIV regularly. The prominence and amount of coverage of the recommendation varies. While all three broadcast networks carried the story, NBC gave it nearly three minutes, while the combined coverage on ABC and CBS barely topped 30 seconds. The New York Times and Washington Post put it on the front page.

NBC Nightly News (9/21, story 2, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) said the "strong new recommendation" from the CDC says "an AIDS test should be a routine part of a doctor's visit for every American starting at age 13." NBC's Bazell talked with the health commissioners of New York City and Washington, D.C., and an HIV-positive man, about the call. ABC World News (9/21, story 5, 0:20, Gibson) said the CDC "estimates that more than 250,000 people have the virus and don't know it," a number also cited by the CBS Evening News (9/21, story 4, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M).

The Washington Post (9/22, Brown, 748K) says patients "would no longer have to sign a consent form and get extensive pre-test counseling. But they would have to be told they were being tested for the AIDS virus, asked if they have any questions and given the opportunity to 'opt out.'" The Post says the policy "is a huge change from an era when stigma and fatalism led to a unique and -- in the opinion of some practitioners, onerous -- set of procedures for HIV testing."

Likewise, the New York Times (9/22, McNeil, 1.21M) calls the recommendation a "major shift of policy" and a "sharp break from the early days of the AIDS epidemic, when the stigma of the disease and the fear of social ostracism caused many people to avoid being tested." USA Today (9/22, 2A, Sternberg, 2.27M) says the CDC recommendations "are not legally binding, but they are designed to make HIV testing as routine as tests for high blood pressure, cholesterol and diabetes."

Report Recommends Changes To Medicare System. The AP (9/22) reports that a new report prepared by the Institute of Medicine says that "quality not quantity should be the federal government's guide in setting payments to doctors, hospitals and other health care providers." The institute "said Congress should cut the base payments that Medicare makes to hospitals, nursing homes, insurers and doctors, and should use the savings to create pools that reward providers when they do work that has been proved effective in improving a patient's health." The change would "help ensure that what is paid for will be more beneficial to patients." The recommendations "did not please many health care providers."

Democrats Debate Medicare "Doughnut Hole" Costs. The AP (9/21, Freking) reported, "Filling the doughnut hole in Medicare drug plans would cost older people and the disabled about $40 a month more. Democratic lawmakers estimated the additional cost and said Thursday that is a major reason why 88 percent of the Medicare beneficiaries signing up for drug plans opted for a coverage gap." Democrats "designated Friday as 'doughnut hole day,' when the coverage gap would hit the average older person who is taking several medications." Meanwhile, the Bush administration "estimates that about 3 million Medicare beneficiaries will hit the doughnut hole, fewer than the 7 million often cited by critics. Mark McClellan, the administration's pointman on Medicare, says the 7 million figure is outdated."

Insurers Begin To "Privatize" Medicare. The New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) reports, "For years, private insurers have offered alternatives to the federal Medicare program that are meant to give patients lower-cost options than the government coverage provides. More than 7 million people now subscribe to such plans, out of a total Medicare population of 42.5 million." But "suddenly a type of private insurance plan is gaining ground that looks very similar to the basic coverage long available to anyone with a federally issued Medicare card. And the government is paying the private insurance industry a subsidy of 11 percent per patient, on average, to provide it." Critics "see the trend as further evidence that the government is paying private industry to take Medicare off its hands."

Pentagon May Seek More Time On New Labor-Management Relations System. The Washington Post (9/22, D4, Barr, 748K) "Federal Diary" column Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England "has put a Senate oversight committee on notice that the Pentagon may come to Congress next year for additional time to establish a new labor-management relations system." The Pentagon "faces a 2009 deadline for implementing new labor rules, but progress has been slowed by litigation and other factors."

Paulson Says Bush Open To Compromise On GSE Bill. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Phillips, Price, 2.03M) reports, "US Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson on Thursday said the Bush administration had clearly communicated a willingness to compromise with members of Congress at odds over legislation to establish a new regulator for the housing finance companies Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac." Paulson said in an interview with the Journal, "They're not waiting for me, or for the administration because we've indicated a willingness to work something out. … So the key question is whether people can get together on both sides of the aisle and get together in the House."

WSJournal Chides DeMint, Vitter Over Holds On FDA Nomination. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (9/22, A10, 2.03M) criticizes holds placed on Andrew von Eschenbach's nomination to head the FDA by Sens. Jim DeMint (over the RU-486 abortion pill) and David Vitter (over drug reimportation), saying that the FDA "badly needs a host of reforms" and that President Bush "has nominated one of the best available men to do that job." The Journal reminds readers that it last month criticized Democratic Sens. Hillary Clinton and Patty Murray over their blocking of the nomination, and says if DeMint and Vitter "won't be reasonable, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and others should call them on the deadly consequences of further delay."

NYTimes Praises Atlantis Crew, Urges NASA Focus On Hubble. The New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) editorializes, "We've never been great fans of the International Space Station, an enormously costly project that will yield such limited scientific and economic benefits that it seems destined to be considered a white elephant. Nevertheless, we had to marvel at the magnificent performance of the crew of the shuttle Atlantis, which ended an arduous 12-day mission to the station with a flawless landing yesterday." The Times also calls for upgrades for the Hubble Space Telescope, saying it "seems more important to service the Hubble than to finish a station whose main value will be the act of finishing it."

Bush Touts Economy, Tells Florida Audience Democrats Would Raise Taxes. The St. Petersburg Times (9/22, Stein, Smith) reports, "President Bush made a two-city swing through Florida on Thursday, raising money and the spirits of two Republican candidates. Across the country, Republican candidates have been distancing themselves from Bush before the upcoming midterm elections as the president's approval ratings have sagged while voters have grown dissatisfied with his handling of Iraq and the economy." But "on Thursday, there was no distance between Bush and Charlie Crist, the GOP candidate for governor, or Gus Bilirakis, who is running for Congress, as Bush zeroed in on tax policy, typically a point of strength for Republicans." The Tampa Tribune (9/22, March) says that while Bush "boosted those two candidates," he "was cool to his party's nominee for the US Senate, Katherine Harris, giving her a short-shrift handshake along the rope line at the Tampa event and no ride on Air Force One." However, says Miami Herald (9/22, Klas, 310K), Harris was in the audience in Tampa. Asked whether "this would end her criticism of the 'Republican elite,' Harris said, "I will never be one of the beltway boys."

National newspapers focus on Bush's tax message. The New York Times (9/22, Rutenberg, 1.21M) reports from Orlando that Bush "began a blistering new political offensive on Thursday, asserting that if Democrats won control of Congress from Republicans it would mean higher taxes, less money in the pockets of working families and damage to the economy." The speech by Bush here," in which he belittled Democrats as "'he party of high taxes,' signaled what Republicans described as a new phase of the White House's fall campaign, as Republicans begin to combine their emphasis on national security with a tough new emphasis on the issue that unites them more than any other, taxes." Bush's offensive "was backed up by a flood of television advertisements on behalf of Republican candidates."

The Washington Post (9/22, Abramowitz, 748K) reports Bush "zeroed in on comments this week by Rep. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), who would take over the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee if the Democrats win back the majority. Rangel told Bloomberg News that he 'cannot think of one' of Bush's first-term tax cuts that merits renewal." Bush told a crowd in Tampa, "That's one way of saying they're going to raise your taxes, because, you see, if you don't extend the tax cuts, your taxes go up." The Post also reports, "The reference to Rangel -- though not by name -- came with ironic timing. It was the same day that the veteran congressman called a news conference in Washington to defend the president against the attacks this week by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez at the United Nations and at a Harlem church. Those attacks, as well as jibes from the Iranian president, seem to have energized Bush's political base."

The AP (9/22, Loven) reports that Bush, "politicking at full campaign speed, contended Thursday that a vote for Democrats this fall would be a vote to siphon money out of American families' budgets. It was Bush the Politician, unleashed, seven weeks before the midterm congressional elections."

The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Gerstenzang, 918K) also reports on Bush's "tough attack Thursday on the Democratic Party's policy on taxes," and adds Democrats "responded by criticizing Bush for adding to the national debt. 'The deficit the president has run up has essentially put a $28,000 tax on every newborn, and that's not to mention the $1 billion a week we're spending in Iraq,' said Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who leads the Democratic effort to win more House seats." Bush "spoke in Tampa at a fundraiser for Gus Bilirakis, a Republican, who is seeking the seat his father, Michael Bilirakis, has held in the House."

The Washington Times (9/22, Dinan, 88K) says Bush "has dominated press coverage in the past few weeks with his push on terrorism, and his tax message yesterday was overshadowed by the deal his administration reached with key senators to approve a CIA interrogation program."

McClatchy (9/22, Gibson), meanwhile, focuses on Bush's references to the war on terror, reporting that "hoping to regain his political stature…Bush has hit the campaign trail to sound warnings about terrorism while boosting Republican candidates in this year's elections." In Florida, the President said, "The best way to protect the United States is to stay on the offense and bring the enemy to justice before they come here and hurt us in America." McClatchy adds, "In political terms, Bush and fellow Republicans are playing the security card, the one that sent the president's public-approval ratings to a record high in 2001 and helped the party consolidate control of the White House and Congress in the next two elections."

Eight-Year-Old Gets Award From Bush. The Bradenton Herald (9/22, Marquez, 52K) reports, "A Valrico 8 year old shook hands with the president today, received a citizenship award and then invited him to a party for young victims of a hurricane." Zach Bonner told The Herald on the tarmac at Tampa International Airport that Bush "politely declined to attend the Christmas party for Katrina victims in Louisiana in December, but said he would 'send something.'"

The St. Petersburg Times (9/22, Stein) reports Bonner, "who had been practicing his handshake, felt nervous as the commander-in-chief walked over. 'It went so fast,' he recalled. 'He said congratulations, and he was proud of me.'" Two years ago, "he heard that the victims of Hurricane Charley needed water. Zach asked his mother if he could give some. Then his neighbors. Twenty-seven pickup truckloads later, he was still helping others." Zach "has his own nonprofit, the Little Red Wagon Foundation Inc., complete with a Web site at www.littleredwagonfoundation.com."

Bush Visits Buccaneers. The AP (9/22, Goodall) reports from Tampa, "It seems like everyone has some advice these days for the winless Tampa Bay Buccaneers and struggling quarterback Chris Simms. Even…Bush tossed the football with the former University of Texas quarterback Thursday, and offered some advice." Said Bush, "Never give up." Bush "accepted an invitation to stop by practice and was greeted on the field by Simms and teammates Derrick Brooks, Ronde Barber and Mike Alstott and Ryan Nece, as well as an appreciative Gruden."

Mehlman Says Midterms To Focus On Terror; Dean Sees Economy As Defining Issue. RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M), "Last month's narrowly averted plot to blow up airliners bound for the U.S. from Great Britain is a stark reminder that we are engaged in an extraordinary and dangerous global war. In 46 days, the American people will make an important decision about how we prosecute that war: Do we stay on the offense and use every tool available to defeat the enemy, or do we elect leaders who would weaken America and surrender key tools we need to defeat the global jihad?" Mehlman adds that "there can be no doubt about the national and international import of the choice we all face as Americans. We face war and a changing global economy, and Republicans have very different strategies for victory than the Democrats. I believe the American people understand the choice of 2006, which is why I am confident that in 46 days Republicans will make history and maintain our majorities in Congress."

Meanwhile, DNC Chairman Howard Dean writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M), "We need a Democratic Congress to fight the war on terror -- and to end the war on America's families. Republican policies of the last five years have damaged our economy and failed Americans." Democrats "believe strengthening the middle class is essential for a thriving economy that rewards work, provides economic opportunity to all and makes it easier for parents to devote time to their families. An economy that favors the top 1% at the expense of everyone else might be good for President Bush's politics, but a shrinking middle class is bad for capitalism, democracy and America. We need a new direction." Dean also writes, "The Republican record on managing the federal budget is dismal. Republicans have turned surplus into debt, hope into lost opportunity; they have become the party of borrow-and-spend." Democrats "are ready to lead with a thoughtful, fiscally responsible long-term vision."

E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (9/22, A17, 748K), "The maneuvering this month for November's midterm elections is primarily about shaping the priorities that voters will carry with them to their polling places. Behind the speeches and the ads is a subtle war for position, an effort to prepare the ground for the campaign's final weeks. The obvious battle is over whether voters on Nov. 7 will be thinking more about the violence in Iraq, which pushes them the Democrats' way, or about the broader war on terrorism." Dionne adds, "In this skirmish, Republicans can chalk up modest but real gains. The Pew Research Center found that the proportion of voters who listed terrorism as the most important problem facing the country increased from 5 percent in May to 15 percent this month. Significantly, the share of independents who listed terrorism as the key issue rose from 5 percent to 13 percent." But "the question that has received far less attention in Washington is the one joined by Klobuchar and Brown: How will voters see the economy? … The GOP is still in trouble on the economy." Dionne concludes, "The paradox is that the survival chances of a Republican Party led by a former oilman from Texas will depend in large part on whether gas prices keep falling."

Poll Finds Americans More Upbeat On Economy, Crediting Bush. The Los Angeles Times (9/22, Hennessy-Fiske, 918K) reports, "Americans have become more optimistic about the economy and they are giving President Bush some of the credit, a new Times/Bloomberg poll shows. Republicans running for election next month could benefit from the development, as voters say the economy will influence their choices in November more than any other national issue, including the war in Iraq and terrorism." Consumer confidence "fell this summer as gas prices peaked and the housing market weakened, particularly in California. Those polled in July were almost evenly split on the state of the economy, with 49% saying the economy was doing badly. Now, the optimists outnumber the pessimists in the poll by 10 percentage points, with 54% saying the economy is doing well." The Times adds, "Seven weeks before the midterm elections, the economy remains voters' primary focus. Among registered voters, 32% listed the economy and jobs as the most important election issue, followed by the war in Iraq (21%), immigration (17%) and healthcare (10%)." Those "polled cited a variety of reasons for feeling better about the economy, including unemployment at a low 4.7% nationally, lower gas prices this month and an interest rate freeze by the Federal Reserve. That could be good news for Republican candidates, as the GOP is the party in power in Washington and may be able to take some credit for the economy."

House GOP Leaders Agrees To Ease Restrictions On Drug Reimportation. The AP (9/22, Jordan) reports, "House Republicans tentatively agreed Thursday to prohibit Customs agents from seizing prescription drugs that Americans buy in Canada and bring back into the United States." The deal "would let Americans carry up to a 90-day supply of medication back to the US from Canada without being stopped by Customs agents, House and Senate Republicans said. But it would not let Americans purchase cheaper prescriptions over the Internet or by mail-order, officials said."

Wal-Mart's New Pricing Strategy To Shakeup Drug Industry. ABC World News (9/21, story 6, 0:15, Gibson) reported, "Wal-Mart said it will begin selling generic prescription drugs at cut-rate prices. A move that could force rival pharmacies to do the same, making healthcare more affordable for many Americans. Wal-Mart is going to sell 300 generics for as low as $4 for a one-month supply."

CBS Evening News (9/21, story 2, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Big sales are usually found on the inside pages of the newspaper, but you can look for this one on the front page tomorrow because it's bound to make some headlines." CBS (Anthony Mason) added, "Launching a fierce price war, Wal-Mart has slashed drug costs, first just in its Tampa-area stores, but next year across the country." Bill Simon, Wal-Mart: "This is a kick-off of a program that will roll into Florida and as many places in the country as we can." Mason: "So who is unhappy? Wal-Mart's competitors for one, the national drugstore chains, and all of their stocks, Katie, dropped sharply today."

NBC Nightly News (9/21, lead story, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This offer again covers hundreds of drugs and Wal-Mart is big enough to change the game in the expensive prescription business across this country. We begin here tonight with NBC's Tom Costello." NBC (Costello) added, "Wal-Mart's move to slash prices on generic drugs created a stir in the pharmacy line. … But consumer advocates today had mixed reactions." David Certner, AARP: "Any time we can move people to lower priced generic drugs people are going to see savings. The biggest problem is still with brand name drugs that are rising in prices."

USA Today (9/22, A1, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "Wal-Mart Stores' move to offer some generic drugs for $4 a prescription could save modest amounts for some consumers. It may also draw more customers to its stores or prompt a price war with other pharmacies." Wal-Mart "said Thursday that it will offer the $4 price on about 150 generic drugs to the insured and uninsured alike, starting immediately" with 65 stores "in the Tampa area. It will take the program statewide by January." Bill Simon, Wal-Mart's executive vice president of the Professional Services Division, noted, 'We intend to take it nationwide next year."

The Wall Street Journal (9/22, B1, McWilliams, Martinez, 2.03M) reports, "Wal-Mart Stores Inc., long attacked by some critics for its employee health-care benefits, waded into the nation's health-care debate and its rivals' pharmacy businesses by promising to cut the price of some of its generic drugs." The savings "on some drugs will be considerable compared to rival pharmacies." Wal-Mart's "move drew praise from doctors and health-care experts but mostly shrugs from rivals who dismissed it as a publicity move." Wal-Mart "cast the change as a boost to the nation's uninsured and a savings even for those with health insurance."

The Washington Post (9/22, A1, Day, 748K) reports, "Health-care industry analysts said the program has the potential to transform the $230 billion prescription-drug business the way Wal-Mart has transformed other industries…where its aggressive pricing has forced some competitors out of business and allowed it to dominate entire categories of merchandise." Meanwhile, Mark McClellan, administrator of the CMS, "said he did not think the Wal-Mart offer would siphon beneficiaries from the Medicare drug benefit, known as Part D." He noted, "Remember that the drug plans in Medicare already provide excellent coverage for generics. … Many of the plans have generics for a dollar or two, or even free." But, "what the Wal-Mart plan does provide, he said, is a way for Medicare recipients to save more money after they reach the 'doughnut hole.'"

DOJ_NMG_0067117

The Washington Times (9/22, Lopes, 88K) notes that perhaps the greatest impact will be felt by "independent pharmacies" since they are "not able to afford reducing the cost of drugs." Critics "pounced on Wal-Mart, claiming the world's largest retailer will use the low-priced drugs to entice shoppers to buy other Wal-Mart products, a business tactic known as 'loss leading.' But Wal-Mart spokesman David Tovar dismissed that claim." Mr. Tovar said, "This program is not a loss leader for us. … It will be a profit creator for us." Nonetheless, "the drugs included in the program are widely prescribed and, for the most part, not expensive."

The New York Times (9/22, Barbaro, Abelson, 1.21M) reports the plan "could make scores of treatments affordable to the uninsured, reduce the burden on Medicaid and bring competitive pricing to the pharmacy industry." But "a close examination of the program…suggests that its impact could be blunted by several factors." Health care analysts "were quick to point out that Wal-Mart has carefully chosen which drugs it will cover — 300 out of roughly 11,000 generic drugs available." And "while uninsured people should benefit from the program, those with insurance may save only a dollar or so, making a trip to Wal-Mart not worth their while."

Economists Dismiss Fears Over Drop In Factory Activity. USA Today (9/22, Hagenbaugh, Shell, 2.27M) reports, "Economic jitters grew Thursday after a report showing a decline in factory activity in part of the USA became the latest piece of data to suggest the slowdown in the economy may be sharper than initially thought." But "although the economic fears sparked a sell-off on Wall Street, some economists said it is too early to panic." PNC Financial Services chief economist Stuart Hoffman said, "I don't see broad enough signs to indicate that the economy is really grinding to a halt." Manufacturing activity "in the Philadelphia area fell in September, the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia said. The Fed bank's index of conditions in the area, considered representative of U.S. factories, fell to -0.4 this month from an 18.5 reading in August."

The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Gerena-Morales, Derby, 2.03M) reports that meanwhile, "the Conference Board issued a separate economic report that also signaled the economy is headed toward slower growth for the remainder of the year. It reported that its composite index of leading indicators -- which attempts to forecast economic activity as much as six months into the future -- fell 0.2% in August to a reading of 137.6, following the same decline in July."

Stocks Down. NBC Nightly News (9/21, story 8, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Dow was Dow almost 80 points today [to close at 11,533.23]. NASDAQ was down 15 points [to close at 2,237.75]." The Wall Street Journal (9/22, Hudson, Ng, 2.03M) says the Standard & Poor's 500 index fell 7.15 points, or 0.54%, to 1318.03." USA Today (9/22, 2.27M) reports stocks "retreated in afternoon trading after the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia's index shrank for the first time in three years. Earlier, the Conference Board's index of leading indicators showed that an economic slump may extend into next year."

Harris Interactive Online Poll Finds Public Opinion "Sour" On Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, 2.03M) reports President Bush's job approval numbers "have rebounded a bit since he made a series of speeches making the case for a strong U.S. role in Iraq. But a new poll from Harris Interactive shows that Americans remain very sour on the war itself and the U.S.'s chances of success -- and remain uncertain over the whether the U.S. was right to go to war in the first place." Harris "found 61% of those polled aren't confident that U.S. policies in Iraq will be successful, vs. 20% who are confident of success." Bush's "job rating on his handling of Iraq runs two-to-one negative overall. But at 64% negative to 32% positive, Mr. Bush has recovered from his ratings in May, when 68% were in the negative column vs. 29% in the positive column."

CNN Analyst Dismisses Rise In Bush Polls Numbers. CNN political analyst Bill Schneider on CNN's The Situation Room (9/21) examined three recent polls, two of which showed President Bush's job approval rating rising and said, "Notice all three polls continue to show a majority of Americans disapproving of the President's job performance. In historical terms each in the mid '40s President Bush is in a weak position going into the midterm elections. His rating would have to rise above 50 for his party to benefit. While President Bush may have gotten a boost on handling terrorism and the evidence on that point is mixed, it does not seem to be strong enough to turn the political situation around."

Republican Rollercoaster Ride Seems To Be Heading Up Again. The White House Bulletin/US News (9/21) reported, "A stirring address to the House Republican Conference late last week by President Bush has 'buoyed' the spirits of lawmakers that they won't lose control in the fall elections." Members and aides "interviewed after the meeting last week described a glum crowd politely greeting the President who turned the mood around with his one-on-one talks and broader speech to the Republicans." One member said, "People came out of the meeting pumped up. That was his best appearance ever in front of the caucus." The Bulletin adds that insiders said "that Bush touched on the issues facing the election and provided an upbeat assessment. He knew the name of every member he addressed and had a nickname for virtually all." Bush's appearance, "added to his increasing poll numbers and the growing economy have given the Republicans hope of keeping the majority." One Republican said, "A majority of our caucus feels buoyed. I'm not saying that we are out of the woods...but it's not as bad as we thought."

GOP Strategists Concerned By DSCC's $12 Million Cash Edge. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, A4, Harwood, 2.03M) "Washington Wire" reports that while Democrats face an "uphill climb" to retake the Senate, Republican strategists fear the DSCC's "$12 million cash edge heightens chances of an upset." Democrats believe Sen. Robert Menendez "is their only incumbent at risk, though they dismiss talk of replacing him" on the ballot with Rep. Rob Andrews. Democrats "grudgingly credit" Maryland GOP nominee Michael Steele "for effective, offbeat ads," but are expecting the "state's blue tint" to boost Rep. Ben Cardin to victory.

Business Community Said To Be Hedging Bets In Congressional Races. The Wall Street Journal (9/22, A1, Cummings, 2.03M) reports in a front page story that the US Chamber of Commerce, "usually a stalwart of Republicans," has "run about $700,000 in advertisements defending" Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean of Illinois "and plans to help get out the pro-business vote for her in the fall." Bean is "among more than a dozen Democrats in key races across the country that the chamber is backing this year. Half of them also have benefited from the chamber's first-ever television ads for Democrats. Partly, the organization is rewarding these Democrats for votes in favor of free trade and other issues it holds dear. It also is sensing possible Republican defeats in congressional elections on Nov. 7, and is hedging its bets by spreading some of the organization's wealth to the other side of the aisle." The chamber's move "mirrors a subtle but significant shift across the business community, which has begun anticipating that the Republican majorities in Congress could shrink, if not collapse. Washington lobbying firms are balancing their Republican rosters with Democratic hires, and some companies are injecting more bipartisanship in their campaign giving."

Democrats Seek To Label GOP "Centrist" As Bush "Rubber Stamp" In WA8. The Washington Times (9/22, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Washington's 8th CD is "emblematic of this year's battle for Congress, with Democrats working their hardest to link Republicans in power to President Bush." Democrat Darcy Burner "says her chances of ousting freshman Rep. Dave Reichert -- and giving the Democrats a seat in their bid to recapture the House -- are good because state residents are weary of the president." But Reichert is "one of the Republican centrists in Congress and reminds voters at every opportunity that he is not afraid to be an independent voice for their needs." Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert "and many other top Republicans have come to the state to campaign for Mr. Reichert, making him an easy target for Democrats who call him 'rubber-stamp Reichert.'" When White House strategist Karl Rove "visited on behalf of Mr. Reichert last Friday, Mrs. Burner received more than $50,000 in an online counter-fundraiser."

Steele Criticizes Black GOP Group's Controversial Ad. The AP (9/22, Wyatt) reports a "national black Republican group is running a radio advertisement accusing Democrats of starting the Ku Klux Klan and saying the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was a Republican, a claim challenged by civil-rights researchers." Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, "the black Republican nominee for Maryland's open Senate seat, disavowed the ad" as "'insulting to Marylanders.' He said his campaign asked the Washington-based National Black Republican Association to stop running it."

Steele Picks Up Support From Black Democrats. The Washington Times (9/22, Miller, 88K) reports, "Prominent black Democrats yesterday bucked their party to support Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele -- the Republican nominee in Maryland's U.S. Senate race." William H. "Billy" Murphy Jr., "a Baltimore civil rights lawyer…hosted the 'Steele Democrats' event at the Eubie Blake National Jazz Institute and Cultural Center." Murphy said, "Like so many people who have come out today, I'm sick and tired of being taken for granted by the Democratic Party." The Times adds a "surprise for Mr. Steele came from the son of Kweisi Mfume, a past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People who lost last week's Democratic primary to U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin." Michael Mfume, "a producer of the horror film 'Ax 'Em' and an active supporter of his father's campaign, told reporters at the Eubie Blake center that he did not speak for his father."

Cardin Says Steele Ducking Debates. The Washington Times (9/22, Ward, 88K) reports Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin "criticized his Republican rival Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele for ducking debates in the U.S. Senate race in Maryland. But Mr. Steele and his campaign said Mr. Cardin is 'playing games,' and that his campaign manager won't return phone calls to set up a debate." The Cardin campaign "has issued public challenges to Mr. Steele, the first black person elected to statewide office in Maryland, to debate Mr. Cardin at one of the 10-term congressman's previously scheduled campaign stops." So far, "the two candidates are expected to meet Oct. 29 for a debate on NBC's 'Meet the Press.'"

Libby Defense Fund Chairman Hosts Lieberman Fundraiser. The AP (9/22, Miga) reports Mel Sembler, the "prominent Republican who chairs I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby's legal defense fund co-hosted a fundraiser Wednesday for Sen. Joe Lieberman, who is running for re-election as an independent after losing the Democratic primary." Sembler, "a former Republican National Committee finance committee chairman, helped organize a reception that raised about a 'couple hundred thousand dollars' for Lieberman, who was in attendance. Sembler said the event at his firm's office in St. Petersburg, Fla., drew a mix of Republican, Democratic and independent donors." Sembler, who is "board chairman of the Sembler Company, a real estate and shopping center development company, said he has worked hard to raise money for Libby's legal defense fund." Sembler, who "described himself as 'dear friends' with Cheney," said, "It's amazing to go to all this hard work when a crime never got committed."

Allen Said To Have Handled Revelation Of Jewish Heritage Awkwardly. The New York Times (9/22, Kornblut, 1.21M) reports Sen. George Allen finds "himself in a growing group of political figures who have discovered their Jewish roots late in life. The responses to his situation, which included bad ethnic humor and serious debates about denial and anti-Semitism, focused attention on the power of religious, ethnic and racial identities in politics, forces that may not have the power they once did. But those forces remain sufficiently alive that Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, a Mormon, will almost certainly face questions about his religion if he runs for the Republican presidential nomination." Political operatives say "what matters is not so much Mr. Allen's bloodlines but his handling of the news that his mother was born Jewish, a fact that both say she told him last month." Weekly Standard editor William Kristol "said the incident especially 'struck a nerve with Jewish Republicans.'" Kristol said, "It's simply the way he handled it." The Times adds, "But in a southern state that was once a slave state, where white voters are predominant and cultural and political conservatives are a majority, Mr. Allen has seemed to struggle to find the right words to address his newfound identity."

Sen. George Allen, in an interview on CNN's The Situation Room (9/21, Blitzer) explained, "I was with my mother, we were across the table and I asked her, there are these rumors flying around here that you're Jewish, you have Jewish blood lines and so forth. I asked her, is there anything to this? And I saw her reaction. And she said, yes, there are. And I said, well, why didn't you ever tell me? I didn't want to tell you. You loved me and you won't love me as much. I said, mom, why would I -- I love you even more. I respect you even more when I heard of why she had hid this for fear of retribution, of stigma and how that would harm not just her, but my father and her children. She was protecting her children. And I said, well, ma, this just doesn't matter, you know? The Nazis are gone. And it just doesn't matter and she says, especially when she said does this make you love me any less. And I just, no, I loved her more. And I said, for this -- let's just stop -- you know, there is no reason to carry on with. She said, please, please, you cannot tell anyone. Tell no one."

Kerry Defends House Democrats From Swift Boat Backer. The AP (9/22, Lester) reports the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth group "was Sen. John Kerry's albatross in 2004. Now, the Democrat is warning his party about suffering the same fate in a fundraising letter." In 2004, "the Swift Boat group, backed by Texas businessman Bob Perry, made unsubstantiated allegations about Kerry's Vietnam War heroism. The presidential nominee's slow and uncertain response is blamed for helping doom his White House bid." Perry has "donated $5 million to the Economic Freedom Fund, a newly created California group, that is running ads, sending out mailings and using automated phone calls to criticize Democratic candidates in Georgia, West Virginia, Iowa and Indiana." In a fundraising letter for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, Kerry "urges Democrats to fight back." Kerry said, "Their first attack ads against Democratic House candidates are already on the air. They hope they've caught you sleeping. We have to respond quickly and in force."

Five-Way Texas Gubernatorial Race Tightening. The New York Times (9/22, Blumenthal, 1.21M) reports, "Just a few months ago," the Texas gubernatorial race "appeared to be a fairly conventional if well-financed match between Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, and the state comptroller, Carole Keeton Strayhorn, a former Republican running as an independent." But in the "last few weeks, though, two other candidates have gained enough traction to make it a much wider race: the humorist Kinky Friedman and Chris Bell, a former Democratic congressman. A fifth candidate, James Werner, a Libertarian, could make the difference if the Nov. 7 election becomes a squeaker." Mired in "low popularity ratings but with rivals dividing the opposition and strong backing from evangelicals, Governor Perry is still favored to win his quest to become the longest-serving chief executive in Texas history using a strategy of 'running out the clock," according to Cal Jillson, a professor of political science at Southern Methodist University. Still, he "cautioned that 'the history of Texas is full of zany, crazy races and this could be one.'"

Friedman Defends 1980 Use Of Racial Slur As Satire. The AP (9/22, Shannon) reports, "Comedian and independent gubernatorial candidate Kinky Friedman on Thursday defended his use of a racial slur during a performance at Houston nightclub 26 years ago after an audio clip of the standup routine was posted on the Internet." Friedman, 61, "said he has tried to expose and lampoon racism, and was making fun of bigots when he used the n-word twice in a joke." Friedman said, "They're attacking me for something that Richard Pryor did, that Lenny Bruce did, which is to have the freedom to poke fun at anybody that you want. The whole show is satirizing racism." The AP adds state Rep. Garnet Coleman, "former chairman of the Texas Legislative Black Caucus, said it was difficult to find the humor in his joke after his remarks about Katrina evacuees in Houston in which he referred to them as 'crackheads and thugs.'"

Sweeney Defends Unions' Collective Political Financial Influence. In a Wall Street Journal letter to the editor (9/22), AFL-CIO President John Sweeney says, "In your Sept. 19 editorial 'Fun Union Facts' you continue your crusade against unions by picking and choosing facts so carefully that your page needs a 'reader beware' sign. Unions pool their resources through the AFL-CIO so working people's voices can be heard in the political and legislative process and to support one another in organizing; these are big budget items. At a time when median household income is sinking, 45 million Americans don't have health care and poverty is rising, we would be neglecting our duties if we didn't do everything possible to elect working-family-friendly candidates and pass laws that will improve workers' lives."

California Bill Would Guarantee Electoral Votes To National Popular Vote Winner. The New York Times (9/22, Lyman, 1.21M) reports Stanford computer scientist John R. Koza "has concocted a plan for states to skirt the Electoral College system legally to insure the election of whichever presidential candidate receives the most votes nationwide." Dr. Koza said, "When people complain that it's an end run. I just tell them, 'Hey, an end run is a legal play in football.'" The Times adds the "first fruit of his effort, a bill approved by the California legislature that would allocate the state's 55 electoral votes to the winner of the national popular vote, sits on Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's desk. The governor has to decide by Sept. 30 whether to sign it, a decision that may well determine whether Dr. Koza's scheme takes flight or becomes another relic in the history of efforts to kill the Electoral College." The "brainstorm behind Dr. Koza's effort, led by a seven-month-old group, National Popular Vote, was to abandon that approach and focus on creating interstate compacts. Those are contracts that bind states over issues like nuclear waste and port authorities." Dr. Koza's compact, "if approved by enough legislatures, would commit a state's electors to vote for the candidate who wins the most national votes, even if the candidate loses in that state."

Evangelical Movement Said To Be Politically Multifaceted. CBS Evening News (9/21, story 6, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Many people might assume all evangelicals are conservative Republican and speak with one voice, but more and more, this is a group that is branching out in different directions." CBS (Pitts) added, "Author and preacher Jim Wallis calls himself a progressive evangelical, who says Christians should focus on injustice around the world." Wallis: "With 30,000 children dying every day, needlessly from poverty and disease, I can't imagine Jesus thinking the top issue on our agenda ought to be gay marriage amendments in Ohio." Pitts: "Tony Perkins is a Christian conservative." Tony Perkins: "I think more and more people are standing on the -- on our side, on the side of the sanctity of human life, the preservation of marriage." Pitts: "Perkins is President of the politically powerful Family Research Council. He argues abortion and gay marriage are the driving concerns for most evangelicals." Pitts: "Wallis says he's against abortion but argues the agenda of the religious right is too narrow and divisive." In the "last presidential election, 78% of white evangelicals voted for President Bush. Now we're seeing more and more Democrats from Barack Obama to Hillary Clinton talking about their faith and issues like poverty and the environment."

State Governments Selling Surplus Material. USA Today (9/22, Jones, 2.27M) reports state governments are "putting more of their surplus goods on sale rather than in the dump. That's giving bargain hunters the opportunity to pick up everything from computers and desks to a car crusher and a statue of Smokey Bear." South Dakota "unloaded the car crusher for $95,000 on the Internet, according to Rick Voorhes, the state's surplus property manager. Alabama got about $30 for the 'life-size' Smokey Bear statue, says Shane Bailey, director of that state's surplus property agency." The officials "in charge of selling such items say tighter state budgets and a desire to reduce the amount of stuff deposited into landfills have bolstered their sales efforts." At least "11 states, including Georgia, Arkansas, South Dakota, Washington and South Carolina, are using online auctions to sell surplus goods, according to a survey by the National Association of State Chief Administrators."

For First Time, All "Forbes 400" Members Are Billionaires. The fact that all 400 people on "Forbes" magazine's latest list of the 400 wealthiest Americans are all billionaires drew the attention of two networks and the Washington Post. ABC World News (9/21, story 8, 2:35, Gibson) said that while "five years ago, there were 266 billionaires, this year, all 400 people are billionaires," and "in fact, there are some people with a billion dollars who didn't make the list." The CBS Evening News (9/21, story 8, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) said Bill Gates "is number one: He's worth $53 billion. Investor Warren Buffett is number two at $46 billion." In its front-page story, the Washington Post (9/22, Ahrens, 748K) highlights a few of the other names, including the founders of Google Inc., and casino mogul Sheldon Adelson, who "has made $1 million per hour over the past two years." (The complete list is available online.)

Convert To Islam Hopes To Help Build Harmony. On the front page of the Metro section, the Washington Post (9/22, Murphy, 748K) profiles Northern Virginia resident Chris Moore, the "son of a U.S. Navy man" who was raised Catholic but converted to Islam. The 31-year-old, "like many other young Muslims in the United States," is "seeking to fashion an Islamic identity that flourishes in American society and influences it for the better. He feels a responsibility, he said, to contribute to a more harmonious relationship between Islam and the West."

Military Chaplin Calls For Support For Military Marriages. Capt. James Key, chaplain, a brigade unit ministry trainer at Fort Irwin in California, writes in an op-ed in USA Today (9/22, 2.27M) that "military couples, unlike their civilian counterparts, face added stresses. Constant military moves are tough enough, but when you add long-term and multiple deployments to the mix, even the strongest marriages can be tested." The "military uncertainties and separations can have an emotional impact on families," so "it is incumbent upon our political leaders to remain cognizant of the emotional wounds soldiers could also be suffering in their marriages." Our "spreading democracy in Iraq or any other hot spot must not come at the expense of military marriages. Helping our troops maintain healthy families is a human imperative that none of us can afford to ignore."

Krugman Calls For Universal Health Care System. Columnist Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (9/22, 1.21M) on the recent "series of [insurance] horror stories" that suggest "a growing trend: more and more health insurers are finding ways to yank your insurance when you get sick." Yet "even as health care becomes the core of the American economy, our system of paying for health care remains sick, and is getting sicker." And "here's the thing: it's all unnecessary. Every other wealthy nation manages to provide almost all its citizens with guaranteed health insurance, while spending less on health care than we do. And there's no mystery why: we're paying the price for pointless, destructive reliance on private insurers. … If we had a universal system…there would be no more horror stories."

LATimes Criticizes California AG's Suit Against Auto Manufacturers. The Los Angeles Times (9/22, 918K) editorializes that the "charitable spin" on California Attorney General Bill Lockyer's lawsuit against major auto manufacturers, which "alleges that because vehicle exhaust contributes to global warming, the companies should be held financially liable for everything from wildfires to a bad ski season," is that it is a "politically inspired, headline-grabbing stunt by a state attorney general running for state treasurer. The alternative -- that he might actually believe this suit has legal merit -- may be more frightening." The suit "is the latest salvo fired in the struggle between the state and the auto industry, which has separately sued the state over its attempts to curb global warming. But California shouldn't be in the business of filing meritless suits to gain leverage in other cases."

WPost Criticizes Ehrlich's Proposals For November Balloting. The Washington Post (9/22, A16, 748K) criticizes Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich's call for the use of paper or absentee ballots in November, saying after problems in last week's primaries, Ehrlich had "a choice: show the leadership expected of the state's top executive or succumb to the political motives of a candidate running for reelection. Unfortunately, it is Mr. Ehrlich the candidate who emerged with proposals certain to confuse the public and undermine confidence in voting. … We have no way of knowing Mr. Ehrlich's intent, but we do believe that his words and actions are creating a sense of confusion that could discourage voting."

Ahmadinejad Says He'll Consider Enrichment Suspension Under "Fair Conditions." The Washington Post (9/22, A13, Lynch, 748K) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "said Thursday that his government is prepared to consider suspending its controversial uranium-enrichment program if Western governments meet unspecified conditions." He "did not spell out Tehran's demands," but "his remarks indicated that he is prepared to move ahead with preliminary discussions with European powers aimed at heading off a confrontation with the West." Ahmadinejad "denied U.S. claims that he is pursuing a covert nuclear weapons program, saying that Iran's spiritual leader has issued a decree prohibiting such a development. He said Iran is simply exercising its rights, under the 1970 Non-Proliferation Treaty, to develop nuclear power to meet the country's growing energy needs." He further "accused the West of reneging on previous agreements to support Iran's efforts to develop a nuclear power program."

The Wall Street Journal (9/22, King, 2.03M) says Ahmadinejad "continued to dodge questions about his country's nuclear ambitions, saying Tehran is willing to negotiate over -- and maybe even suspend -- its uranium-enrichment program, but not under pressure and only under 'fair conditions.'" The statement, made "during a rambling news conference, added further uncertainty to a challenge that has stymied the U.S., Europe, Russia and China all summer." Ahmadinejad "once again…appears to have offered just enough encouragement to keep the threat of sanctions at bay, but not enough to make it clear when or if actual talks might begin." While the "decision is to give Iran more time," the Journal notes Administration "officials say the patience of Washington and other key capitals will wear out within a few weeks. It is unclear what will happen once the patience runs out."

McClatchy (9/22, Strobel) notes, "Grinning and giving brisk little salutes," he "denied Thursday that Iran wants a nuclear bomb and said it might discuss suspending uranium enrichment if the conditions are fair." He also "he railed against Zionists and suggested that several thousand mainly Jewish protesters who demonstrated against his presence in New York City might have been paid to attend. He also called for a referendum on the future of the land that constitutes Israel and the Palestinian areas." McClatchy says he was "smiling from the start," and adds, "With his face on the cover of Time magazine and his every word and movement followed by hordes of journalists, this has clearly been Ahmadinejad's week. His combination of breezy confidence and sometimes slippery answers underscored the challenge President Bush faces in trying to halt Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program."

The AP (9/22, Faramarzi) adds Ahmadinejad "seems to be enjoying the spotlight at this year's U.N. General Assembly, easing his way into the international arena and trying to improve his image amid the controversy over his nuclear program and remarks about Israel and the Holocaust." He explained to a reported yesterday "that when he called for the destruction of Israel and dismissed the Holocaust as a myth, his issue was not with the Jewish people but with Zionists, 'who are not Jews. We love everyone in the world — Jews, Christians, Muslims, non-Muslims, non-Jews, non-Christians." He "also expressed love and affection for the American people, just as President Bush reached out to the Iranian people in his General Assembly speech on Tuesday. Ahmadinejad said he wished he had more time here to spend with them in person."

Ahmadinejad Not Committed To Disarming Hezbollah. The New York Times (9/22, Hoge, 1.21M) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "refused to say Thursday whether he would comply with a Security Council demand for the disarmament and disbanding of Hezbollah." He "was also evasive about whether Iran would comply with the resolution's call for an arms embargo to keep Hezbollah from rearming. He said that the United Nations Charter gave people the right to defend themselves and that 'we give spiritual support to all those who want to uphold their rights.'"

Bill Clinton Says Administration Should Talk To Iran. The AP (9/22) reports former President Clinton "said Thursday the U.S. should try talking to Iran about its nuclear weapons ambitions without imposing a lot of conditions." He is quoted saying on NBC's Today Show, "If you think you might have trouble with somebody, and God forbid if you think it could lead to a military confrontation, then there needs to be the maximum amount of contact beforehand. The United States should not be afraid to talk to anyone. They should not be reluctant and shouldn't have too many conditions."
